ENGLAND.

The present Volume brings down the Parliamentary History of the Country to the Year 1805. From which Period it is continued to the present time in the Work entitled "House of Commons: Parliamentary Debates."

* The Editor of the above Works is preparing for the press, to be published in Two Volumes:

I. A GENERAL INDEX to the Parliamentary History of England,

Parliamentary History.

VOL. XXXVI.

The two Volumes will form a complete Parliamentary Dictionary, or ready Book of Reference for every subject of importance that has, at any time, come before Parliament. The great utility of such a Work, not only to Members of the two Houses, but to every Lawyer and Politician, must be self-evident. It is many Gentlemen, who have not been regular Spectators to the two Houses, who nevertheless be desirous of possessing a General Index to the Political History of their Country, such Gentlemen are requested to send in their names to the publisher; as only a very limited number of Copies beyond the usual impression, will be printed.

Parliamentary History.

42 GEORGE THE THIRD, A. D. 1801.

OF THE

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

THE King's Speech on Opening the Session.] October 29, 1801. His Majesty opened the Session with the following Speech to both Houses:

" My Lords and Gentlemen ;

" I have the satisfaction to acquaint you, that the important negotiations, in which I was engaged at the close of the last session of parliament, are brought to a favourable conclusion. The differences with the Northern Powers have been adjusted by a convention with the emperor of Russia, to which the kings of Denmark and Sweden have expressed their readiness to accede. The essential rights for which we contended are thereby secured ; and provision is made that the exercise of them shall be attended with as little molestation as possible to the subjects of the contracting parties.

" Preliminaries of peace have also been ratified between me and the French republic ; and I trust that this important arrangement, whilst it manifests the justice and moderation of my views, will also be found conducive to the substantial interests of this country, and honourable to the British character :—Copies of these Papers shall be forthwith laid before you, and I earnestly hope that the transactions to which they refer will meet with the approbation of my parliament.

[VOL. XXXVI.]

" Gentlemen of the House of Commons ;

" I have directed such estimates to be prepared for the various demands for the public service, as appear to me to be best adapted to the situation in which we are now placed. It is painful to me to reflect, that provision cannot be made for defraying the expenses which must unavoidably be continued, for a time, in different parts of the world, and for maintaining an adequate peace establishment, without large additional supplies. You may, however, be assured, that all possible attention shall be paid to such economical arrangements as may not be inconsistent with the great object of effectually providing for the security of all my dominions.

" My Lords and Gentlemen ;

" I cannot sufficiently describe the gratification and comfort I derive from the relief, which the bounty of divine Providence has afforded to my people, by the abundant produce of the late harvest. In contemplating the situation of the country at this important conjuncture, it is impossible for me to refrain from expressing the deep sense I entertain of the temper and fortitude which have been manifested by all descriptions of my faithful subjects, under the various and complicated difficulties with which they have had to contend.

" The distinguished valour and eminent services of my forces by sea and land, which, at no period have been surpassed ; the unprecedented exertions of the militia and fencibles, and the zeal and perseverance of the yeomanry and volunteer corps of cavalry and infantry, are entitled to my warmest acknowledgments ; and I am persuaded that you will join with me in reflecting, with peculiar satisfaction, on the naval and military operations of the last campaign; and on the successful and glorious issue of the expedition to Egypt, which has been marked throughout by achievements, tending, in their consequences and by their example, to produce lasting advantages and honour to this country.

"It is my first wish, and most fervent prayer, that my people may experience the reward they have so well merited, in a full enjoyment of the blessings of peace, in a progressive increase of the national commerce, credit, and resources; and, above all, in the undisturbed possession of their religion, laws, and liberties, under the safeguard and protection of that constitution, which it has been the great object of all our efforts to preserve, and which it is our most sacred duty to transmit, unimpaired, to our descendants."

Lord Bolton rose to call their lordships attention to the sentiments of paternal affection with which his majesty had announced the happy tidings of his having successfully adjusted the differences with the northern powers, and ratified preliminaries of peace with the French republic. These happy events had been brought about by the promptitude and alacrity with which his majesty's beneficent views for the welfare of his people had been seconded by the vigilance of his councils; the bravery and achievements of his forces by sea and land; and the zeal, perseverance and fortitude of every description of his faithful people. He should not at that moment go into the detail of the preliminaries of peace, which had been received with such universal marks of exultation throughout the country. The universal eagerness of joy with which the event was received, would be confirmed by a careful examination of the terms upon which it had been accomplished. The great leading features of the peace were known; and as the papers would be officially laid before them, he should content himself with glancing at a few topics, one of which only he should presume to press; and that was, the fitness of the time at which ministers had concluded the preliminaries of peace. They had chosen a moment for the negotiation when our resources were in their full vigour, and when the nation had distinguished its character by the firm, manly, and determined posture of preparation into which it had put itself on the menaces of an invasion. The negotiation was begun and the peace concluded, therefore, at a moment the most auspicious to the British character, when our resources were unimpaired, and our armies triumphant. It was not his purpose to trace the horrors of the French Revolution, from which every civilized mind must turn with disgust; he desired only to draw the eyes of all mankind to the present posture of the people who had brought upon themselves the mischief, as an instructive lesson to all other nations. After enduring for a series of years every possible misery, they had now come to a mere chance only of restoration to the blessings of a regulated system. He was far from defending the ancient monarchy of France; but every man of that country must look back with regret on the comparative freedom, security and happiness which he enjoyed under the monarchy. It was a grand and magnificent triumph for England to make a peace, when her navies and armies were every where conquerors, from the frozen seas of the north to the pillars of Hercules; and from Africa to the extremest shores of Asia and America. The feeling was rendered still more gratifying and exalted, when we made the triumphs of our heroes only accessory to the spirit of moderation which dictated our appeal to arms—when the unexampled achievements of that band of heroes who had rescued Egypt from its invaders, were made only to restore it to its rightful owner. But, while the sentiments of moderation which actuated his majesty's councils dignified the cause in which we had been engaged, what a security for the continuance of peace did not the possession of such navies and armies give to the nation! What a guarantee for the continuance of peace was the character of that army, and of that gallant commander, who, after achieving the most signal triumphs, showed that he possessed a quality even more splendid than heroism, modesty, which disclaimed all merit to himself, that he might heap it upon the tomb of his departed predecessor, and spread it over the ranks of his companions in arms! When he regarded the noble struggle which this country had made, unassisted and alone, it filled him with enthusiastic admiration. Some of our allies had already made peace; some had been invaded by the enemy, and the integrity of Europe could no longer be preserved. The manner in which former negotiations had been carried on, and the demands made by the enemy on those occasions furnished another argument in favour of the present peace, by showing the difference between what had been at one time demanded, and since acceded to. — His lordship concluded with moving the following Address:

“We acknowledge with gratitude your majesty’s goodness in acquainting us that the important negotiation in which your majesty was engaged at the close of the last session, have been brought to a favourable conclusion; and we beg leave to express to your majesty our satisfaction that the difficulties with the northern powers have been adjusted by a convention with the Emperor of Russia, to which the kings of Denmark and Sweden have expressed their readiness to accede; and that preliminaries of peace have also been ratified between your majesty and the French republic.

“We return your majesty our sincere thanks for the communications which your majesty has been pleased to direct to be laid before us; and we beg leave to assure your majesty, that we will, with the utmost diligence, take them into our most serious consideration.

“While we most cordially rejoice with your majesty in the relief which the bounty of Divine Providence has afforded to your majesty’s people by the abundant produce of the late harvest; we at the same time beg leave to testify our most cordial concurrence in the sentiments which your majesty has been pleased to express, of the temper and fortitude which have been manifested by all descriptions of your majesty’s subjects, under the various and complicated difficulties with which they have had to contend.

“We reflect with the greatest pride and exultation, on the distinguished valour and eminent services of your majesty’s forces by sea and land, which at no period have been surpassed; we have witnessed, with most heartfelt satisfaction, the unprecedented exertions of the militia and fencibles, and the zeal and perseverance of the yeomanry and volunteer corps of cavalry and infantry; and we most cordially join with your majesty in the sentiments so justly due to the naval and military operations of the last campaign, and to the successful and glorious issue of the expedition to Egypt, which has been marked throughout by achievements which, in their consequences, and by their example, tend to produce lasting advantage and honour to this country.

“We beg leave to testify to your majesty our most grateful sense of your majesty’s uniform concern and regard for the welfare of your people; and to declare the unfeigned earnestness with which we join with your majesty in most fervent prayer that your majesty’s people may experience the reward they have so well merited, in a full enjoyment of the blessings of peace, in a progressive increase of the national commerce, credit, and resources, and, above all, in the undisturbed possession of their religion, laws, and liberties, under the safeguard and protection of that constitution, which it has been the great object of all our efforts to preserve, and which it is our most sacred duty and determined resolution to transmit unimpaired to our descendants.”

Lord Lilford rose to second the address. He congratulated their lordships on the happy tidings that peace had been concluded with the French republic, an event which had diffused universal joy throughout the kingdom, and must impress their lordships with the same sentiments of exultation and pride; the more so as the event was not purchased by the humiliation of Great Britain, the sacrifice of any of her important interests, or the least danger to our happy constitution. The blessings that peace would necessarily bring with it must present themselves to the observation of every man. To prove the full extent of this, it was only necessary to look back to the melancholy situation in which we stood when parliament was last called together, and compare it with the alteration of circumstances that had since taken place. At the time to which he referred, every member cast his eyes around him with apprehension and alarm, and saw no prospect of an early cessation of hostilities. On the contrary, the war assumed an aspect of new terror, in consequence of the menaced interference of the northern powers; while we had the gigantic force of France to contend with nearer home, and the fate of Egypt hung in suspense. Our domestic situation was, if possible, still more melancholy. Our beloved sovereign, afflicted with severe indisposition, and administration divided among themselves; government for some time in a state of inefficiency; the people threatened with all the horrors of an immediate famine, and reduced to the utmost distress, in consequence of the high price of provisions; and the country menaced with invasion. Let their lordships hold those well-grounded causes of alarm in their consideration, and looking at the present posture of our affairs both at home and abroad, ask themselves, if they had not reason to prostrate themselves before the God of Mercies with all humility, and pour forth songs of praise and thanksgiving? Owing to the vigilance of administration, supported by the vigorous exertions of our gallant officers by sea and land, we had been again put in possession of our maritime rights, and security had been obtained for our holding them, free from question or infringement, for the future. While every other country which had opposed the principles inseparable from revolutions, had either had its government subverted, or its rights more or less invaded and injured, this happy empire had safely stood the shock; the fabric of her constitution remained unimpaired, her religion unviolated, and her laws and liberties preserved. From abroad we had little to dread, and at home we could have nothing to fear from domestic enemies; since the few who might continue to act under the influence of the pernicious principles, that had so much endangered other countries, would find that they had no longer any to aid and encourage their mischievous designs. Impressed with these sentiments, he cordially supported the Address.

The Duke of Bedford said, that the Address had his hearty concurrence. Indeed, if he could enter into any difference on the present occasion, it would have been with the noble lord who moved the Address, as to that part of his argument in which he laid so much stress on the fitness of the present time for the conclusion of peace; his own opinion being, that a fit time might have been found much earlier. He hoped that, as speedily as possible, the constitution, of which the people had been so long deprived, would be restored to them.

The Address was agreed to, nem. diss.

The King's Answer to the Lords' Address.] To the Address of the Lords his Majesty returned this Answer:

"My lords; I thank you for this dutiful and loyal Address: your conduct on this occasion, and your assurances of the attention you will give to those objects I have directed to be laid before you, are such as I expected from the wisdom and anxious zeal for the public interest, which have always guided your proceedings: nothing can be more grateful to my feelings than the sense you express of my desire to promote the welfare and happiness of my people."

Debate in the Commons on the Address of Thanks.] His majesty's Speech having been read from the Chair,

Lord Lovaine rose to move an Address of thanks. He was convinced, he said, that every member would concur with him in offering their acknowledgments to his majesty for his most gracious speech, and in expressing their exultation and gratitude for the happy consummation of that event which had restored tranquillity to Europe; an event which, as it was viewed by the great majority of the kingdom with satisfaction, would, he hoped, give rise to the expression of but one sentiment on the part of its representatives—a sentiment of joy at the restoration of the blessings of peace, by a treaty highly beneficial to the nation. When the preliminaries should be laid before the House, he was persuaded it would appear that the terms were no way derogatory to British faith, or the expectations which British valour entitled us to form. Who could look, without exultation, at the state of the country, after a series of military and naval achievements which had never been exceeded? Every quarter of the globe had been the theatre of British valour. The successes that we had obtained during the war, and particularly during the last year, would remain eternal monuments to future ages, that we had attempted no achievement, by the accomplishment of which we had not added to the character of the country. The restoration of Egypt to its ancient possessors was a circumstance which reflected the highest lustre on the individuals who had effected it, and the wisdom of the councils by which it had been planned. To his majesty's ministers were due the applause and gratitude of the country, for the prudence with which they had carried on the negotiations, and the unexampled secrecy with which they had concluded them. He was persuaded that the House would concur in the satisfaction expressed by his majesty at the convention concluded with the Powers of the North. The termination of the difficulties which had unhappily subsisted had been effected, by providing against the recurrence of the abuses which had taken place in the exercise of those rights which constituted the basis of our maritime greatness. The luxuriant harvest with which the country had been last year blessed, would, he trusted, not prevent the House from being actuated by the conviction, that economy in the consumption of its produce was the only mode of guarding against the danger of scarcity in future. When he looked forward to the blessings of peace, he could not help attributing the praise of it to those ministers who, during a period fraught with every danger, had, by the vigour of their measures, protected the country, not only from the avowed attempt of its foreign enemies, but from the secret machinations of its internal foes. He should conclude by moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this House, for his most gracious speech from the throne:—To assure his majesty that we learn with great satisfaction that the differences with the Northern Powers have been adjusted by a convention with the emperor of Russia, to which the kings of Denmark and Sweden have expressed their readiness to accede, and that preliminaries of peace have been ratified between his majesty and the French republic:—That we acknowledge his majesty's goodness in having been pleased to direct copies of these treaties to be laid before us, and to assure his majesty that we shall not fail to apply our immediate attention to the important transactions to which they relate:—That we are fully sensible of the paternal solicitude which leads his majesty to regret the necessity of large additional supplies. But that while we sincerely participate in that sentiment, we feel the indispensable duty of providing for the expenses which must for a time be unavoidable in different parts of the world, and of maintaining an adequate establishment on the final restoration of peace:—That we shall be anxious for the adoption of all such economical arrangements as may not be inconsistent with the great object which his majesty has so justly at heart, of effectually providing for the security of all his majesty's dominions:—That we truly participate in the gratification which his majesty has so graciously been pleased to express at the relief which the bounty of Divine Providence has afforded to his people by the abundance of the late harvest; and we acknowledge with the utmost gratitude, his majesty's gracious acceptance and approbation of the proofs of that temper and fortitude which have been manifested by all descriptions of his subjects, under the various and complicated difficulties with which they have had to contend:—That we reflect with sentiments of just exultation on the distinguished valour and eminent services of his majesty's forces by sea and land, which at no period have been surpassed; and that we have contemplated with the utmost satisfaction the unprecedented exertions of the militia and fencibles, and the zeal and perseverance of the yeomanry and volunteer corps of cavalry and infantry:—That we most heartily congratulate his majesty on the naval and military operations of the last campaign, and in the glorious and successful issue of the expedition to Egypt, marked as it has been throughout by achievements which, in their consequences, and by their example, cannot fail to conduce to the lasting advantage and honour of this country:—That we cordially share in his majesty's earnest wishes that his subjects may enjoy in their full extent the returning blessings of peace, in the progressive increase of the national commerce, credit, and resources; and, above all, in the undisturbed possession of their religion, laws, and liberties, under the safeguard and protection of that constitution, which it has been the great object of all our efforts to preserve, and which it is our fixed determination, as it is our most sacred duty, to transmit unimpaired to our descendants."

Mr. Wodehouse said, he joined in the general joy expressed upon the subject of a treaty of peace with France, in which the security of the country was amply provided for, and its interests firmly maintained. He rejoiced at the convention with the Northern Powers, in which the rights of Britons were maintained with undeviating firmness. Every one must feel elated at the glorious termination of a war, which was not begun for the purpose of gratifying the ambition, or extending the territories of Britain; but which she was compelled to commence for the purpose of preserving her dearest rights. He was convinced of the necessity of a considerable supply, which he had no doubt would be cheerfully voted. Gentlemen must be aware, that a much larger peace establishment would be necessary than had hitherto been known in this country, from the alteration which had taken place in the face of Europe. He was convinced, however, that nothing would be asked for by ministers, which was not absolutely necessary to the security of the kingdom. To our brilliant successes by sea and land, he must pay his tribute of admiration: they had been most glorious and unexampled. To one man, however, he more particularly yielded the palm of admiration: he alluded to the gallant Abercromby; to whose bravery, judgment, and skill, must peculiarly be ascribed those successes which immediately led to that happy termination of the war which we were now called upon to celebrate. The achievements of the British arms had immediately led to the happy event of peace, and ought to be regarded with every testimony of applause and approbation. Peculiar praise was also due to those who had seized the happy moment for negotiation, and who, without being elated by success, had founded upon it claims that at once united a proper dignity and a happy moderation. The advantages which would accrue to the people of England from the measures which had been pursued, were obvious. Their commerce would be enlarged, their interests benefited, and their prosperity and happiness materially increased.

Mr. Fox said, he wished it distinctly to be understood upon what ground he should that night give his vote. Whatever difference of opinion there might take place relative to the terms of the peace, or its general tenor, or the manner of concluding it, he most cordially and unequivocally joined in the general joy and exultation to which the conclusion of peace had given rise. He congratulated that House, and the country, on the happy event which had taken place, and which had called forth a general sentiment of applause. He only wished to add, that he should give his decided approbation of the address by his vote.

Mr. Pitt said, he rose to deliver, in a few words, his opinion in concurrence with what had already been delivered on the important subject now before the House, and upon which he was glad to have the prospect of unanimity, a thing which was not common even on the first day of a session. He said he would not enter at large into the transactions now before the House, and which his majesty had announced from the throne, either as to the pacification which had been concluded with the Northern Powers, or the signature of the preliminaries with France: when either of these topics, and particularly the latter, should be brought forward for discussion, he hoped he should be found to agree with the hon. gentleman who had just preceded him, and that they should both express their approbation of that measure, although it was an approbation which would proceed, perhaps, from different reasons. This was not the season for the regular discussion of either, and yet he was anxious to declare the outline of his sentiments on both these measures, which he saw, upon the whole, with great satisfaction; and he would add, that whatever criticism might be applied to inferior parts of these great transactions, or to whatever criticisms they might be liable, they were, on the whole, such as afforded matter of great joy to the country, and entitled the government which concluded them to esteem and thanks. There was another topic on which he would slightly touch—the termination of the war had been accompanied with honour to us; for it had given proofs of vigour and energy beyond any former war, and of achievements more splendid, if possible, than any which adorned our history before this period.

Mr. Windham said: Sir, it is a very painful task to me to declare my sentiments in opposition to those with whom I have long agreed. But as the address proposed to the House does not go to pledge us to any specific approbation of the measure of peace, it is not now my intention to enter into a consideration of the question of the terms; especially, as future opportunity will be presented, when I may state to the House those reasons upon which I found my disapprobation of them. It is not, therefore, my intention this day to give my negative to the proposed address, but to wait for the day of discussion, when I shall go more fully into the subject; at the same time wishing to be understood, that, in agreeing to the motion of to-day, I do not feel myself pledged to support any future motions upon the subject. This point being secured, Sir, I should be inclined to leave my opinion, and the reasons which are to support it, to be stated in that debate which may be expected shortly to take place, if the declarations of opinions in favour of the peace did not seem to me to require similar declarations on the part of those who find themselves compelled to condemn it. Other reasons also make it necessary to say a word or two even in the present stage of the business. To dissent from any prevalent opinion, to be a solitary mourner in the midst of general rejoicing, to wear the face of sadness while the countenances of others glisten with joy; to be sunk in dejection and despondency, while others are animated with the most brilliant hopes, is to be in a state which every one must be anxious to explain, so far, at least, as to make known the general nature and character of such an extraordinary difference. The House has seen, and can perfectly understand that those who are united in feeling may, nevertheless, be perfectly opposite in sentiment. An instance, Sir, may be seen this very night: the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Fox), and my right hon. friend near me, both agree in rejoicing and exulting in the present peace, though, I presume, on reasons widely different. It is my fortune, on the other hand, to agree with the hon. gentleman opposite in his opinions, but to differ from him wholly in his feelings. I do think, with him, that this is a glorious peace for France; but I nevertheless do not agree in feeling either with that hon. gentleman or my hon. friends. This, Sir, may serve to explain the cause of that diversity which I unhappily find between my own opinions and those more generally prevalent in the country. If I have not partaken in the rejoicings, it is because I have not been able to convince myself that there are any real or solid causes for rejoicing: it is because I fear, that, before many years shall pass over our heads, this rejoicing will be turned into repentance and bitter sorrow; it is because I dread that the advantages which peace may bring will be transient and unsubstantial, and be followed, at no very distant period, by the commencement of endless calamity and ruin. I have seen all around me bonfires and illuminations; I have heard the joyous ringing of the bells. But, were they the signs of any real good? the effects of any well-founded national joy? or rather, were they not the lights that were to light up our sepulchre, and the knell which was tolling us to our graves? I cannot consent to appear in my wedding-garment, until I know whether the feast to which I am invited, be really a wedding or a funeral. Sir, I speak in perfect plainness and sincerity, from the bottom of my heart, and with the solemnity of a death-bed declaration (a situation much resembling that in which we all stand), when I declare, that my hon. friends, who, in a moment of rashness and weakness, have fatally put their hands to this treaty, have signed the death-warrant of their country. They have given it a blow, under which it may languish for a few years, but from which I do not conceive how it is possible for it ever to recover. I feel how very unpleasant it is to deal in predictions, which I who make them most devoutly wish may never prove true. I know also the uncertainty of all human affairs, and am not profane enough to set bounds to the dispensations of Providence; but as far as any hope now appears,—any hope which can be rationally acted upon—such as any man would venture to avow, I can see, though anxiously I look for it, no possible means of escape.—There is but one thing which could enable this country to counterbalance the power of France on the continent; and this is our navy, which depends upon our commerce and navigation, as these do upon our colonial possessions. On the other hand, there is but one thing wanting to them to make their empire universal as well by sea as by land; and that is, that they should have our commerce and navigation, and through that, a mean of re-establishing their marine; this is now given into the hands of France, and the consequence seems to me inevitable.—Only one thing more, Sir, I shall notice, which is drawn from me by what has fallen from the hon. mover or seconder, and is, I believe, also to be found in the address. It is the calling of this an honourable peace. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, and all who are to talk in future upon the subject, that the less is said of the honour of the thing the better. It is, besides, highly impolitic in the hon. gentleman in another view. They are undertaking more than they are required to do.

Much as I think of national honour—esteeming it as I do the very life and soul of the politics of all great countries—I will, for the sake of argument, in the present case, lay it entirely out of the question. I will be content if the hon. gentleman will show me, that this is a safe peace. Give me safety, and I will ask nothing more. If, however, my hon. friends were driven to it by fatal necessity, it must be a sufficient justification. Whether such imperious circumstances existed, we shall hear on the day of discussion. It will certainly be wrong to condemn it prematurely; I shall therefore wait patiently for that discussion, which will clear up the matter to the satisfaction of the House.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he hoped that his right honourable friend would pardon him, if he expressed an opinion that he had gone into rather more minuteness than the question now before the House called for, even in his view of it. The observations of his right hon. friend were (he would pardon him for saying so) a little premature; that subject was not now before the House; even in his majesty's speech from the throne, there was expressed no other sentiment on the peace, but such as was conveyed by these words: That his majesty trusts the arrangement "will be found conducive to the substantial interests of this country, and honourable to the British character." In this address there was no reference whatever even to that sentiment so conveyed, from the throne. Indeed, it would be irregular and indecorous to ask of the House an opinion upon a subject not fully before it. His right hon. friend very well knew the preliminaries of peace had been signed on the part of his majesty and the French republic, but the terms were not before the House. His right hon. friend had entered into the subject of the peace, however, and had expressed some lamentation over it. He should not now follow him in answer to what he urged; although he might, in some measure, regularly do so. Nor should he enter into any dispute now upon the general proposition laid down by his right hon. friend; not because he was unprepared, but because another opportunity would offer for that purpose. He should then enter on the discussion with his right hon. friend; but he should do it under a painful feeling; for painful it was to differ in opinion from one who had proved himself to be a vir-tuous guardian of the constitution, and to whom the country was under deep obligation for many great services, particularly when he warned that country of its danger when its safety was at stake. His right hon. friend had said, that we ought to consider the extension of our commerce as the only counterbalance in our power against the extension of territory of the French republic. He would not now refer to the terms of the peace; but he would aver, that all that we had given up, would have afforded to us no sort of security against the danger which was apprehended by his right hon. friend. He did not agree with his right hon. friend on the subject of the extent of the power of France, and of our mode of balancing that power; for he thought the best counterpoise of this country, against the growing power of France, was in the preservation of our constitution. To our industry and skill, to our frugality and temperance, much was to be also confided;—to the right direction and preservation of what remained of the faculties, abilities, and resources of the country (and happily much indeed remained of such resources), much was to be looked for as a security for us in time of peace, for a continuance of its blessings. It never was in the contemplation of those who had the honour of advising his majesty to sign the preliminaries of the peace, that what they did was the effect of necessity. His right hon. friend had stated, that some unknown necessity might have been the cause—I disclaim that plea (said Mr. Addington)—I will be no party to such a statement. I do not seek my own justification, nor will my colleagues, I am persuaded, seek theirs in any such way—that would be really undervaluing the resources of our country. If instead of acceding to the terms agreed upon, and which are likewise soon to be finally settled, the enemy had made it necessary for us to continue the contest, we should, I am confident, have continued the contest; and I am confident also, that we should have proved to the world that we have still sufficient faculties and resources to maintain the honour and preserve the security of the British empire. I could not forbear saying this; for the purpose, chiefly of disclaiming that species of justification which my right hon. friend supposed to arise out of necessity. I hope my justification, and that of my colleagues, will be found in the actual state of things, in which, I trust, it will appear, we have had a prudent regard to the true interest of our country; and I aver also, that if we had not advised his majesty to conclude these terms we should not only have been wanting to our constituents, but have been guilty of a gross dereliction of our duty to his majesty.

Mr. Sheridan said:—I shall certainly vote for the address which has now been moved, because, it was not, as is usual on such occasions an exact echo of the speech from the throne. The speech contains distinctions and characters of the peace, which, if they had been re-echoed in the address, I, for one, could not have supported. The Address as it now stands does not appear liable to any great objection, and I have no wish to disturb the unanimity of our vote. Notwithstanding the unanimity, however, I sincerely believe, that if this were the time for men to deliver their opinions, there never was a period of less real unanimity. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) has spoken of the peace in terms to which I can by no means agree. I differ from him in every expression by which he characterised the peace as glorious and honourable. Still more do I differ from those who contend that it was inexpedient to make peace at all. This, Sir, is a peace which every man ought to be glad of, but no man can be proud of. It is a peace involving a degradation of the national dignity, which no truly English heart can feel with indifference. It was a peace, which the war had a tendency to lead to, as its necessary result. The war was one of the worst wars in which this country was ever engaged: and the peace is, perhaps, as good as any man could make, under the circumstances in which the country was placed.

Earl Temple, though not thinking that there was any reason to rejoice at the terms, said, he nevertheless agreed in the general sentiment of the propriety of waiving, for the present, the discussion of the terms of the preliminaries, and of supporting the Address. But in giving his support to the Address, he by no means pledged himself to support the peace, which, considering its terms, he certainly could not approve of.

Mr. James Martin concurred in approving the peace; but begged it might be understood, that neither this approbation, nor this vote, was meant to convey an idea, that he did not wish to bring to punishment those who had plunged the country into the war and brought the constitution into danger.

The motion was agreed to nem. con.

The King's Answer to the Commons' Address.] To the Address of the Commons, his Majesty returned this Answer:

"Gentlemen, I thank you for this dutiful and loyal address. The sentiments it conveys are fresh and satisfactory proofs of that attachment to my person and government, and of that regard for the honour and interests of this country, by which your conduct has been invariably distinguished."

Copy of the Convention with Russia.] Oct. 30. Lord Hawkesbury presented, by his Majesty's command, the following

TRANSLATION OF CONVENTION between his Britannic Majesty and the Emperor of Russia, signed at St. Petersburg the 5-17 June 1801.

In the Name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity.---The mutual desire of his majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, being not only to come to an understanding between themselves with respect to the differences which have lately interrupted the good understanding and friendly relations which subsisted between the two states; but also to prevent, by frank and precise explanations upon the navigation of their respective subjects, the renewal of similar altercations and troubles which might be the consequence of them; and the common object of the solicitude of their said majesties being to settle, as soon as can be done, an equitable arrangement of those differences, and an invariable determination of their principles upon the rights of neutrality, in their application to their respective monarchies, in order to unite more closely the ties of friendship and good intercourse, of which they acknowledge the utility and the benefits, have named and chosen for their plenipotentiaries; viz. his majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Alleyne lord baron Saint Helens, his said majesty's privy counsellor, and his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to his majesty the emperor of all the Russias; and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, the sieur Nikita count de Panin, his privy counsellor, minister of state for the department of foreign affairs, present chamberlain, Knight Grand Cross of the Orders of Saint Alexander Newsky, and of Saint Anne of the First Class, of that of Saint Ferdinand, and of Merit, and of the Red Eagle, and of Saint

Lazarus; who, after having communicated their respective full powers, and found them in good and due form, have agreed upon the following points and articles:

Art. 1. There shall be hereafter between his Britannic majesty and his Imperial majesty of all the Russias, their subjects, the states and countries under their dominion, good and unalterable friendship and understanding; and all the political, commercial, and other relations of common utility between the respective subjects shall subsist, as formerly, without their being disturbed or troubled in any manner whatever.

Art. 2. His Britannic majesty and the emperor of all the Russias declare, that they will watch over the most rigorous execution of the prohibitions against the trade of contraband of their subjects with the enemies of either of the high contracting parties.

Art. 3. His Britannic majesty and his Imperial majesty of all the Russias having resolved to place, under a sufficient safeguard, the freedom of commerce, and navigation of their subjects, in case one of them shall be at war, whilst the other shall be neuter, have agreed:

1. That the ships of the neutral power may navigate freely to the ports, and upon the coasts of the nations at war.

2. That the effects embarked on board neutral ships shall be free, with the exception of contraband of war, and of enemy's property; and it is agreed not to comprise, in the number of the latter, the merchandize of the produce, growth, or manufacture of the countries at war, which should have been acquired by the subjects of the neutral power, and should be transported for their account, which merchandize cannot be accepted in any case from the freedom granted to the flag of the said power.

3. That in order to avoid all equivocation and misunderstanding of what ought to be considered as contraband of war, his Britannic majesty, and his Imperial majesty of all the Russias declare, conformably to the 11th article of the treaty of commerce concluded between the two crowns, on the 10-21 February 1797, That they acknowledge as such the following objects only; viz. cannons, mortars, fire arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, balls, bullets, firelocks, flints, matches, gunpowder, saltpetre, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, sword belts, knapsacks, saddles, and bridles, excepting, however, the quantity of the said articles which may be necessary for the defence of the ship, and of those who compose the crew; and all other articles whatever, not enumerated here, shall not be reputed warlike and naval stores, nor be subject to confiscation, and of course shall pass freely, without being subjected to the smallest difficulty, unless they be considered enemy's property in the sense above specified. It is also agreed that that which is stipulated in the present article shall not be prejudicial to the particular stipulations of one or the other crown with other powers, by which objects of a similar kind should be reserved, prohibited or permitted.

4. That, in order to determine what characterizes a blockaded port, that denomination is given only to a port where there is, by the dispositions of the power which attacks it with ships stationary, or sufficiently near, an evident danger in entering.

5. That the ships of the neutral power shall not be stopped but upon just causes and evident facts: that they be tried without delay; and that the proceeding be always uniform, prompt, and legal.

In order the better to insure the respect due to these stipulations, dictated by the sincere desire of conciliating every interest, and to give a new proof of their uprightness and love of justice, the high contracting parties enter here into the most formal engagement to renew the severest prohibitions to their captains, whether of ships of war, or merchantmen, to take, keep, or conceal, on board their ships, any of the objects which, in the terms of the present convention may be reputed contraband, and respectively to take care of the execution of the orders which they shall have published in their admiralties, and wherever it shall be necessary.

Art. 4. The two high contracting parties, wishing also to prevent all subject of dissension in future, by limiting the right of search of merchant ships going under convoy to those cases only in which the belligerent power might experience a real prejudice by the abuse of the neutral flag, have agreed,

1. That the right of searching merchant ships belonging to the subjects of one of the contracting parties, and navigating under convey of a ship of war of the said power, shall only be exercised by ships of war of the belligerent party, and shall never extend to letters of marque, privateers, or other vessels, which do not belong to the royal or imperial fleets of their majesties, but which their subjects shall have fitted out for war.

2. That the proprietors of all merchant ships belonging to the subjects of one of the contracting sovereigns, which shall be destined to sail under convoy of a ship of war, shall be required, before they receive their sailing orders, to produce to the commander of the convoy their passports and certificates, or sea letters, in the form annexed to the present treaty.

3. That when such ship of war, having under convoy merchant ships, shall be met with by a ship or ships of war, of the other contracting party, who shall then be in a state of war, in order to avoid all disorder, they shall keep out of cannon shot, unless the state of the sea, or the place of meeting, render a nearer approach necessary; and the commander of the ship of the belligerent power shall send a boat on board the convoy, where they shall proceed reciprocally to the verification of the papers and certificates that are to prove on one part, that the ship of war is authorized to take under its escort such or such merchant ships of its nation, laden with such a cargo, and for such a port; on the other part, that the ship of war of the belligerent party belongs to the royal or imperial fleet of their majesties.

4. This verification made, there shall be no pretence for any search, if the papers are found in form, and if there exists no good motive for suspicion. In the contrary case, the commander of the neutral ship of war (being duly required thereto by the commander of the ship or ships of war of the belligerent power) is to bring to, and detain his convoy during the time necessary for the search of the ships which compose it, and he shall have the faculty of naming and delegating one or more officers to assist at the search of the said ships, which shall be done in his presence on board each merchant ship, conjointly with one or more officers appointed by the commander of the ship of the belligerent party.

5. If it happens that the commander of the ship or ships of the power at war, having examined the papers found on board, and having interrogated the master and crew of the ship, shall see just and sufficient reason to detain the merchant ship, in order to proceed to an ulterior search, he shall notify such intention to the commander of the convoy, who shall have the power to order an officer to remain on board the ship thus detained, and to assist at the examination of the cause of her detention. The merchant ships shall be carried immediately to the nearest and most convenient port belonging to the belligerent power, and the ulterior search shall be carried on with all possible diligence.

Art. 5. It is in like manner agreed, that if any merchant ship, thus convoyed, should be detained without just and sufficient cause, the commander of the ship or ships of war of the belligerent power shall not only be bound to make to the owners of the ship and of the cargo a full and perfect compensation for all the losses, expenses, damages, and costs, occasioned by such a detention, but shall moreover undergo an ulterior punishment for every act of violence or other fault which he may have committed, according as the nature of the case may require. On the other hand, the convoying ship shall not be permitted, under any pretext whatsoever, to resist by force the detention of the merchant ship or ships of war of the belligerent power; an obligation to which the commander of a ship of war with convoy is not bound to observe towards letters of marque and privateers.

Art. 6. The high contracting parties shall give precise and efficacious orders, that the judgments upon prizes made at sea shall be conformable with the rules of the most exact justice and equity; that they shall be given by judges above suspicion, and who shall not be interested in the affair in question. The government of the respective states shall take care that the said decisions shall be speedily and duly executed, according to the forms prescribed, and, in case of an unfounded detention, or other contravention to the regulations stipulated by the present article, the owners of such ship and cargo shall be allowed damages proportioned to the loss occasioned thereby. The rules to observe for these damages, and for the case of unfounded detention, as also the principles to follow for the purpose of accelerating the process shall be the matter of additional articles, which the contracting parties agree to settle between them, and which shall have the same force and validity as if they were inserted in the present act. For this effect, their Britannic and Imperial majesties mutually engage to put their hand to the salutary work which may serve for the completion of these stipulations, and to communicate to each other without delay, the views which may be suggested to them by their equal solicitude to prevent the least grounds for dispute in future.

Art. 7. To obviate all the inconveniences which may arise from the bad faith of those who avail themselves of the flag of a nation without belonging to it, it is agreed to establish, for an invariable rule, that any vessel whatever, in order to be considered as the property of the country the flag of which it carries, must have on board the captain of the ship, and one half of the crew, of the people of that country, and the papers and passports in due and perfect form; but every vessel which shall not observe this rule, and which shall infringe the ordinances published on that head, shall lose all rights to the protection of the contracting powers.

Art. 8. The principles and measures adopted by the present act shall be alike applicable to all the maritime wars in which one of the two powers may be engaged, whilst the other remains neutral. These stipulations shall in consequence be regarded as permanent, and shall serve for a constant rule to the contracting powers in matters of commerce and navigation.

Art. 9. His majesty the king of Denmark and his majesty the king of Sweden, shall be immediately invited by his Imperial majesty, in the name of the two contracting parties, to accede to the present convention, and at the same time to renew and confirm their respective treaties of commerce with his Britannic majesty; and his said majesty engages, by acts which shall have established that agreement, to render and restore to each of these powers all the prizes that have been taken from them, as well as the territories and countries under their dominion, which have been conquered by the arms of his Britannic majesty since the rupture, in the state in which those possessions were found at the period at which the troops of his Britannic majesty entered them. The orders of his said majesty, for the restitution of those prizes and conquests, shall be immediately expedited after the exchange of the ratifications of the acts by which Sweden and Denmark shall accede to the present treaty.

Art. 10. The present convention shall be ratified by the two contracting parties, and the ratifications exchanged at St. Petersburg in the space of two months at farthest, from the day of the signature.

In faith of which the respective plenipotentiaries have caused to be made two copies thereof, perfectly similar, signed with their hands; and have caused the seal of their arms to be affixed thereto.—Done at Saint Petersburg, the 5-17 June 1801.

FORMULA of the PASSPORTS and SEA LETTERS which are to be delivered in the respective admiralties of the states of the Two High Contracting Parties, to the ships and vessels which shall sail from them, conformable to Article 4, of the present treaty.

Be it known, that we have given leave and permission to N—, of the city or place of N—, master and conductor of the ship N—, belonging to N—, of the port of N—, of N— tons or thereabouts, now lying in the port or harbour of N—, to sail from thence to N—, laden with N—, on account of N—, after the said ship shall have been visited before its departure, in the usual manner by the officers appointed for that purpose; and the said N—, or such other as shall be vested with powers to replace him, shall be obliged to produce in every port or harbour which he shall enter with the said vessel, to the officers of the place, the present license, and to carry the flag of N— during his voyage.—In faith of which, &c.

TRANSLATION of First Separate Article of the Convention between his Majesty and the Emperor of Russia.

The pure and magnanimous intentions of his majesty the emperor of all the Russias having already induced him to restore the vessels and goods of British subjects, which had been sequestered in Russia, his said majesty confirms that disposition in its whole extent; and his Britannic majesty engages himself also to give immediate orders for taking off all sequestration laid upon the Russian, Danish, and Swedish properties, detained in English ports; and to prove still more his sincere desire to terminate amicably the differences which have arisen between Great Britain and the northern courts, and in order that no new incident may throw obstacles in the way of this salutary work, his Britannic majesty binds himself to give orders to the commanders of his forces by land and sea, that the armistice, now subsisting with the courts of Denmark and Sweden, shall be prolonged for a term of three months, from the date of this day; and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, guided by the same motives, undertakes, in the name of his allies, to have this armistice maintained during the said term.

This separate article shall have the same force and validity, as if it were inserted word for word in the treaty signed this day; and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at the same time.

TRANSLATION of Second Separate Article of the Convention between his Majesty and the Emperor of Russia.

The differences and misunderstandings which subsisted between his majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, being thus terminated, and the precautions taken by the present convention not giving further room to fear that they can in future disturb the harmony and good understanding which the two high contracting parties have at heart to consolidate, their said majesties confirm anew, by the present convention, the treaty of commerce of the 10-21 February 1797, of which all the stipulations are here cited, to be maintained in their whole extent. This separate article shall have the same force and validity as if it were inserted word for word in the treaty signed this day; and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at the same time.

In faith of which the respective plenipotentiaries have caused to be made two copies thereof, perfectly similar, signed with their hands; and have caused the seal of their arms to be affixed thereto.—Done at Saint Petersburg, the 5-17 June 1801.

TRANSLATION of the Declaration of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the Emperor of Russia.

Although the magnanimous intention of his imperial majesty of all the Russias to do full and entire justice to those British subjects who have suffered losses during the troubles which have disturbed the good intelligence between his empire and Great Britain, be already proved by facts, his imperial majesty, consulting solely his good faith, has moreover authorized the undersigned plenipotentiary to declare, as he does declare, by these presents :

“ That all the ships, the merchandize, and the property of British subjects, which had been sequestrated during the last reign in Russia, shall not only be faithfully restored to the said British subjects, or to their agents, but also that for the effects which may have been alienated in such a manner as to render it impossible for them to be restored in kind, a suitable equivalent shall be granted to the proprietors, which equivalent shall be hereafter determined according to the rules of equity.”

In faith of which we, plenipotentiary of his Imperial majesty of all the Russias, have signed the present declaration; and have caused the seal of our arms to be affixed thereto.—Done at Saint Petersburg, the 5-17th June 1801.

COPY OF PRELIMINARY ARTICLES OF PEACE between HIS MAJESTY and the FRENCH REPUBLIC; signed at London the 1st of October 1801.

His majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the first consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, being animated with an equal desire of putting an end to the calamities of a destructive war, and of re-establishing union and good understanding between the two countries, have named for this purpose; namely, his Britannic majesty, the right honourable Robert Banks Jenkinson, commonly called lord Hawkesbury, one of his Britannic majesty's most honourable privy council, and his principal secretary of state for foreign affairs; and the first consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, citizen Lewis William Otto, commissary for the exchange of French prisoners in England; who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers, in good form, have agreed on the following preliminary articles:

Art. 1. As soon as the preliminaries shall be signed and ratified, sincere friendship shall be re-established between his Britannic majesty and the French republic, by sea and by land, in all parts of the world; and in order that all hostilities may cease immediately between the two powers, and between them and their allies respectively, the necessary instructions shall be sent, with the utmost dispatch, to the commanders of the sea and land forces of the respective states; and each of the contracting parties engages to grant passports, and every facility requisite to accelerate the arrival and ensure the execution of these orders. It is farther agreed, that all conquests which may have been made by either of the contracting parties from the other, or from their respective allies, subsequently to the ratification of the present preliminaries, shall be considered as of no effect, and shall be faithfully comprehended in the restitutions to be made after the ratification of the definitive treaty.

Art. 2. His Britannic majesty shall restore to the French republic and her allies; namely, to his Catholic majesty, and to the Batavian republic, all the possessions and colonies occupied or conquered by the English forces in the course of the present war, with the exception of the island of Trinidad, and the Dutch possessions in the island of Ceylon; of which island and possessions his Britannic majesty reserves to himself the full and entire sovereignty.

Art. 3. The port of the Cape of Good Hope shall be open to the commerce and navigation of the two contracting parties, who shall enjoy therein the same advantages.

Art. 4. The island of Malta, with its dependencies, shall be evacuated by the troops of his Britannic majesty, and restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem. For the purpose of rendering this island completely independent of either of the two contracting parties, it shall be placed under the guarantee and protection of a third power, to be agreed upon in the definitive treaty.

Art. 5. Egypt shall be restored to the Sublime Porte, whose territories and possessions shall be preserved entire, such as they existed previously to the present war.

Art. 6. The territories and possessions of her most faithful majesty shall likewise be preserved entire.

Art. 7. The French forces shall evacuate the kingdom of Naples and the Roman territory. The English forces shall in like manner evacuate Porto Ferrajo; and, generally, all the ports and islands which they may occupy in the Mediterranean or in the Adriatic.

Art. 8. The republic of the Seven Islands shall be acknowledged by the French republic.

Art. 9. The evacuations, cessations, and restitutions, stipulated for by the present preliminary articles, shall take place in Europe within one month; in the continent and seas of America and of Africa, within three months; and in the continent and seas of Asia, within six months after the ratification of the definitive treaty.

Art. 10. The prisoners made respectively shall, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the definitive treaty, all be restored, and without ransom, on paying reciprocally the debts which they may have individually contracted. Discussions having arisen respecting the payment for the maintenance of prisoners of war, the contracting powers reserve this question to be settled by the definitive treaty, according to the law of nations, and in conformity to established usage.

Art. 11. In order to prevent all causes of complaint and dispute which may arise on account of prizes which may be made at sea after the signature of the preliminary articles, it is reciprocally agreed that the vessels and effects which may be taken in the British channel and in the North seas, after the space of twelve days, to be computed from the exchange of the ratifications of the present preliminary articles, shall be restored on each side; that the term shall be one month, from the British channel and the North seas, as far as the Canary islands inclusively, whether in the Ocean or in the Mediterranean; two months, from the said Canary islands as far as the equator; and lastly, five months in all other parts of the world, without any exception, or any more particular description of time or place.

Art. 12. All sequestrations imposed by either of the parties on the funded property, revenues, or debts, of any description, belonging to either of the contracting powers, or to their subjects, or citizens, shall be taken off immediately after the signature of the definitive treaty. The decision of all claims brought forward by individuals of the one country against individuals of the other, for private rights, debts, property, or effects whatsoever, which, according to received usages and the law of nations, ought to revive at the period of peace, shall be heard and decided before the competent tribunals; and in all cases, prompt and ample justice shall be administered in the countries where the claims are made. It is agreed, moreover, that this article, immediately after the ratification of the definitive treaty, shall apply to the allies of the contracting parties, and to the individuals of the respective nations, upon the condition of a just reciprocity.

Art. 13. With respect to the fisheries on the coasts of the island of Newfoundland, and of the islands adjacent, and in the gulph of Saint Lawrence, the two parties have agreed to restore them to the same footing on which they were before the present war; reserving to themselves the power of making in the definitive treaty, such arrangements as shall appear just and reciprocally useful, in order to place the fishing of the two nations on the most proper footing for the maintenance of peace.

Art. 14. In all the cases of restitution agreed upon by the present treaty, the fortifications shall be delivered up in the state in which they may be at the time of the signature of the present treaty; and all the works which shall have been constructed since the occupation shall remain untouched.

It is farther agreed, that in all the cases of cession stipulated in the present treaty, there shall be allowed to the inhabitants, of whatever condition or nation they may be, a term of three years, to be computed from the notification of the definitive treaty of peace, for the purpose of disposing of their properties acquired and possessed either before or during the present war; in the which term of three years they may have the free exercise of their religion, and enjoyment of their property.

The same privilege shall be granted in the countries restored, to all those who shall have made therein any establishments whatsoever, during the time when those countries were in the possession of Great Britain.

With respect to the other inhabitants of the countries restored, or ceded, it is agreed, that none of them shall be prosecuted, disturbed, or molested, in their persons or properties, under any pretext, on account of their conduct or political opinions, or of their attachment to either of the two powers, nor on any other account except that of debts contracted to individuals, or on account of acts posterior to the definitive treaty.

Art. 15. The present preliminary articles shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged in London, in the space of fifteen days, for all delay; and immediately after their ratification, plenipotentiaries shall be named, on each side, who shall repair to Amiens for the purpose of concluding a definitive treaty of peace, in concert with the allies of the contracting parties.

In witness whereof, we, the undersigned plenipotentiaries of his Britannic majesty, and of the first consul of the French republic, by virtue of our respective full powers, have signed the present preliminary articles, and have caused our seals to be put thereto.— Done at London the 1st day of October, 1801, the ninth Vendemiaire, year ten of the French republic.

Vote of Thanks to Sir James Saumarez, &c. &c.] Oct. 30. The following Resolutions were moved, in the Lords, by earl St. Vincent, supported by lord Nelson, and agreed to nem. diss. 1. "That the Thanks of this House be given to rear admiral sir James Saumarez, baronet, knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, for his alacrity and zeal in pursuing, and his able and gallant conduct in the successful attack on the combined squadron of the enemy, in the Straits of Gibraltar, on the 12th and 13th days of July last, by the squadron under his orders. 2. That the thanks of this House be given to the captains and officers of the squadron under the orders of the said rear admiral, for their gallant conduct on that occasion; and that the rear admiral be desired to signify the same to them. 3. That this House doth highly approve of, and acknowledge, the services of the seamen and marines on board the ships under the orders of the said rear-admiral in the late successful attack on the combined squadron of the enemy; and that the captains of the several ships be desired to signify the same to their respective crews, and to thank them for their gallant behaviour."

The same Resolutions were also moved in the Commons, by the chancellor of the exchequer, and agreed to nem. con.

Debate in the Commons on the Preliminaries of Peace with France.] Nov. 3. The order of the day being read, the House proceeded to take into consideration the Preliminary Articles of Peace between his Majesty and the French Republic, signed at London the 1st of October 1801. And the said Preliminary Articles being read,

Sir Edmund Hartopp rose to move an Address of Thanks to his Majesty for his gracious communication relative to the signature of the Preliminaries of peace with the French republic; and he was emboldened to hope for the unanimous concurrence of the House, from the universal applause with which the peace had been received throughout the kingdom. For his own part, he could not help contemplating the event with exultation, as having put an end to one of the most arduous wars that this country had ever been engaged in. The zeal and unanimity with which the contest (purely defensive on our part) had been commenced and pursued, were, he thought, beyond all example; and when the numerous difficulties which ministers had to encounter were taken into consideration, their conduct entitled them to the approbation of the country. It was their arduous task to protect the state from the destructive machinations of hideous Jacobinism; the doctrines of whose disciples went to the entire subversion of our constitution, our government, and our laws, while they aided the inordinate ambition of the enemy to extend their power to every quarter of the globe. To guard against these fearful consequences, was the duty of ministers; and in the attainment of this great object, it was indispensably necessary to have recourse to continental alliances. The first impression made upon the principal powers of Europe, was nearly the same as that upon which Great Britain had acted. With them, therefore, we entered into concert, in defence of the common cause; and had the same zeal and perseverance distinguished their conduct as had characterised that of the British sovereign, no disappointment of views would, in all human probability have taken place. The revolutionary principles which had been so industriously propagated in this country, had threatened the existence of our happy constitution. By the laudable exertions, however, of his majesty's ministers, those dangers had been averted; Jacobinism itself had been laid prostrate in the dust: and this country, in common with the rest of Europe, was henceforward to enjoy the blessings of peace. We had happily preserved our constitution, in church and in state; we had extended our dominion in every quarter: and our extended territories in the East and West Indies had derived a security which left no ground of alarm for the permanency of the manifold advantages which they would produce. The islands of Ceylon and Trinidad, in point of locality and commercial benefit, would prove of incalculable advantage to this country. The moderation and sound policy, which, on the part of his majesty's ministers, had distinguished the late negotiation, effectually rescued their conduct from the imputation of rapacity or injustice, while the territory that we had acquired by the event was calculated to produce lasting benefit. The defection of our continental allies had left us as much unconnected with the continent as we were before the war; while the enemy had extended their territory and revenue so far as to render any further prosecution of the contest not only inexpedient, but hopeless. Under these circumstances, Austria was naturally induced to enter into a treaty with France, and thus ceased, of course, the war upon the continent. Deserted now by that ally, upon whose exertions we had placed the greatest reliance, there remained no hope of compelling the enemy to retire within the ancient limits of their territory. Measures of peace on our part, were then wisely resorted to; and the temper and moderation which distinguished the whole of the negotiation, were deserving of the utmost praise. By this generous conduct we held out to Europe an illustrious example of honour and of good faith, which would not fail to prove highly beneficial to our interests and our reputation. Upon these grounds he gave the measure of peace his cordial support, and should conclude with moving the following Address:

"Most Gracious Sovereign; We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your Majesty our most humble thanks for having been graciously pleased to lay before us a copy of the preliminaries of peace, which have been ratified by your Majesty and the French republic. We assure your Majesty, that having taken them into our most serious consideration, we reflect, with heartfelt gratitude, on the fresh proof which has been afforded, on this occasion, of your Majesty's paternal care for the welfare and happiness of your people; and contemplate with great satisfaction the prospect of a definitive treaty of peace, founded on conditions, which, whilst they manifest your Majesty's wisdom, moderation, and good faith, will, we trust, be productive of consequences highly advantageous to the substantial interests of the British empire."

Mr. Lee (member for Dungarvon) seconded the motion. His business, in the first place, should be to consider what were the objects of the war now so happily terminated, and whether any of those objects had been obtained by the peace. If the war had been undertaken with a view to reduce France to foreign subjection, to restore royalty to that country, or to force a government upon the people, it should have received his decided opposition. He had ever considered that it was a war of aggression on the part of France, and of self-preservation on that of this country. To show that this was the case it was necessary to advert to a declaration of the French government, in February 1792, that a treaty hostile to France had been entered into by certain continental powers, to which England had been invited to become a party, but refused to accede to it. Had England consented to enter into that confederacy, the war would have been altogether unjustifiable on her part; but this, it was well known, was not the case. When, in the same year, the king of France declared his acceptance of the new constitution, the same was announced by him to the several monarchs of Europe, and the answer of his Britannic majesty proved his determination not to interfere with the internal concerns of France. But what was the conduct of France at this time towards Great Britain? It was at that very period that her numerous emissaries appeared in England and Ireland. He wished to bury in oblivion the consideration of the melancholy consequences that resulted from their designs on the sister country but these circumstances were too recent and too dreadful to be hastily forgotten. The addresses from some of the British societies and manufacturing towns to the government of France breathed an obvious spirit of revolution and were cordially received by the enemy. In so doing, did not France interfere with our internal government? Had we been disposed to have entered into the war at that time, sufficient grounds had been afforded; and our forbearance bespoke the reluctance with which the intention was entertained. When, at length, by the aggression of France, we were forced to become parties in the war, we found Austria and Prussia united against France, upon principles evidently opposite to those upon which we had entered; for their objects were certainly hostile to the existing order of things in that country, while ours was purely that of self-preservation. Notwithstanding these circumstances, it became our interest to avail ourselves of their support. Before the invasion of Holland took place, the only principle of Great Britain was that of self-preservation; but, after that event, we had to prevent the aggrandizement of France, and to protect our ally. It happened, unfortunately that notwithstanding the effectual assistance which was afforded that country, although the enemy were completely driven back to their own frontiers, the emissaries of Jacobinism were eminently successful; and the people, instead of uniting in support of their own independence, bound themselves in strict alliance with France. Thus did the machinations of the Jacobinical factions procure that which the force of arms could not effect.—Our next great object was, the destruction of the enemy's commerce, as a means of bringing them to reasonable terms. For this purpose we directed our attention to the Western world. An able general, sir Charles Grey, directed our troops; and the naval department of the expedition was under the orders of that brave and skilful admiral lord St. Vincent. The enemy's colonies in that quarter were, by the prompt exertions of these distinguished officers, speedily reduced; and the fruits of their successes contributed greatly to the subsequent prosperity of our naval arms. After this event, our next object was, to render the war, as much as possible, of a naval description; and never, surely, had the exertions of this or any other country proved so glorious. During the American war, a northern confederacy existed similar to that with which we had lately to contend. We then wished to check the refractory spirit of those powers; but the circumstances of the moment did not permit us to make the attempt. What we had not then the power to effect, we have since accomplished. The ministry of that day were of opinion, that it was inexpedient and hazardous to make the attempt, and therefore the question in dispute remained undecided. At length, however, the so-much-wished-for decision has taken place; and the claims which we have substantiated are of such a nature, that they can be abandoned only with the naval superiority of the country. The unexampled success of our naval exertions had so increased our commercial advantages as to enable us to pay the most heavy taxes, and to support throughout, the glory of the British character. We had acted on such principles as had laid the foundation of a maritime code more advantageous than any that had ever before existed, while we had extended our territories in every quarter. From the time that we lost America, we had turned our attention to the East Indies. In the late war, although aggrandizement formed originally no object of it, yet such a principle became necessary, from the progress which the enemy had made in the extension of their territory. The king of Mysore, instigated by France, had become formidable to us, and his proceedings were such that we had found ourselves under the necessity of adopting measures effectually to check his career. This was the only Indian power which was in alliance with France; and the success of our exertions has deprived her of it. We either possess or control the whole of the Mysorean territory; and while we had obtained this great addition to our territory, we had tranquillized and rendered friendly the native princes of that quarter of the world. While we thus extended our dominions on the continent of India, we had rendered them still more secure by the acquisition of the island of Ceylon, the best of all the Dutch colonies. In the West Indies we had also received a material acquisition in the possession of Trinidad. Being contiguous to North and South America, it opened a mart for our manufactures, that must prove eminently beneficial to us. This acquisition was important also, from the consideration of France having added the whole of St. Domingo to her territories in the West Indies, against which, he doubted not, the island of Trinidad would prove a sufficient balance. In the progress of the war, we had amply shown, that our principle was not aggrandizement, but security. Finding, however, that France was making extensive acquisitions, it became necessary for us to keep pace with her. If France had acquired an extent of sea-coast in Flanders, England had obtained a far greater extent of additional coast in Asia, highly advantageous in a commercial as well as territorial point of view. In the progress of the war, notwithstanding our successes, every opportunity had been embraced to effect the return of peace. In the first instance, we offered to restore the whole of our conquests in favour of the interests of our allies; but this proposal was rejected. In the negotiation at Lisle, we had also agreed to a retrocession of nearly an equal extent, it being then the determination of ministers to retain only the island of Ceylon and the Cape of Good Hope. He was at a loss, therefore, to conceive how those gentlemen who at that time approved of the terms proposed by lord Malmesbury, could, with any degree of consistency, dissent from the preliminary conditions now before the House. The noble lord (Grenville), who signed all the papers of instruction in the case of the treaty of Lisle, he anticipated, from some particular circumstances, would oppose the present treaty; and if so, his lordship would find himself called upon to say how he could agree to the terms proposed at Lisle, and disapprove of those now under the consideration of parliament. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Windham), he understood, also meant to dissent from the present treaty; but, upon what grounds, it was extremely difficult to conjecture; he too, having been a member of the cabinet during the negotiations at Lisle. As he was bound by his oath to support the interests of his country, he could not have approved of the terms offered at Lisle without being convinced that they were beneficial to the state; and if they were, he could not consistently dissent from the present treaty, which included the possessions of the valuable islands of Ceylon and Trinidad. If he disapproved of the terms in the former case, he was convinced he would have thrown up his situation rather than continue in office, when measures contrary to his sense and judgment were adopted; for, on a recent occasion (the Catholic question), he had acted precisely in that manner; and he was ready to give the right hon. gentleman every credit for the purity of his intentions and the rectitude of his conduct. The probability, therefore, was, that he did not disapprove of the terms proposed at Lisle; and if so, it remained for him to reconcile his conduct on that occasion with his opposition to the present measure.—With respect to the other articles of the treaty, they were nearly the same as those of the negotiations at Lisle. It might, perhaps, be asked, whether we had obtained any of the objects of the war? His answer would be, that we undoubtedly had. We had preserved our constitution, and had laid the foundation of an increase of commercial prosperity to the country. In the prosecution of the war, it necessarily became a struggle of conquest; but the use we had made of our acquisitions was the best proof of the moderation and justice of our intentions. The only objection which certain gentlemen could form to the terms of the treaty was, that we consented to neutralise instead of retaining the Cape of Good Hope. But was this an object which should have induced ministers to continue the war for another campaign? and so, he would ask, what that consequence was likely to prove? was there any probability of a protraction of the war enabling us to obtain better terms? If, with the assistance of the principal powers of the continent, we were unable to drive the enemy within their ancient limits, how could we do so when we stood unassisted and alone? But, it might be asked, where was the security for the continuance of the peace? His answer should be, that it was equally the interest of France and of this country to preserve a system of pacification. Both had gained by the war, and their several objects being attained, neither could have any reason to renew the contest. Another argument might be advanced with respect to the stability of the existing government of France; but whether the present order of things continued, or the colossal power of the republic tumbled to pieces, in either case it could properly be no concern of ours; we had no right to interfere in the internal concerns of that or any other foreign country. The present government of France was more powerful than that of any of the Bourbons; and if the people were satisfied, it was not our business to endeavour to make them otherwise, by telling them that they were ruled by a military government. Whether we formed treaties with the Buonapartés, or with the Bourbons, was of very little consequence to us; and as to the fidelity of treaties, he considered it as a mere chimera, as it only had influence as long as the contracting parties considered it to be beneficial to their interests. This was the undisguised language of a former emperor of Morocco, who said that he broke treaties the moment it was his interest so to do. Other monarchs, the emperor added, endeavoured to throw the blame on each other; but he took all the credit of the transaction to himself. The spirit of the former part of this declaration, he was persuaded, actuated almost every modern court; and hence any argument of the description alluded to would weigh but little in his estimation. The war was commenced, on our part, for the preservation of our constitution; the object had been answered, and peace was therefore advisable. The constitution of England was purchased with the blood and treasure of our ancestors. It had been handed down to us as a sacred charge, and it was our duty to preserve it inviolate for our posterity. Mr. Lee next adverted to the national debt. At the close of the American war, it was 237,000,000*l.*, and at present it amounted to between four and five hundred millions; but at the former period, we had no means of paying off the debt. From the sinking fund the country had derived manifest advantages. By means of this fund, the gradual payment of the national debt was provided for. If the peace continued seventy-three years, the whole of the debt would be cleared off. On the whole, he considered the present peace as the best that could possibly have been obtained under all the circumstances of the case.

Lord Leveson Gower could not agree, that any gentleman who was friendly to the terms offered at Lisle, was necessarily bound to give his approbation to the present preliminaries. At the time lord Malmesbury went to Lisle, the situation of this country was very different from what it was at the present moment. A short time before that negotiation commenced the Bank had stopped payment, and commercial credit had received a most violent shock, a spirit of dangerous insubordination existed in our fleet, and the funds had fallen so low as almost to give birth to despair of the future resources of the country. In Ireland, symptoms of violent disaffection had been displayed, and communications were held with the enemy for the purpose of overthrowing the government. The navy of the enemy was then nearly equal to our own; in the North sea, we were inferior in point of numbers; and in the Mediterranean, not a British frigate was to be seen. But how changed was the present aspect of affairs! Credit and commerce had risen to the utmost pitch of splendour. Ireland was for ever secured to us by the act of Union. Our fleet was in a state of the most excellent discipline, and the spirit of our sailors was elated by the remembrance of the brilliant victories in which they had shared. Such was our state now, contrasted with what it was at the time when lord Malmesbury had negotiated at Lisle. Gentlemen seemed to forget that the cessions now made were infinitely greater than those proposed in that negotiation. We were, in addition to the possessions then proposed to be ceded, now to give up Minorca, Surinam, Porto Ferrajo, and Malta. And what had we obtained in recompence for such liberality of restitution? By the terms proposed at Lisle, the integrity of Portugal was expressly stipulated for, on the footing it stood previous to the war; whereas, we now pretended to guarantee this integrity after Portugal had purchased her own peace by humiliation and sacrifices. The terms of the preliminaries were, he confessed, far below his expectations, yet he was not disposed to give a vote against the peace. Peace was an object for which he was heartily joyful, and he was not now prepared peremptorily to assert that it could have been obtained on better terms. The peace, such as it was, had excited universal joy throughout the country, and having himself witnessed this joy, he could not consent to vote against it, though he had thought it his duty to throw out these observations.

Lord Hawkesbury rose and said:—I rise, Sir, at this early hour of the debate, in consequence of the observations which have fallen from my noble friend, and in order to explain, I trust, to the satisfaction of the House, the motives which induced his majesty's ministers to enter into a negotiation with the French republic, and to conclude the preliminaries of the treaty submitted this night to its consideration. The very reasons urged by my noble friend against the nature and terms of the treaty, tend, in my opinion, most directly and strongly to evince their propriety, and their claim to the approbation of the country. He has compared the project as proposed by lord Grenville at Lisle with the articles of the present adjustment—a mode of proceeding unwarranted by the fair consideration of both in their various relations; and he has assimilated things between which no comparison can exist. I state in positive terms, that they cannot be compared; for no man will venture to deny that lord Grenville would have been glad to have taken less from the government of France than he demanded at that period of negotiation. After nine years effusion of blood—after contracting an increase of debt to the amount of nearly 200 millions—after the indefatigable and uninterrupted exertions of the country—but, at the same time, after a series of the most splendid achievements and unexampled successes, there is not a man in the kingdom who must not admit that peace was a most desirable attainment, was the object of his sincerest wishes and most ardent desires. But, notwithstanding the hope and zeal with which all must have looked and laboured for the restoration of tranquillity, I solemnly disclaim the plea which has been set up by some persons—the plea of over-ruling necessity. I am sure, that such a cause for the conclusion of the preliminary treaty will not be traced to any thing like satisfactory grounds. I am desirous that his majesty's ministers should, in the adoption of that measure, be tried by those reasons in which the war originated, by which it was carried on, and which were found to exist when the contest ceased.

In saying thus much, I am, Sir, aware that the peace, however eligible, however adequate to the relative state of this country and of France, however it can be justified upon the principles of sound policy, is not free of all evil, of all chance, of all risk or danger. But let me ask, what event has taken place in the recollection of all who hear me, or what event may yet take place, in accounting for which it has been or will be possible to remove every objection? I do not attempt to pledge myself for the security which the peace will give to this country, or to be responsible for the stability of the treaty; but, under all the circumstances in which we were situated, I maintain that it is honourable and advantageous; and the question now for the decision of the House is, Whether his majesty's ministers have been to blame or not? In the consideration of this question, gentlemen will not, I am persuaded, lose sight of the relative state of the two countries, nor hesitate to examine whether better terms could have been obtained. Some persons object to the peace, because they contend that the end of the contest is not gained. They argue, that the war was undertaken with the view of destroying republicanism, and stopping the progress of the revolution. I maintain, on the contrary, that the destruction of republicanism was not its object; and that no interference in the internal concerns of France was intended. Such statements I absolutely disclaim; and declare, on the contrary, that the country was forced into the war by the conduct of France. It was she who interfered in the affairs of other nations; who took part and direction in the internal regulations of all countries; who, both openly and by her agents and intrigues, propagated disaffection, sedition, anarchy, and revolt. The revolution was a torrent so dreadful and violent in its origin and progress, that no man, or set of men, could entertain a hope of checking its impetuosity; but if we had opposed it, even in its fatal and almost irresistible course with some success; if we had rendered it less dangerous in its effects than it would otherwise have been; if we had, at least changed its direction, and made it flow in a channel less dangerous to the general happiness and interests of the world, I trust, that some acknowledgment is due to the wisdom, vigilance, and perseverance of government, as well as to the spirit and exertions of the country. It is, indeed, impossible to look at the present state of France without being convinced that we have at least effected this important change; a change which is manifest to the most superficial observer, in the manners, the opinions, the habits of the people of France. Let those who pretend to doubt the justice of this observation, look to the state of France as it was in 1793, and as it is in 1801. Let them compare the striking alteration which has taken place in the manners, opinions, and habits to which I have alluded, and then give me a candid answer. If after this comparison—if after all that has been done, I am called upon to deliver my opinion with respect to the moral evils of peace, I must say I feel, under all the circumstances of the present moment, that they are certainly less than on any former occasion. With regard to the continuance of hostilities, there are two considerations by which we are to be regulated; the first is, whether we possessed the power of forming another coalition against France; and the second, if we continued the war, what harm could France do to us, and what harm could we do to France? The first coalition had failed; the second had equally failed; and had we any satisfactory grounds to make us hazard another experiment of the same nature? What was the probability of forming a new coalition in the least degree likely to be of service to the powers of the continent, or to this country in particular? It was altogether impossible to find in Europe the elements of such a combination of force directed to the attainment of one grand end. Were they to be found in Germany? Were they to be found in Prussia? Were they to be found in Russia? I ask, then, what was the prospect of success that could be derived from a third confederacy against France? And if, therefore, it be evident that no coalition could be formed, I ask what object could we possibly have under that point of view, in the further prosecution of hostilities? Where was it possible for us, with our immense superiority by sea, to affect France by striking a fatal blow? The fact was, that neither power could affect the other.

These remarks, Sir, I have made with a view of showing the inefficacy of any new coalition against the French republic, as well as the inefficacy of the continuance of the war between her and this country. In discussing the preliminary articles of peace, there are three considerations which press strongly upon my mind; I mean the time, the tone, and the terms of the treaty. And first, with respect to the time at which the treaty was signed. It was concluded under a just impression of your success; it was concluded at a moment when your triumphs were complete. Such a time was worthy of the country to accelerate the important work of pacification. Would it have been prudent to have pushed matters to an extreme point? In the hour of victory it became the spirit and magnanimity of the government and the people, to listen to the voice of peace; and if the terms appeared advantageous, I have fair grounds to presume that a more glorious opportunity could not present itself. In speaking of the tone in which the peace has been concluded, it is sufficient for me to observe, that it is marked with a tone of dignity and independence; that the honour of the nation has been preserved; and that every idea of humiliation has been resisted with success, both with respect to ourselves and our allies. When I come to an examination of the terms of the treaty, I must disclaim the support, and condemn the opinions, of those who have been accustomed to undervalue the resources of this country, and to extol those of the enemy. The circumstances under which we were, as opposed to the enemy, have been essentially different, and it is in that difference that the best reasons for concluding a peace will be found. But first, Sir, it may not be improper to call the attention of gentlemen to our conduct towards our allies; and particularly to the strict maintenance of that good faith for which we have been so eminently distinguished. The first power which I have occasion to mention is the Ottoman Porte, whose territories and dominions are to be restored and maintained in their integrity, as they were before the war. An instance of our generosity, as well as of our good faith, must not however be passed over; I allude to the release which we gave to those powers connected with us, from express and positive stipulations, when they were exposed by the necessity of the moment to danger from continuing faithful to their engagements. To Portugal every protection has been given, consistent with our strength and her interests; and in the case of Naples we displayed a magnanimity which we might have been justified in omitting. Naples was called upon by France to exclude our shipping from her ports; but she went further, and joined in an alliance which would have warranted on our part a declaration of war; yet, with sufficient grounds to justify to Europe and to our own conscience such a measure, what was our conduct upon that occasion? We interfered in her favour, and obtained the restoration of her territories, and the re-establishment of her independence. In the case of Portugal, our conduct had not been less exemplary. To the Ottoman Porte we were under peculiar obligations; and of all our allies she remained faithful to us to the last. To her we evinced proofs of the most inviolable attachment; for we obtained for her, without sacrifice, not only the restitution of all her dominions and territories in their integrity, but we also obtained the renunciation of France to acquisitions which threatened not only her independence, but her existence. France had ceded Venice to Austria; Austria had, in return, ceded the Ex-Venitian islands to France. These islands, which, from their situation, might have been productive of the most serious danger to the Ottoman Porte, have been abandoned by the French Republic, and their independence recognized. Thus, Sir, we have obtained by the treaty all that could be obtained for our allies, and not only preserved our good faith inviolate, but manifested our generosity where it could not be expected. There are, indeed, two other powers which it may be proper to notice; the Stadtholder and the king of Sardinia. It is obvious that we were not bound by any obligation of strict faith towards them; yet, every thing which this country could do for them has been performed. An arrangement with respect to the former had, at our instance, been carried on at Berlin, but that arrangement had, from various causes, been withdrawn. In favour of Sardinia we had also interfered, although she had given up the coalition, and entered into an offensive alliance with France.

Having noticed the manner in which we have uniformly displayed our good faith, I now come to the question of acquisition, as it should be fairly taken with respect to the power and resources of a country. And here let me observe, that the spirit of acquisition may be strained beyond its proper limits. It is not of this country alone that I am speaking; for the principle will, if properly scrutinized, apply with equal force to France. I contend, that an increase of power does not take place in proportion to the increase of acquisitions. That this doctrine applies no less to France than to this country, is justified by the opinion of men well qualified to form an estimate of the strength and resources of nations; and we accordingly find it supported by Dumourier and Carnot. I think it unnecessary to enter into any detailed reasoning to show, that the principle applying to the continent, is equally true with respect to the acquisition of colonial power. In looking to the state of our settlements in the West Indies, I do not see any cession made by us which can be the subject of regret; nor is there in the East Indies any position given to France which ought to be viewed with jealousy. The possessions in which she is to be reinstated in that quarter, are not calculated for the purposes of aggression; and if she were formidable in the force and extent of her naval resources and power, the island of Mauritius would, under every consideration, afford a more dangerous point of attack against our empire in the East. But it is maintained, that we give up by the treaty another possession of Great importance to our foreign concerns, and to our commercial prosperity. I allude to the island of Minorca, which I do not consider as an acquisition. Let us, in order to form a clear judgment, reflect upon our conduct with respect to that island in former wars; and I believe I shall not incur the charge of presumption in delivering this opinion. We have always acquired that island whenever we pleased, and we have always lost it at the conclusion of peace. By relinquishing it then, after the war, we avoid the expense of preserving it in peace; and if the situation be advantageous to us in war, we can always make ourselves masters of it. Of Malta I speak with less confidence, which, from its situation, and its almost impregnable state, is certainly of considerable political importance in the Mediterranean; but, giving up this point as far as it relates to political weight and influence, I must observe, that Malta is no source of trade and opulence; and that if it be considered as connected with the prosperity of the Levant trade, its importance in that respect will be greatly diminished. The Levant trade may, like many other topics of commercial speculation, be highly valued; but it is, as far as it relates to this country, next to nothing. Gentlemen will give me credit for this statement, when they hear that the whole of the British manufactures exported to the Levant during the war, does not exceed 112,000*l.*, and that this is to be taken out of the aggregate exports of twenty-four millions. The trade of Great Britain is nothing, when compared with that of the other countries to the Levant. It is chiefly supplied by the south of Europe;

and it must remain with the southern countries, from the nature of its articles, and the facility of communication and intercourse. With respect to the north of Europe, it has certainly been principally in the possession of the Dutch, yet the Dutch have had no settlement in the Mediterranean. Why, then, it may be asked, did the Dutch succeed in cultivating this particular branch of trade? I answer, because their policy was much wiser than ours; because we prevented ships with forged bills of health from entering our ports, and made all vessels coming from the Mediterranean perform quarantine; because we equally prohibited the landing both of sound and bad goods. The Dutch, on the contrary, gave them an airing within their ports, separated the good from the bad merchandise, and allowed the immediate importation of the former. Thus they occupied almost the whole of the Northern trade to the Levant; and this was so strongly felt by us, that, about two years ago, it was judged expedient to repeal these laws, in order to encourage a system of trade which the Dutch converted to their own profit, although they possessed no port in the Levant.

After considering what has been given up by the treaty, it remains for me to say a few words on those possessions which we are to retain; and in what I have to offer on the subject of Ceylon and Trinidad, I hope I shall not be thought to over-rate these two islands, when I call them the two great naval stations of the parts of the world to which they belong. Ceylon, in every point of view, cannot be too highly appreciated. It contains ports so capacious and secure, that the whole of the navy and commerce of Great Britain might ride with ease and safety in them. It is also in its native productions of immense value, and holds out a position to which our Indian army might retire if necessary, and defy the attempts of the united force of the world. Thus the very object, which above all others we should from our duty and interests prefer, we have gained by this treaty. Trinidad is also a naval station of very considerable importance, affording not only a secure retreat for our navy, but so very productive and healthy as to induce us to select and appropriate it to ourselves, in preference to every other possession in that quarter. Thus, Sir, considering the results of the war; considering all our old possessions, with our acquired territory, I say, if the term glory is not to be taken into the account by some gentlemen, that we have at least made an honourable peace. I say, if it is not in all respects as advantageous as you could wish, it cannot be denied that it is honourable. Let it be compared with the treaties of Ryswick, of Utrecht, of Aix-la-Chapelle, of Paris, and of Versailles; and let it be remembered that the relative state of this country with that of the contracting parties, both at those periods and at present should be fairly canvassed. By two of these peaces the country gained nothing. I need scarcely mention those of Ryswick and Aix-la-Chapelle. By that of Versailles we lost very considerably; for we were deprived of our American colonies and some valuable possessions. It was only by the peace of Utrecht in 1713, and that of Paris in 1763, that we gained anything. Yet if we compare the treaty of Utrecht with the present treaty, the latter will be found by no means inferior, either in point of advantage, or in the promise of stability. The severity of the conditions rendered the former the source of bitterness, and the cause of subsequent contention. France had been every where defeated, and found no consolation in continental victories, while in the present war she has triumphed over all the great powers of the continent. She makes the present treaty after a series of unexampled successes; and though some persons may not pronounce it as glorious as that of 1713, or as surprising as that of 1763, yet, taken together in all its objects and effects, it may be justly considered as advantageous to Great Britain as either of them. It may be argued, that we obtained Minorca and Gibraltar by the peace of Utrecht; yet, whatever reliance may be placed on these advantages, I believe neither of them can be deemed superior to the possessions of Ceylon and Trinidad. By the treaty of Paris, France gave up Canada, and Florida was ceded by Spain; yet, with all that extent of territory, I am strongly inclined to think that they were not real acquisitions.

I now ask fairly, whether the peace given by government to the country, compared with every former peace, is not as honourable to the character of the country, and as advantageous as circumstances could allow? With respect to the negotiation at Lisle, I am at a loss to conceive the consistency of persons who could sign the one and not sign the other. The question for our consideration is not a peace in which the powers of the continent take a leading part, but a separate and naval peace between Great Britain and France. I will not, however, assimilate the two proceedings, for it would be comparing a first project with an ultimate peace. In the project we only required Ceylon, Trinidad, and the Cape; but the noble lord says, we have since obtained several important possessions. I grant we have, but we have been deprived of others, among which we have to reckon the island of St. Domingo, where we had some of the most valuable points and strongest holds. The only power we then stipulated for was Portugal, yet nothing was attempted at that time, compared to what has been effected now. There is no comparison whatever, between the two periods, and the outlines and substance of the negotiations. In discussing the terms of this peace, I am aware that the great power of France ought to be considered in a general scale, which will make them appear less advantageous; and there is no man who regrets the circumstance more than myself. Yet the increase of that power is, perhaps, not altogether so vast as it may appear at first sight, if we take it in proportion to the increase of the other principal powers of the continent. Austria, Russia, and Prussia, have had a very considerable addition by the division of Poland; and the first power in particular, has augmented in a superior degree, both her extent of territory, and her population, by the annexation of Venice to her dominions. In appreciating the power of France, we must consider the diminution sustained by her commerce, the ruin of her manufactures, and an incalculable loss of wealth, while, if we consider the real increase of the substantial power of Great Britain, it will be found in proportion to the continental increase of France.

Under this impression, allow me, Sir, for a moment to consider the possessions of Great Britain as they were previous to the war; and first, in taking an estimate of the exports of British manufactures to our old West India islands, for the three last years of peace, I find them amount to 2,185,000*l.* while they are not less during the three last years of war than 3,561,000*l.* Our imports from the same quarter were, during the same periods, 3,877,000*l.* in peace, and 5,101,000*l.* in time of war. I also find, by referring to the proper documents, that our exports to the East Indies were, during the three last years of peace, 3,183,000*l.* and during the last three years of war 5,617,000*l.* The amount of our exports to the United States of America is still more surprising, making, in the same periods of peace, 3,694,000*l.* and, in the same periods of war, no less than, 6,232,000*l.* With respect to the continent of Europe, the total of our exports was, in the first instance, 1,530,000*l.*, and in the latter, 2,545,000*l.* From these statements, it appears, that the commerce of this country, as applied to our old possessions, has been nearly doubled in some instances, and has had in all an augmentation of one third. I beg, Sir, to press this the more, as it is necessary to consider the increase of our trade, with the decrease of that of France. In calculating the power of both countries, as it should possess weight in the general scale, it is but fair to enter into a comparison of their respective navies; and here the best mode that presents itself is to take them as they stood at the commencement and the end of the war; on the 1st of Feb. 1793, and on the 1st of Oct. 1801. On the 1st of Feb. 1793, the British navy consisted of 135 sail of the line, and 133 frigates; and on the first of Oct. 1801, it comprised 202 sail of the line, and 277 frigates. The navy of France was, at the commencement of the war, composed of 80 sail of the line and 66 frigates, and at the conclusion it consisted of 39 sail of the line, and 35 frigates. It has indeed been said, that France will give her whole attention to recruit her navy. She will no doubt exert herself to accomplish an object so desirable; but, whatever her efforts may be, there are two points in the arduous task which are well entitled to our consideration. The first is, the number of years she must be employed in building ships to make her naval establishment equal even to what it was; and the second, the number of ships necessary to be built in order to enable her to enter into a competition with this country. All who examine this subject thoroughly, will have no objection to give to France a great many years, and afterwards to take the chance of a war with her. We shall not be employed in building of ships, but in making of seamen. It is with the increase of our commerce, that our navy will always increase. France will, no doubt, make great exertions for the purpose; but whether a contest take place or not, in the course of eight or ten years, I am confident that we shall be enabled to renew it with more advantage than we began it in the late war. One of the reasons which induces me to entertain this opinion, arises from a conviction that the country will possess all its ardour and spirit, a lively recollection of all its brilliant exploits, and a just confidence in the extent of its resources and finance. I have one question to put to every man who hears me, and that is, Whether peace could be concluded upon safer and more honourable terms? We accepted the situation which we have the honour of filling, when the country was involved in war with almost every power of Europe. We had to contend with France, Spain, Russia, and the rest of the Northern powers. The convention concluded with them will, I trust, be considered as a fair acknowledgment of our maritime rights; and with that acknowledgment it is ardently to be hoped that the restoration of peace and harmony will take place. Since that event, a peace with France has been effected. I do not wish to say that it has been brought about by any extraordinary means; but I can say with confidence for my colleagues and myself, that nothing has been left undone on our part in exertion, in perseverance, and in moderation, to give to the country that blessing of which it was so much in want, and for which it is so eminently indebted to its own admirable spirit and patriotism, and to the zeal and gallantry of its soldiers and sailors. We have been engaged in a most tremendous contest; but we have come out of it with honour and advantage. The situation of Europe and that of Great Britain, may still appear critical; yet I hope, that in a sound system of policy, consisting of a mixture of firmness and moderation, will be always found a counterpoise to every danger, and a remedy for every evil.

Mr. Thomas Grenville said, that those who opposed the peace had been represented as frantic people, who contended that the restoration of the French monarchy should have been the sine quâ non. This charge, however, could not apply to him, as he had never entertained such an idea. As to the right of interference in the affairs of France, we had surely a right to interfere for the purpose of preventing that enormous aggrandizement, which was big with danger to ourselves. This had ever been considered, by our wisest statesmen, as an object of the first importance to this country. Whenever a peace had been concluded between two contending parties, it followed, of course, that one party had the superiority over the other, which it was fair and proper to exert for the purpose of ensuring advantageous terms, such terms, at least, as should place the country which accepted them in a state of security. And he hoped that the spirit of the English would ever lead them to resist, with energy and decision, terms fraught with dishonour, and big with humiliation. But, while he disclaimed the wild notions which had been falsely imputed to him, he hoped he should never be found among those faithless watchmen of the state, who sought to lull the people into a false security, but should ever endeavour to rouse them to a sense of existing danger. He felt it his duty to oppose the peace; and would contend, that both in the present treaty, and in the convention with the northern powers, ministers had assumed a humble tone, which would lead to consequences dangerous to the existence of the country. The gentlemen who had that night supported the peace, had dissembled the real object of the war. He had ever considered it to be a war for indemnity and security. The enemy had threatened the existence of our liberties and our constitution. To preserve them; to prevent the diffusion of principles subversive of civil society; to obtain indemnity for the expenses which we had been compelled to incur, and security for the future, was the avowed object of the war. Ministers seemed to have forgotten our victories, and to have lost sight of our conquests. To have been victorious, and yet to have treated as a vanquished nation, was a galling reflexion to a British mind. The noble lord had begun by stating, that the present period was very different from that at which the former negotiation took place; that we had originally opposed the principles of France, but latterly we had opposed her power. Now, in his opinion, both led to the same end; for if the power of France threatened the existence of this country, it was as much our duty to oppose that power, as it was to oppose her principles, when exerted for the same purpose. — Mr. Grenville then entered into a comparison of the terms of the present treaty, with the terms offered to us at Lisle; and showed that the latter were far preferable to the former. It had been said, that it was such a peace as every man was glad of, but no man was proud of. But he hoped that this was an epigrammatic expression, and not a true picture. For if Englishmen could rejoice at a bad peace, at a peace of which they could not be proud, the national character was totally lost. Though the supporters of the peace had prudently forbore to insist on its glory, they still persevered in representing it as honourable. But in what light was it honourable? The noble lord had truly contended, that time and circumstances were necessary considerations in the conclusion of a treaty; but he was at a loss to perceive the wisdom of that policy, which would reject better terms in a moment of dismay, and accede to worse in the hour of victory and confidence. There might be a show of magnanimity in such conduct, but was it wise, was it politic, was it compatible with the real interests of the country? Ministers have assumed great credit to themselves for their conduct towards our allies. What has been done for them? Turkey was the only power which could be truly said to be in alliance with us. It was said that the integrity of the Sublime Porte had been secured. But is that her opinion? Does she feel secure? A week after this stipulation for her security, Turkey preferred the guarantee of her enemy to that of her ally, and chose to negotiate for herself. As we had compelled the French to evacuate Egypt, both the security of Turkey and our own, required that we should have retained in our possession some strong fortress, garrisoned by British troops. Without this precaution, what was there to prevent the French from returning to Egypt? At the very moment when we magnanimously stipulated for the evacuation of that country, there was not a French soldier in it, who was not a prisoner to our gallant, persevering, and victorious army. As to the integrity of Naples, that was as insecure as Turkey; for, though the French troops had evacuated a part of the Neapolitan territory, what was to prevent them from returning? especially, as they retained possession of the Cisalpine republic. Such is the situation, such the security, such the integrity of Naples! In casting our eyes over the map of Europe, we look in vain for the kingdom of Sardinia. The territories of his Sardinian majesty live only in our memory. In the Mediterranean, he had only the little island of Sardinia left, for the security of which, he was solely indebted to the protection of our fleet; a protection which he would lose the moment the definitive treaty should be signed. The next of our allies, the integrity of whose dominions exhibits an illustrious proof of our magnanimity, is Portugal. He adverted to the treaty of Badajos, and to the cession of a portion of the Portuguese territory in the Brazils; and he asked, whether it was to be understood, that our treaty with France sanctioned that cession? Portugal, like Naples, had been secured by us, in the integrity of her possessions; and our magnanimity on this occasion had been loudly vaunted by the noble lord, because those two powers had formed separate treaties with the enemy. But, were not those treaties the effect of compulsion on the one hand, and the result of conquest on the other? Should we have been justified in declaring war against Portugal and Naples for yielding, against their will, to dire necessity? If no blame, then, attached to Portugal, if she ought really to be considered as our ally, as no human being could suspect her of possessing the ability to resist her enemy, there could not be the smallest reason for any diminution of our attachment to her. How have we provided for her security? France, as far as any treaty can bind her, has concluded a treaty with Portugal;—but on what terms? She has taken from her Olivenza and the adjoining territory, which Spain had long coveted; and for which nothing more was requisite than to express a wish, in order to obtain it from France. France, at the same time, took for herself a portion of the Brazils, which gave her the command of the river Amazon, and the whole of the adjacent coast. Mr. Grenville quoted M. de la Condamine, in order to show the advantage which France would derive from the possession of this tract of country, in addition to what she already enjoyed in the proximity of Dutch Guiana. Is this the mode of guaranteeing the possessions, of securing the integrity of a faithful ally? If integrity and dismemberment be synonymous terms, then, indeed, the assertion may be true.—In allusion to the term honourable, which the noble lord has absurdly applied to the peace, every man must feel, that no peace was safe that was not honourable, and that no peace was honourable which was not safe; but, unfortunately, this peace was neither safe nor honourable; nor could any peace be honourable, which gave us territories that did not belong to the power by whom they were given. The conduct of our government in the negotiation at Lisle was very different; they did what was wise and proper to attain peace; they selected certain points of importance, which it was necessary, for the preservation of that honour, to insist upon. He was surprised to hear certain expressions which had fallen from the noble lord, relative to the acquisitions we had made by the present peace, which he contrasted with lord Malmesbury's projet, the wisdom of which he extolled. We should have been fully justified in the retention of Ceylon, the Cape, and Cochin, for the more effectual defence of our Eastern empire. When we looked at the cessions which we have made, we should find the conquests we had retained comparatively trifling. He was not at all satisfied with the situation in which the Cape was left by the treaty. We had ceded a port which might become a great annoyance to our trade. The Cape furnished a military station, of vast importance in the event of a sudden war, not preceded by a proclamation. The marquis Cornwallis, on his return from India, had strongly pressed the necessity of retaining Cochin, and the Cape; or if only one of them could be retained, the Cape in preference to Cochin. Though Ceylon was an important settlement, Cochin, on the western side of the Peninsula, was one of the strongest military frontiers in India. In the event a war, a fleet might sail from the Cape and arrive at Cochin, before any person in India could know of its arrival, and before any person in England could be apprized of its sailing. He might possibly be told, that our merchantmen were advised to avoid the Cape; that the importance of that settlement was not so great as was represented; and that our ships might touch at the Brazils. The settlement which the French had acquired in the Brazils, would, in that case, give additional importance to France. The Cape and Cochin were insisted on by lord Malmesbury, at Lisle, as points from which we would not accede; and these were now given up, from that want of vigour, spirit, and prudence, which marked our negotiations. An attempt had been made to represent the Levant trade as unimportant to this country; but our manufacturers would tell a far different tale.

Was it true, that Malta was unimportant? that fortress which had sustained a blockade of nearly two years. It could not be seriously contended. To rescue Malta and Egypt from France, is deemed an object of primary importance; but when it is considered expedient to give them up, their importance suddenly vanishes, and they become trivial and insignificant. No part of the treaty of peace, nor any thing connected with it, excited so much astonishment in his mind, as our treatment of the house of Orange, except the defence of that treatment. Britain was bound by a solemn treaty with that house. He understood some private arrangement was making, between France and Prussia, relative to that subject; but the prince of Orange was not to be thrown as an outcast on the world, by those for whom he had sacrificed his all. Where would have been the difficulty in introducing an article in the preliminary treaty, similar to one which was prepared at the negotiation at Lisle, which stipulated for the restoration of the whole property of the house of Orange, or the full value of it in money. There could be no objection to this; but we wanted the spirit, the vigour, or courage, to support an ally, who had been so unfortunate as to be an enemy to France! — Though he did not think the peace of 1783 was either glorious or honourable, yet he would recommend gentlemen to read the preliminaries to that treaty, and compare them with the present. Let the cessions made then be compared with the cessions made now; and, though he thought the former a peace which presented nothing but defeat and humiliation, yet the latter would be found infinitely worse in itself, and more dangerous in its consequences. The present peace was not honourable, in respect of our allies; nor was it necessary to be made. The chancellor of the Exchequer had indignantly disclaimed the plea of necessity. Although a difference of opinion existed, as to the terms of the peace, no one would contend that we were reduced to the necessity of making a peace, dishonourable to our allies, or unsafe to ourselves. He contrasted the terms of the peace of Utrecht, and that of 1763, with those of the present; showed the vast increase of power which France had acquired now, and the consequent increase of danger to ourselves. Could any man view the present power of France, and consequently our present danger, without shuddering?

In the event of a war, notwithstanding our stipulations, all the ports and fortresses in the Mediterranean would be seized by France, and shut against us. She would monopolize its commerce in time of peace, its power in time of war. If we acted upon such a principle of negotiation, or rather of sacrifice, and suffered the definitive treaty to be completed, would it not place us in a state of war with France in twelve months? Could a peace be good, if its duration were so short? It would reduce us to the necessity of dismantling our navy, and of disbanding our army and our volunteers. It had deprived us of all the military points and stations; and, notwithstanding all our exertions of economy, what would be our state, if France, in the course of twelve months, should take us unprepared, and direct her whole power against us? Did they not believe, that such a war must shake our country to the very centre? Feeling, as he did, that the peace was neither honourable to our allies, nor safe to ourselves, he should give his decided negative to the motion.

Lord Castlereagh said, that upon a subject of such importance, he could not reconcile it to his feelings to give a silent vote. He would therefore shortly state his reasons for concurring in the motion. The first question that presented itself for the consideration of the House was, whether, taking every circumstance into consideration, it would have been consistent with sound policy for England to have continued the war? He considered the war to have been entered into, on the part of Great Britain, purely for the purpose of defence, and though, in all respects, it had not answered to our wishes, yet Great Britain had the honour of having acted, throughout the whole of this eventful contest, in the most disinterested manner: she had not only poured forth her blood and treasure in defence of her own independence, but had offered to Europe the means of preservation. From causes which it was unnecessary to state, the confederacy of powers upon the continent was dissolved, and therefore it became necessary for Great Britain, either to carry on the war alone against France, or to make peace with that state, if it could be done upon terms consistent with our safety and independence. In deciding upon the question of the safety of this country by the peace, it would be vain to deny that France had attained a degree of power, which could not but create uneasiness in the mind of every thinking man. It was absurd to contend that Great Britain with a navy all-powerful as it was, could affect France upon the continent, unless assisted by a confederacy of continental states; we were therefore under the necessity, as he had before stated, of continuing the contest, without the hope of making any serious impression upon France, or of concluding a peace upon fair and equitable terms. His lordship then entered into an examination of the preliminaries, which, he contended, were as favourable as we could look for in the present state of Europe; and that by them Great Britain had not only maintained her own security, but had, with that generosity and good faith which always marked her conduct, stipulated for the integrity of her allies.

Earl Temple could not help disapproving of the concessions which ministers had made, as dangerous to the safety, and degrading to the honour of England; no security having been retained to counterbalance the immense territorial acquisitions of France. He apprehended much from the exultation with which the tidings of peace seemed to have been received by the disaffected: their hopes appeared to revive; and a party of degenerate Englishmen, he saw with regret, was to be found, mean enough to drag the coach of general Lauriston, the bearer of these tidings, through the streets of London, with cries of "Long live Buonaparté." It was an afflicting prospect, and augured ill to the country; but it was in some degree encouraged by the conduct of ministers; for he understood it to be a fact, that citizen Lauriston was accompanied from France by a person who had been twice sent out of this country under the Alien act; that on his arrival at Dover, this person being recognized by the proper officer in that port, he refused him permission to land; but citizen Lauriston threatening if he did not he would return to Paris with the preliminaries, the officer, afraid of taking the responsibility upon himself, suffered him to land and proceed to London, and he was actually in the coach with Lauriston, when he was dragged through the streets. He was informed that ministers had not the spirit to take notice of the exceptionable person alluded to—an unhappy omen of what this country had to expect from an intimate connexion with France, particularly under such ministers. He opposed them from no factious motive: he thought them undeserving the confidence of the country, and the preliminaries on the table convinced him they were. He was aware that he should not be seconded in his objections to the terms of the proposed peace, by those who were in the habit of opposing the conduct of administration; but he did not wish for their support. He who should declare his pleasure at the peace, "because it was glorious to the enemy," was not the connexion he would court; it was a sentiment which could not dignify the patriot or the Englishman—he should shrink from it with abhorrence; the man who employed it should be carefully avoided, and his principles guarded against. The peace which was supported upon such motives, must be hollow and suspicious.

Mr. Bankes considered the question to be, whether the present treaty was better for the country, than a prolongation of the war? The terms, perhaps, might be considered, by moderate men, as good as could, under all the circumstances, be fairly expected. He would accept the hope which was held out to the nation. France had subdued all the alliances made against her on the continent, and we could have no farther expectations from a confederacy. We could no longer expect any coalition which could materially preserve us from the continental powers. He could not conceive how those who disapproved of the terms proposed in the treaty at Lisle could condemn the present. He could now entertain no hopes of any thing which could proceed from internal commotions in France. It must not be forgotten, that our situation was so much worse since the year 1797, as we had since sustained all the hardships and expense of a state of warfare; we stood now in need of peace and tranquillity. If we proceeded in the war, we should make France realize the character given it, of a military nation. Suppose, for a moment, that we could obtain better terms; that we might, for instance, retain the Cape of Good Hope, and some of our other conquests, were these objects of sufficient magnitude to induce us to continue the war even for one month? He, for one, relied not on the terms of any treaty, but on the vigour and determination of the country to sustain itself in every situation. He was anxious for peace to be made in the spirit of peace; and wished the House seriously to consider, that suspicion on the one side could not fail of engendering distrust on the other.

Mr. Pitt rose. He said, that upon a subject in itself of such importance, and one upon which it was unfortunately his lot to differ from some with whom it had been his happiness to have been connected by the strictest ties of friendship, for the greater part of his life, he was anxious to deliver his sentiments, before the attention of the House, and his own powers, should be exhausted by fatigue. In considering the question, whether these terms should be accepted or rejected, there was one proposition which he might lay down, with, he believed, but little danger of contradiction, and that was, that for some time past, all rational, all thinking men, had concurred in an opinion, that whatever their wishes might have been, whatever hopes might at different periods of the war have been entertained, yet, that after the events which had taken place on the continent of Europe, the question of peace or war between Great Britain and France, became a question of terms only. In laying down this proposition, he desired not to have it admitted in words, and rejected in substance. After the conclusion of the peace between France and the great continental powers, after the dissolution of the confederacy of the states of Europe—a confederacy which he had supported to the utmost of his power, and with respect to which he still retained the same sentiments;—after the dissolution, however, of that confederacy, it became merely a question of the terms to be obtained for ourselves, and for those allies who still remained faithful to us and to their own interests. In saying this, he was aware that he differed from many, of whose judgments he had the highest opinion, and whom he both loved and honoured; but it was the firm conviction of his mind, and it was his duty both to the House and the public, fully and candidly to state his sentiments upon the subject. When he said, that the question of peace or war between this country and France was a question of terms only, he wished to be understood as being more anxious about the general complexion of peace, as affecting the character of this country for good faith, honour, and generosity, than he was about any particular acquisition that might be made, or any specific object that might be attained.

In considering the terms that ought to be accepted, it would be necessary to inquire, in the first instance, what would be the expense of continuing the contest, what were the difficulties with which it would be attended, and what hopes could be entertained of its ultimate success? It was undoubtedly the duty of every government, in negotiating a treaty of peace, to obtain the best possible terms; but it was sometimes difficult to know how far particular points might be pressed without running the risk of breaking off the negotiation. For his own part, he had no hesitation to declare, that he would rather close with an enemy upon terms short even of the fair pretensions of the country, provided they were not inconsistent with honour and security, than continue the contest for any particular possession. He knew that when he had the honour of a seat in his majesty's councils, if it had come to a question of terms, and the pacific dispositions of the enemy corresponded with ours, he, for one, should have acted upon that principle; and knowing that to be his own feeling upon the subject, he should neither act with fairness nor candour if he did not apply it to another administration. He did not pretend to state to the House, that this peace fully answered all his wishes; but the government had undoubtedly endeavoured to obtain the best terms they could for the country; and he was ready to contend, that the difference between the terms we had obtained and those of retaining all which we had given up, would not have justified ministers in protracting the war. He was anxious upon this subject to speak plainly, because it was one on which he ought to have no reserve, either with the House or with the country. What the terms were to which this country ought to look in the present state of Europe, had been, in his opinion, most accurately and most ably described by his noble friend. The principle upon which administration acted, and in which he perfectly concurred with them, was, that in selecting those acquisitions which we wished to retain, it was our interest not to aim so much at keeping possession of any fresh conquest which we did not materially want, as to endeavour to retain those acquisitions which, from their situation, or from other causes, were the best calculated for confirming and securing our ancient territories. The object which must naturally first present itself to every minister, must be to give additional vigour to our maritime strength, and security to our colonial possessions. It was to them we were indebted for the unparalleled exertions which we have been enabled to make in the course of this long and eventful contest; it was by them that we were enabled, in the wreck of Europe, not only to effect our own security, but to hold out to our allies the means of safety, if they had been but true to themselves.

In thus considering the subject, it was necessary to look to the leading quarters of the world in which we were to seek for this security. It was evident that our acquisitions were all in the Mediterranean, in the East and in the West Indies. Those who thought that this country ought to retain all its acquisitions, would of course consider any cession made by us as incompatible either with our safety or with our honour. But those who did not go that length, would agree with him in thinking, that when we were to give back a part, and retain a part of our conquests, it was our duty to consider, which of them were the best calculated to promote the two great leading objects to which he had before alluded; and if it should appear, upon examining the present treaty of peace, that in two out of the three quarters which he had mentioned, viz. in the East and in the West Indies, we had retained such possessions, as were the best calculated to effect the security of our ancient possessions, we had, every circumstance considered, done as much as could be expected. Without undervaluing our conquests in the Mediterranean, and the gallant achievements by which they had been effected, especially the capture of Malta (and certainly no man was less inclined to undervalue them than he was), yet it must be admitted by every man acquainted with the real interests of this country, that compared with the East and West Indies, the Mediterranean is but a secondary consideration: indeed this was a proposition so obvious, that it was unnecessary for him to enter into any arguments upon the subject.

Of the importance of the Levant trade, much had formerly been said: volumes had been written upon it, and even nations had gone to war to obtain it. The value of that trade, even in the periods, to which he had alluded, had been much exaggerated; but even supposing those statements to have been correct, they applied to times when the other great branches of our trade, to which we owed our present greatness and our naval superiority, did not exist—he alluded to the great increase of our manufactures—to our great internal trade—to our commerce with Ireland, with the United states of America, with the East and the West Indies: it was these which formed the sinews of our strength, and compared with which the Levant trade was trifling. In another point of view, he admitted that possessions in the Mediterranean were of importance to enable us to co-operate with any continental power or powers, with whom we might happen to be in alliance. He agreed with his noble friend (lord Castle-reagh), that when there was not a powerful confederacy on the continent in our favour, this country, with all its naval superiority, could not make any very serious efforts on the continent; yet, in case of such a confederacy, much undoubtedly would be done by the co-operation of the British navy in the Mediterranean. But at the present moment, and situated as Europe at present is, we ought not, upon any one principle of wisdom or policy, to prefer acquisitions in the Mediterranean, to the attainment of the means of giving additional security to our possessions in the East and West Indies. It was upon this principle that he heartily approved of the choice which ministers had made, in preferring our security in the West Indies to any acquisitions that we might have made in the Mediterranean; because he considered it as a rule of prudence, which ought never to be deviated from, not unnecessarily to mortify the feelings or pride of an enemy—[Hear, hear! from the other side]—Gentlemen, from their manner, seemed to think that he had not always adhered to that maxim: he would not interrupt his argument by entering into a personal defence of himself; but, whenever gentlemen were inclined to discuss that point, he was perfectly ready to meet them, giving them the full benefit of any expressions that he had ever used. Supposing the events of the war to be equally balanced, and in negotiating for one of two possessions, both of equal value, but that our possessing one of them would hurt the feelings or mortify the pride of the enemy more than the other, he should think that a justifiable reason for selecting the other; he did not say this from any affectation of sentiment, or peculiar tenderness towards the enemy, but because an enemy would not give up such a possession without obtaining from us more than an equivalent. Upon this principle, he hoped the House would concur with him in thinking, that we ought not to insist upon retaining the island of Malta. If our object had been to retain any possession which had formerly belonged to the enemy, and which we had captured from them, with the view of adding to the security of our old dominions, then Malta did not come under the description, because it was not an ancient possession of the enemy, but had been acquired by him unjustly from a third power. It therefore appeared to him more consistent with wisdom and sound policy, rather to put Malta under the protection of a third power, capable of protecting it, than, by retaining it ourselves, to mortify the pride and attract the jealousy of the enemy.

The other possession which we had acquired, and upon the propriety of retaining which, much had been said, was Minorca. With respect to this island, he perfectly concurred in the opinion of his noble friend (lord Hawkesbury), that it would always belong to the power who possessed the greatest maritime strength; the experience of the four last wars proved the justice of this observation; for Minorca had regularly shifted hands according to the preponderance of maritime strength in the Mediterranean. In time of peace, Minorca was a possession of no great importance or utility; in time of war, it could be of no use whatever, unless we possessed a maritime superiority; and if we did possess that superiority, experience had shown that it would probably fall into our hands. Upon these grounds, he, for one, would not have advised much to be given in another quarter for the purpose of enabling us to retain the island of Minorca, doubting, as he did, whether in time of peace it was worth the expense of a garrison. He thought, therefore, that we were justified in looking to the East and West Indies for the possessions which it was our interest to retain; but he could not help expressing his regret, that circumstances were such as to prevent us from retaining a place so important in many points of view, as the island of Malta; he lamented also, that it was not possible for us to have made a more definitive arrangement respecting its future fate; but unless we had been prepared to say that we would retain it ourselves, he did not know any better plan that could be adopted, than to make it independent both of England and France.

In turning his attention to the East Indies, he certainly saw cause for regret, because the opinion he had been taught to entertain of the value of the Cape of Good Hope was much lighter than that expressed by his noble friend. He knew there were great authorities against him; but, on the other hand, from what he had heard from marquis Cornwallis, and from a right hon. friend of his, who had long presided over the affairs of India (Mr. Dundas), he was induced to think the Cape of Good Hope a more important place than it had been represented on this occasion. But thinking thus highly as he did of the Cape, he considered it as far inferior indeed to Ceylon, which he looked upon to be, of all the places upon the face of the globe, the one which would add most to the security of our East-Indian possessions, and as placing our dominions in that quarter in a greater degree of safety than they had been in from the first hour that we set our foot on the continent of India. An hon. friend of his, had lamented that we had not stipulated for the retention of Cochin, and stated, that in the former negotiations lord Malmesbury had been instructed to insist upon its remaining in our possession. How far lord Malmesbury was instructed to insist upon, or recede from, certain points contained in that projet, he did not feel himself now at liberty to state; but he believed no man would be inclined to say, that it must of necessity be an ultimatum, because it was contained in a projet. Indeed one of the complaints which we had against the French upon that occasion was, that they wanted us, contrary to every diplomatic form, to give in our ultimatum first. He knew that it was the opinion, at that time, of a noble marquis to whom he had before alluded, and who had rendered such essential services in India; but he was wrong in particularising India, for there was scarcely a quarter of the globe in which this country had not derived important advantages from the exalted talents and virtues of that noble person, who was now about to receive the last reward of his services, in putting the finishing hand to a treaty which would give peace to the world, after a war in which he had had so large a share in averting from this country the dangers which threatened the most vulnerable part of our possessions—that the retaining of Cochin was necessary to the security of our Indian dominions. But the noble marquis, he was sure, did not now retain the same opinion, because its importance then depended upon its being a frontier post, to secure us from an enemy whom we had since completely destroyed. It would not surely be contended for a moment, that, when the power of Tippoo Sultaun was entire, and when there was a direct road from his dominions into our's, Cochin was not of infinitely more importance than it could be now when his dominions were in our possession. He did not wish to give a ludicrous illustration of this argument: but he was really so much astonished at what had been said upon this point, that he could not help stating a case which appeared to him directly in point with the present. If we were to look into the ancient periods of our history, when Scotland was a separate kingdom, hostile to us, and in strict alliance with France, the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed was a place of the greatest importance to us as a fortified frontier post; but surely it could not be said to be of equal importance now, when Scotland and England are united into one kingdom. This parallel did not appear to him to be exaggerated; and if Cochin was of no importance as a military post, he was inclined to think that its commercial value was not very great. As to the advantages that we must derive from the possession of Ceylon, it was unnecessary for him to enlarge upon them; they were too obvious not to be felt by every body. With regard to the Cape, he had before stated his opinion of its value; but if we could not retain it without continuing the war, he thought ministers had acted wisely in giving it up upon the terms they had, because, in point of value, it was inferior to Ceylon and Trinidad.

He now came to the consideration of our situation in the West Indies; and he was decidedly of opinion, that, of all the islands which the fortune of war had put into our hands in that quarter, Trinidad was the most valuable; he should prefer it even to Martinico; undoubtedly as a protection to our Leeward Islands it was the better of the two, and, in point of intrinsic value, the more important. As to its value as a post from which we might direct our future operations against the possessions of Spain in South America, it must be felt by every one to be the best situated of any part in the West Indies. He had always been of opinion, that when it came to be a question merely of terms between England and France, we ought to retain the possession of one of the great naval stations in the West Indies, because our great want in that quarter was a naval port. The four great naval stations were Guadaloupe, Martinico, St. Lucia, and Trinidad; and those of Trinidad and Martinico were the best, and the former the better of the two.

He would now trouble the House shortly upon the subject of our allies. With respect to the Porte we had done every thing that we were bound to do: nay more—we had compelled the French to the evacuation of Egypt, and had stipulated for the integrity of her dominions. There was another object which we had obtained, and to which he did not think so much importance had been given as it deserved; he meant the establishment of an infant power, viz. the republic of the Seven Islands, which would perhaps have otherwise fallen under the dominion of France: this certainly was an acquisition of great importance for this country, not inferior, perhaps, to the possession of Malta itself. The only answer he had heard upon the subject was, that there had been a treaty concluded between France and the Porte, by which the evacuation of Egypt was stipulated for; but it could not be for a moment doubted that it was to the exertions of this country, and to the brilliant achievements of our army and navy, that the evacuation of Egypt must be attributed; and if France had, by a diplomatic trick, taken the advantage of this in two treaties, that could not derogate from the merit of this country.

With regard to Naples, we were not bound to do any thing for her. She had even desired to be released from her engagements to us; but she was compelled to this by an over-ruling necessity; and the government of this country, in its conduct towards Naples, had only acted in conformity to its own interests, and that upon large and liberal grounds, in endeavouring to repair the fortunes of an ally who had given way only to force. The hon. gentleman had argued, that we ought to have guaranteed to Naples her dominions, because, from the contiguity of the Cisalpine republic to Naples, the French might, in pursuance of the treaty, evacuate their territories one day, and re-enter them the next; but if, from the situation of Europe, the present stipulation could not effect the security of Naples, it must be obvious that any guarantee would be equally unavailing.

With regard to Sardinia, the same observations were applicable; for we were not bound to interfere for her, unless it was to be maintained that we were to take upon ourselves the task of settling the affairs of the continent. But if we were unable to settle the affairs of that part of the continent which was in our own neighbourhood, with what effect of propriety could we attempt it in Italy? He was ready to grant that we ought to have claimed Piedmont for its sovereign, but could we have obtained it? Could we have procured its restoration, unless we could have disposed of the king of Etruria, unless we could have gained the Cisalpine and Ligurian republics, and driven the French from the mountains of Switzerland? Unless we could have done all this, it would have been in vain to restore the king of Sardinia to his capital, surrounded as he would have been by the French, and by their dependent and affiliated republics.

As to Portugal, every body must lament her misfortunes. But if it was right in her to ask to be released from her engagements to us, and if it was right in us to consent to it, then clearly we were absolved from any obligation to her, because an obligation which is put an end to on the one side, can, upon no fair reasoning, be said to continue on the other. As to the cession of Olivenza, it certainly was not of any great importance; but much had been said about the territory which France had obtained from Portugal in South America, and a considerable degree of geographical knowledge had been displayed in tracing the course of rivers; but gentlemen should recollect, that a South-American and a European river were materially different; for when you were talking of the banks of a river in South America, it was in fact very often little less than the coasts of an ocean. It had been said, "you affect to guarantee the integrity of Portugal, but it is only after France and Spain have taken every thing they wished for." But this again was not correct. The treaty of Badajos certainly did not give to France all she desired, because France, by a subsequent treaty, extorts another cession of still greater importance to her.

What happens then? Portugal has given up this second portion of her territory by force, when you interfere and cancel the second treaty, and bring them back to the stipulations in the first. To you, then, Portugal owes this difference in the limits of her South-American empire, and to her you have acted not only with good faith, but with dignified liberality.

The only remaining ally was the prince of Orange. From our ancient connexions, from our gratitude for the services of the house of Orange at the period of the Revolution, from his connexion with our sovereign, we could not but take a lively interest in his fate, and we had shown it by our conduct. He was not to be told of the guarantee of the constitution of Holland, without recalling to the recollection of the House the efforts we had made to defend, the unparalleled exertions we had used to restore him to his dominions. Even on the present occasion his interests had not been neglected. We did interfere for him; and we were told, that his interests were at that time the subject of negotiation, and that he would receive an indemnity. Even if we were to take that upon ourselves, it ought not to stand in the way of a great national arrangement. Thus stood the case with regard to our acquisitions and to our allies.

But it had been said, that we ought to have obtained more; that we ought to have obtained something to balance the great increase of power which France had obtained; that we have given France the means of increasing her maritime strength, and, in short, that "we have signed the death-warrant of the country." Now, in the first place, if we had retained all our conquests, it would not have made any difference to us in point of security. He did not mean to say, he would not have retained them all if he could; but they were no more important than as they would give us a little more or a little less of colonial power, and only tended to promote our security by increasing our finance. But would the acquisition of all these islands have enabled us to counterbalance the power which France had acquired on the continent? They would only give us a little more wealth; but a little more wealth would be badly purchased by a little more war: he should think so, even if we could be sure that one year's more war would give it to us; particularly when it was recollected, how many years we had now been engaged in this contest. In speaking, however, about our resources, he would take upon himself to state (and he hoped the House would give him credit for some knowledge upon the subject), that if any case of necessity should arise, or if our honour should require another contest, we were far, very far indeed, from the end of our pecuniary resources, which, he was happy to say, were greater than the enemy, or even the people of this country themselves, had an idea of. For the purpose of defence, or for the security of our honour, we had still resources in abundance; but they ought to be kept for those purposes, and not lavished away in continuing a contest, with the certainty of enormous expense. We might sit down in a worse relative situation than we were in at present, our object not obtained, our security not effected. As to the general point, we could not now think of balancing the powers on the continent. It was undoubtedly right, that if the French had conquered much, we ought also to endeavour to retain much; but in treating with France, we were not to consider what France had got from other countries, but what was the relative situation between us and France.

Gentlemen had talked of the uti possidetis; but France had not insisted upon the principle in her treaties with the powers on the continent; she had not retained the possession of all she had conquered, and consequently we could not be justified in insisting upon that principle. He admitted, that if a country had increased in power and territory faster than its natural rival (for, without speaking hastily, he must consider France in that character), that might justify the engaging in a confederacy to bring him back to his ancient strength; but if he had been able to dissolve that confederacy, that would perhaps be the worst reason in the world why, when we came to make peace with him, we were to expect the more favourable terms. It would be but bad reasoning, if one power were to say to another, "You are much too powerful for us, we have not the means of reducing that power by force, and therefore you must cede to us a portion of your territories, in order to make us equal in point of strength." Gentlemen might undoubtedly wish this; but that which regulated wishes, would not regulate actions. Many things might be prayed for, that were hardly to be expected in reality. But he did not see that we were giving to the enemy all this colonial wealth and maritime power which had been represented; what we gave back was not only smaller than what we retained, but much of it was in a ruined state. He was therefore inclined to think, that, for many years at least, we should have the colonial trade, and that too increasing in extent and value. That we should not have been justified in asking for more, he did not mean to assert; but that we should have got more, or that we ought to have continued the war to increase our possessions, was a proposition to which he could not give his assent.

Allusions had been made to former opinions and language; upon this subject he should only say, that, peace having been restored between England and France, forbearance of language and terms of respect were proper; but it would be affectation and hypocrisy in him to say, that he had changed, or could change, his opinion of the character of the person presiding in France, until he saw a train of conduct which would justify that change. He would not now occupy the attention of the House by entering into a discussion of the origin of the war; the unjust aggression which was made upon us was established by recent evidence; but it was unnecessary to enter into it now, because, upon that subject, the opinion of the House and of the country was fixed. The great object of the war, on our part, was defence for ourselves and for the rest of the world, in a war waged against most of the nations in Europe, but against us with particular malignity. Security was our great object; there were different means of accomplishing it, with better or worse prospects of success; and, according to the different variations of policy occasioned by a change of circumstances, we still pursued our great object, security. In order to obtain it, we certainly did look for the subversion of that government, which was founded upon revolutionary principles. We never, at any one period, said, that, as a sine quâ non, we insisted upon the restoration of the old government of France; we only said, there was no government with which we could treat. This was our language up to 1796; but in no one instance did we ever insist upon restoring the monarchy; though, said Mr. Pitt, I do not hesitate to acknowledge, that it would have been more consistent with the wishes of ministers, and with the interest and security of this country. I am equally ready to confess, that I gave up my hopes with the greatest reluctance; and I shall, to my dying day, lament that there were not, on the part of the other powers of Europe, efforts corresponding to our own, for the accomplishment of that great work. There were periods, during the continuance of the war, in which I had hopes of our being able to put together the scattered fragments of that great and venerable edifice; to have restored the exiled nobility of France; to have restored a government, certainly not free from defects, but built upon sober and regular foundations, in the stead of that mad system of innovation which threatened, and had nearly accomplished, the destruction of Europe.

*Me si fata meis paterentur ducere vitam
Auspiciis, et sponte meâ componere curas;
Urbem Trojanam primum dulcesque meorum
Reliquias colerem, Priami tecta alta manerent,*

Et recidiva manu posuissem Pergama victis.

This, it was true, had been found unattainable; but we had the satisfaction of knowing, that we had survived the violence of the revolutionary fever, and we had seen the extent of its principles abated. We had seen Jacobinism deprived of its fascination; we had seen it stripped of the name and pretext of liberty; it had shown itself to be capable only of destroying, not of building, and that it must necessarily end in a military despotism. He trusted this important lesson would not be thrown away upon the world. Being disappointed in our hopes, of being able to drive France within her ancient limits, and even to make barriers against her farther incursions, it became then necessary, with the change of circumstances, to change our objects; for he did not know a more fatal error, than to look only at one object, and obstinately to pursue it, when the hope of accomplishing it no longer remained. If it became impossible for us to obtain the full object of our wishes, wisdom and policy both required that we should endeavour to obtain that which was next best. In saying this, he was not sensible of inconsistency, either in his former language or conduct, in refusing to treat with the person who now holds the destinies of France; because, when he formerly declined treating with him, he then said, that if events should take the turn they had since done, he should have no objection to treat with him.

He would now add but very little more to what he had said. He could not agree with those gentlemen who seemed to think that France had grown so much stronger in proportion to what we had. These gloomy apprehensions seemed to him to be almost wholly without foundation. This country always was, and he trusted always would be, able to check the ambitious projects of France, and to give that degree of assistance to the rest of Europe which they had done upon this occasion; and he wished it had been done with more effect. But when the immense acquisitions which France had made were taken into consideration on the one hand, it was but fair, on the other, to consider what she had lost in population, in commerce, in capital, and in habits of industry. The desolation produced by convulsions, such as France had undergone, could not be repaired even by large acquisitions of territory. Comparing, therefore, what France has gained with what she had lost, this enormous increase of power was not quite so apparent as some gentlemen on the other side seemed to apprehend. When he took into consideration the immense wealth of this country, and the natural and legitimate growth of that wealth, so much superior to the produce of rapacity and plunder, he could not but entertain the hope, founded in justice and in nature, of its solidity. This hope was strengthened by collateral considerations, when he looked to the great increase of our maritime power; when he contemplated the additional naval triumphs that we had obtained; when he looked to the brilliant victories of our armies, gained over the flower of the troops of France—troops which, in the opinion of many, were invincible,—when he reflected upon these glorious achievements, though he could not but lament our disappointment in some objects, he had the satisfaction of thinking, that we had added strength to our security, and lustre to our national character. Since the treaty which had taken place at Lisle, we had increased in wealth and commerce. But there were some important events which had given the greatest consolidation to our strength, and, as such, should not be forgotten. The destruction of the power of Tippoo Sultaun in India, who had fallen a victim to his attachment to France, and his perfidy to us, would surely be thought an important achievement. It had frequently been observed, that great dangers frequently produced, in nations of a manly cast of mind, great and noble exertions; so when the most unparalleled danger threatened the sister kingdom, the feelings of a common cause between the people of both countries, had enabled them to overcome prejudices, some of them perhaps laudable, and all of them deep-rooted, and led to that happy union, which adds more to the power and strength of the British empire, than all the conquests of one and indivisible France do to that country. These were consolations which he wished to recall to the recollection of those who entertained gloomy apprehensions about the strength and resources of Great Britain.

If any additional proofs were wanting, to prove her ability to protect her honour and maintain her interests, let gentlemen look to the last campaign, and they would see Great Britain contending against a powerful confederacy in the North; they would see her fighting for those objects at once in Egypt and in the Baltic, and they would see her successful in both. We had shown, that we were ready to meet the threatened invasion at home, and could send troops to triumph over the French in the barren sands of Egypt, before a man could escape from Toulon, to reinforce their blocked-up army; we had met the menaced invasion by attacking France on her own coasts, and we had seen those ships which were destined for the invasion of this country, moored and chained to their shores, and finding protection only in their batteries. These were not only sources of justifiable pride, but grounds of solid security. What might be the future object of the chief consul of France, he knew not; but if it were to exercise a military despotism, he would venture to predict, that he would not select this country for the first object of his attack; and if we were true to ourselves, we had little to fear from that attack, let it come when it would. But though he did not entertain apprehensions, yet he could not concur with those who thought we ought to lay aside all caution. If such policy were adopted, there would indeed be ground for most serious apprehensions. He hoped every measure would be adopted, which prudence could suggest, to do away animosity between the two countries, and to avoid every ground of irritation by sincerity on our part. This, however, on the other hand, was not to be done by paying abject court to France.

We must depend for security only upon ourselves. If, however, the views of France were correspondent with our own, we had every prospect of enjoying a long peace. He saw some symptoms that they were, though upon this he had no certain knowledge; but he would never rely upon personal character for the security of his country. He was inclined to hope every thing that was good, but he was bound to act as if he feared otherwise.

Mr. Fox rose and said:—At no time, Sir, since I have had the honour of being a member of this House, did I ever give my vote with more heartfelt pleasure than I shall do on the present occasion, in support of the preliminaries of peace between this country and the French republic. And I own, Sir, that I think his majesty's ministers, and the mover of the address, did very wisely in taking that moderate line, and in refraining from all those topics which might have diminished the satisfaction which gentlemen must feel in assenting to the motion now before us. Yet, Sir, for my own part, I have no hesitation in saying, that had even the word "honourable" been introduced into the vote, I should not have declined assenting to it; for I will be bold to say, that unless the peace be honourable, it ought not to come before us. Whether the epithets safe and honourable be convertible, I will not now inquire; but of this I am sure, that among individuals, and much more among nations, honour is the most essential means of safety, as it is the first, and I had almost said the only legitimate ground of war. With regard to another term made use of by the noble lord, I cannot so readily agree with him. I cannot conceive how the term glorious peace could be applied. A glorious peace can only ensue from a glorious war, and such an epithet I never can apply to the late war.

Those who have argued the subject before me have very fairly divided it into two heads: 1st. Whether this peace be preferable to a continuance of the war? this is certainly the most material point: and 2ndly, Whether a better peace could have been obtained? The last point cannot easily be ascertained. If we could have had a better peace without running the risk of continuing the war, his majesty's ministers would undoubtedly have been very blameable in not making a better. But I should like to have it proved to me, how ministers could have made a better.

Sir, I was glad to hear the noble lord, whose speech I admired so much in all the main points of it, lay down that liberal system of policy, that what is gained does not of itself make peace so much the better; nor what is not gained, make it so much the worse. We have gained Ceylon and Trinidad; valuable acquisitions both. We have not gained the Cape, and I am not one of those who regret that we have not, for, from its destination, we shall have all the benefits of that possession without any of the expense of it. Perhaps, Sir, I do not agree with the hon. gentleman, who considers any acquisitions in the Mediterranean as secondary and subordinate points to Ceylon and Trinidad. The noble lord, considering the subject in a commercial point of view, says the Dutch did not possess Minorca, and yet they carried on the principal part of the Levant trade. But it is not in this point of view that I contemplate the question. Desiring peace most ardently, and thinking and hoping it may be a lasting one, I still cannot put entirely out of my consideration the possibility of future wars between the two countries. In any such event, surely Malta would be a more important possession than either Ceylon or Trinidad.

From this digression I return to the question, Why are we to suppose that better terms of peace could have been obtained? I wish to know, Sir, what pressure could have been made upon France that would have induced her to consent to better terms. And here I cannot help repeating, that though I admired much of the noble lord's speech, the part I most admired was that in which he applied the epithet "unsatisfactory;" an epithet chosen with singular felicity to the state of the continent, fairly confessing at the same time, that nothing gave him any reasonable hope of much mending it. But it has been urged, that France could not hurt this country. Not hurt it! That nothing can be more chimerical than the project of invading this country, I am as firmly convinced as any man can be. But are there not many other points which, at this late hour of the night, I will not discuss? Is there any man so blindly fond of the union with Ireland, so widely satisfied with the measures that have been adopted with respect to that country, as to say that the danger of a French force being in Ireland is not at least greater than the danger of an English force landing in France? The only question then is, Whether by pressure of war we could prevail upon France to cede to us Malta or the Cape? Could we have prevailed upon her by pressure upon her colonies? No, for that had been already done. By pressure upon the European territory of France? That idea is absurd. By pressure upon her finances? Here, Sir, I cannot but admire the judicious conduct of his majesty's ministers. They have not sought to delude us by the jargon of of their predecessors, and by senseless assertions of the French being on the brink, and in the very gulf of bankruptcy. They had too much good sense to do it. They adopted another mode of conduct. They well knew, that, by insisting upon Malta or the Cape, they must have made peace on less dignified terms, or they must have continued the war. That we might have gone on with the contest, I am not prepared to deny. I am not blind to the resources of the country. I see one resource while I am speaking. The income-tax is only mortgaged for fifty-five millions of debt. It might have been mortgaged for as much more; but these resources, says the noble lord, and justly, ought to be reserved for the defence of our honour and our independence. I come, then, to this conclusion, that there was little probability of our gaining better terms of peace.

I proceed next to the question, Whether we ought to have accepted these terms, or to have continued the war? I know a noble earl who sits on the same side of the House with myself, has called the peace a complete surrender, a capitulation of our safety; but yet, in the progress of that noble earl's speech, I discovered that he begged to be understood as not preferring another year of war to what he calls this complete surrender. Sir, it happens to many gentlemen, in the heat and hurry of argument, to be guilty of a little oratorical exaggeration. The expression of the noble earl seems to me to be of that description. I confess, Sir, I thought myself to be the last person to contemplate another year of war. But I now find I am absolutely warlike, compared with that noble earl. Yet though I cannot go so far as he does, I am still of opinion that another year of war would have been dreadful. Let me put one or two plain questions to the House. Let me ask every man who hears me, what has been the state of the poor for the two last years? What have we seen throughout the country, in every town and parish? We have seen the poor depending upon alms. We have seen the mass of the people living upon charity, all levelled by the most dangerous equality, an equality of claims to be fed; claims destroying true charity.—Charity do I call it? Sir, one of the worst features of the present times is, that charity loses almost its nature. The claims were irresistible. The miser felt it his indispensable interest to give, as well as the humane. The industrious and the idle, the honest and the dissolute, were all to be fed alike; for, however you might prefer relieving the former, you could not suffer the latter to perish. I think I shall not at this time of day be told, that this evil was unconnected with the war. Have not the events of the last three months established that connection. We have had a most abundant harvest, as well got in as it was plentiful in its produce. I know it did reduce the price of grain, and, in some degree, the prices of other kinds of provision. But we saw that the prices began afterwards to rise again, probably because the fall had been more rapid than was natural. But what was the effect as soon as peace came? The fall from that time was much more rapid and considerable than it had been from the period of the harvest to the peace. Let gentlemen contemplate this picture. Let them say whether the outlines of it be not correct, and then let me ask them, can any man doubt, under such circumstances, whether it be not better for the people to eat, than that we should possess the Cape, or even Malta, could we have gained them at such a price? Another question I would ask is, whether gentlemen ever remember any event that was received with so much joy as the peace with France? But I may be told, that that joy was much greater among the lower classes of the people. Be it so, for the sake of argument. Why, then, I say, that this is only an additional proof of their having connected in their minds the idea of plenty with the prospect of peace. But it is added, that this popular joy was indiscriminating, and that the people never stopped to inquire about the terms. Most correctly true, I believe, is this assertion. But what does it prove? It only proves that the people were so goaded by the war, that they preferred peace almost upon any terms.

and lament that the peace is a glorious one for France. If the peace be glorious for France, without being inglorious to England, it will not give me any concern that it is so. Upon this point, the feelings and opinions of men must depend in a great measure upon their conceptions of the causes of the war. If one of the objects of the war was the restoration of the ancient despotism of France, than which I defy any man to produce in the history of the world a more accursed one; if, I say, that was one of the objects of the war, why then, I say, it is to me an additional recommendation of the peace, that it has been obtained without the accomplishment of such an object. My undisguised opinion is, that if the coalition for the restoration of the Bourbons had succeeded, the consequences would have been amongst all the kings of Europe a perpetual guarantee against all people who might be oppressed by any of them in any part of the world. All countries, therefore, must be benefited by the failure of such a project, but none more so than great Britain. To the people of this country the consequences would have been fatal. Refer to the page of history. Had the coalition in the reign of Charles 1st established such a guarantee, would the liberties of the people have been preserved against the house of Stuart, or would Hampden have gained the immortal victory he did? To come lower down: had such a guarantee existed in later times, would the Revolution of 1688 have been able to maintain itself? I say, therefore, that there could not have been any greater misfortune to the world than the success of that coalition for restoring the Bourbons to the crown of France.

Sir, the noble lord, to whom I have had such frequent occasion to allude, does not, I am sure, expect me to agree with him in opinion upon the earlier periods of the war. Upon those periods, and upon the situation of France at that time, I differ with him directly. I have always conceived that we carried on a war against the freedom and independence of France. Sir, I know I shall be told that France was the first to declare war; but this I contend is no proof of her having been the aggressor. We refused to hear an authorized negociator who was sent to us; we took no steps to procure reparation or disavowal of the acts complained of; and all writers that I have ever read upon the law of nations, agree that the country which refuses to hear what another has to propose, is to be considered the aggressor. The right hon. gentleman who has just sat down, has urged it as a maxim, and I am not prepared to deny it, that whenever the executive government places us at peace with another country, we are bound to speak with decency of the government of that country. If this be true with respect to the conduct we ought to adopt after peace is made, is it not equally our duty to abstain from harsh and insulting language before war is declared? Let gentlemen recollect the language of that right hon. gentleman in December 1792. Let them remember what inflammatory topics he urged, what invectives he made use of at the very time he was proposing that we should abide by our system of neutrality.

Sir, the pretended grounds of the war were the navigation of the Scheldt, the decree of the 19th of November, and other acts of the French government. With respect to Holland, it was no casus fœderis, for she did not desire your assistance. And here, Sir, let me remind the House, that one of the indemnities we have obtained for that war, is from that very ally whom we pretended we entered into the war to defend. But, for my own part, I must confess that I always understood the object of the war to be the restoration of the house of Bourbon. Not that I mean to say that it was the sine quâ non; but I contend that they avowed it with confidence, prosecuted it with perseverance, adhered to it with pertinacity, and relinquished it with difficulty. But they now affirm, that, not being able to obtain what they wished, they contented themselves with securing what they could; that they had a second best object, a succedaneum to put up in case of necessity. Yet who amongst us ever thought that that succedaneum, that second best object, was Ceylon and Trinidad? Who ever imagined that they who had held forth such mighty objects, would ever have admitted the acquisition of an island in the East and in the West to be that "indemnity for the past, and security for the future," for which they had so obstinately and loudly insisted?

I come now, Sir, to the third division of the question:—the subject of guarantees. Suppose you had got, says the right hon. gentleman, a guarantee for Naples or for Piedmont, how would you have enforced it? I admit the justice of his conclusion; but surely I had no right to expect this from the "Deliverer of Europe." I had no right to expect that he, of all men living, would have argued against our interfering in favour of Naples or of Piedmont, because we had not the means of doing it successfully.—I have now, I hope, sufficiently convinced the House, that in the terms and tone of the treaty I perfectly coincide with the noble lord. I approve of the terms. I think the noble secretary has very wisely tempered firmness of conduct with moderation of tone. But farther than this I cannot go with him. I cannot agree with him upon the time in which the treaty was made. It comes, in my opinion, many, many years too late. I would put it to the House, whether, at the period when we were most railed at and reviled for advising pacific measures, any man supposes for a moment that peace would not have been made upon terms equally advantageous with these? Does any man doubt that France, upon the breaking out of the war, would have acceded to much better terms? Does any man doubt that she would then have relinquished Holland, and perhaps abandoned even her designs upon the Netherlands? Would she not have given us better terms, both in the East Indies and the West? I urge this, Sir, with the more earnestness, in order to repel the idea of our being forced into the war. I know there were some gentlemen who admitted that she did not wish to commence hostilities with us at that time, and who told us, that she meant only to give us the privilege of being devoured the last. But might we not, I repeat, at every period since, have obtained better terms of peace than we have done? Could we not have negotiated with more effect after the surrender of Valenciennes? At length a new government was established, and a negotiation was entered into at Paris. That negotiation failed, from the extravagant pretensions of his majesty's ministers. A second negotiation was afterwards begun at Lisle. Whatever may have been said of that negotiation, I would ask, how could we hope for success from it, when it now appears that the sentiments of the members of the cabinet were so various and so opposite? when we find that one of those ministers now thinks that peace to be a good one which gives up the Cape; a possession which, another minister contended, could not be aban-

done without committing a crime deserving the severest punishment. But that negotiation, we have been told, was entered into, not so much from any pacific inclination on the part of his majesty's ministers, as in compliance with the sentiments of the public. We have more than once heard them rejoice in its failure, and avow that they recurred to it for the purpose of facilitating the adoption of a solid system of finance. Such a motive operates now no longer. At length, in January 1800, the chief consul of France makes a direct overture of peace. What answer did we return? Why, that the most effectual mode of facilitating peace would be to restore the Bourbons; that, indeed, was not the only means, but it was left to the French government to suggest any other. Was it the most likely method to prove our pacific wishes to ask Buonaparté to cut his own throat; for the first effect of the restoration of the Bourbons would, in all probability, have been the sacrifice of his life? But were the other means at which we hinted, the possession of Ceylon and Trinidad? Would not Buonaparté at that time have given us up both these islands—aye, and the Cape into the bargain? We might then have had Egypt by the convention of El-Arish. The gallant Abercromby would not, indeed, have fallen covered with laurels in the lap of victory, nor would our brave army have acquired such immortal honour; but we should at least have had Egypt without the loss of blood or of treasure. And what would then have been the case in Europe? The chief consul might not perhaps have relinquished the Netherlands, nor the left bank of the Rhine. But in Italy he had only the Genoese territory: we had nothing then to resist to the south-eastward of the Alps, and the forces of our allies were victorious to the frontiers of France. Then did the right hon. gentleman ransack the English language for epithets of severity and invective against the man whom he now contends we ought to treat with such decorum. But here I must do that right hon. gentleman the justice to acknowledge, that he confessed he indulged in that invective because it pleased him, but that it would be no obstruction in his mind to any other negotiation which circumstances might render it proper to enter into with him. At that time the consideration of the want of the stability of the government operated with considerable power. I urged then, and still urge, that the question of the stability or instability of the government ought not to be treated as of great consequence. I recalled to the recollection of the House, that none of the convulsions or changes of the French revolution, none of the shocks and contentions of the different parties, had produced any material alteration in the relations which France established with foreign powers. She had, at an early period, made peace with Prussia, and with that power she sedulously preserved that peace during all the stormy times that succeeded the ratification of it. But, Sir, we were told by his majesty's ministers to pause. We did pause from January 1800 to October 1801, and we have added 73 millions of debt since the impertinent answer, for I can call it by no other name, returned to the overtures of the chief consul. In other words, Sir, we have added as much to our national debt in that short period, as the whole of our debt consisted of from the period of the Revolution to the seven years' war. This pause of his majesty's ministers cost five times as much as all the duke of Marlborough's campaigns.

But it is said, that the case was altered by the defection of our allies; and the noble lord asks us, whether we would trust to the chance of reviving a third coalition, and the consequent expenditure of blood and treasure? Sir, I say the experience of the first coalition would have been quite sufficient to have deterred me from attempting any other, and the argument would have applied with as much strength many years ago, as it does at the present moment. The noble lord next alludes to the principles and power of France. For my own part, I never had much dread of French principles, though I certainly have no slight apprehension of French power. Of the influence of France upon the continent, I am as sensible as any man can be; but this is an effect which I do not impute to the peace but to the war. It is the right hon. gentleman himself who has been the greatest curse of the country by this aggrandisement of France. To France we may apply what that gentleman applied formerly on another occasion—we may say,

Me Tenedon, Chrysenque, et Cyllan
Apollinis urbes, Et Scyron cepisse.

He is the great prominent cause of all this greatness of the French republic. How did we come into this situation? By maintaining a war upon grounds originally unjust. It was this that excited a spirit of proud independence on the part of the enemy: it was this that lent him such resistless vigour: it was this that gave them energy and spirit, that roused them to such efforts, that inspired them with a patriotism and a zeal which no opposition could check, and no resistance subdue.

If I am asked what my opinion is of the future, my reply is, that, to put us in complete enjoyment of the blessings of peace, small establishments alone are necessary. It is by commercial pursuits and resources that we must attempt to compensate for the aggrandisement of our ancient rival: to cope with him in large establishments, in expensive navies and armies, will be the surest way to unnerve our efforts and diminish our means. Sir, I am not sanguine enough, though I think and hope the peace will be lasting, to calculate on a seventy years' peace. But still I am sanguine to a certain degree in my expectations, that the new state of France will turn the disposition of her people to a less hostile mind towards this country. I do think that Buonaparté's government is less likely to be adverse to Great Britain than the house of Bourbon was. God forbid that I should insult a fallen family; but the interests of my country compel me to say, that the chief consul cannot have a more inveterate spirit, and a more determined hostility towards us, than the house of Bourbon had. It has been said with truth, that the trade of France has been nearly annihilated; but I believe, the accounts from the interior of France do not represent her to be in a desolate state; and for Heaven's sake let us not forget, that the revolution has produced the effect of removing many of those internal grievances under which France groaned under the old government. It has abolished the corvées, a most vexatious tax; the feudalities, the odious and unjust immunities of the rich from the payment of taxes; it has abolished the privileges of the nobility, not those privileges which place the nobility as a barrier between the crown and the people, but those privileges which enabled them to tyrannise over and oppress their inferiors:—in a word, the French have made those reforms which we did two centuries ago.

Sir, for my own part, I cannot help thinking that the encouragement given to the arts and sciences, the increasing patronage in France of agriculture and of commerce, will make the minds of the people more pacific. It is a notorious fact, that the joy with which the French received the communication of the peace, was quite as great and as sincere as it was in this country. The chief consul well knew, that in making peace he fulfilled the desires of the people whom he governs, as much as his majesty's ministers accomplished the wishes of the people of England. What, then, remains to be considered, but this affair of commerce? Many persons are fearful that our commerce will suffer from the competition of France. I have no such fears. As far as our trade can be attacked by the rivalry of France, I think that rivalry will do us good. If, as some of you think, the weight of our taxation will enable France to rival us, is not that, I would ask, an additional argument in favour of peace?

The right hon. gentleman who spoke last, alludes to the principles and power of France. Of the former he is no longer afraid, though he is of the latter. If this be the case, is it not rather strange that he should think of assailing principles by guns and pikes and cannon; but that, when he is afraid of the power of France, he would make peace? Sir, principles never were, and never will be annihilated by force. I never had so much dread as some gentlemen had of French principles. I never conceived that they would have much influence in this country. I never thought that Paris, under the dominion of Robespierre held out a very inviting example to the British capital. Sir, the French revolution was calculated to fix men's minds more eagerly upon the question of liberty. But, was the sword the best means of opposing it? Disgrace and defeat might have tended to weaken it in the opinion of many, but victory and glory only gave it additional currency and credit with the great mass of the people.

I proceed now to a subject connected with our domestic situation; I mean Ireland, which one noble lord seems to think has been treated with a delicate hand. Of the union with Ireland I will not at this late hour enter into an investigation; time will best show whether it be likely to strengthen the connexion between the two countries, But when we hear of this mixture of delicacy and firmness, let me ask what delicacy there was in the burnings and massacres? The noble lord has been incautious in the selection of his words; he has spoken of indulgences to be granted to the people in consequence of the peace. Is the substitution of common law for martial law, or the restoration of the Habeas Corpus, to be considered as an indulgence? Sir, there were times in which these were considered as sacred pillars of the constitution, not as indulgencies. If they are restored to vigour, I shall receive them as a right. I cannot be grateful for them as a boon.—Sir, I have nothing more to say, but to thank the House for the attention with which they have honoured me, and to beg pardon for having trespassed on them so long. I rejoice at the peace—cordially, sincerely, heartily rejoice at it. I hope it will be lasting. I believe it will; but to the last hour of my life I shall never cease lamenting that it was not made years ago, when we might perhaps have had better terms, but when we could certainly have had as good as those which have been submitted to us this day.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that after the able arguments that had been advanced in favour of the question, it was difficult to find any topics that had not before been alluded to. It had always appeared to him, as well as to many others, that the duty of negotiation commenced when all hopes of continental aid in checking the power of France were at an end. His predecessors had been of this opinion, and had twice sought a negotiation, though their efforts had been unsuccessful. As soon, therefore, as his majesty had been graciously pleased to deliver the authority of the country into the hands of the present ministers, they had thought it necessary to follow the same example. They had commenced a negotiation, and their efforts had been crowned with success. A comparison had been made between the terms which were proposed at Lisle, and those which had now been agreed upon; but it should be recollected, that since the negotiation at Lisle, the national debt of this country had increased no less than 150 millions. At that negotiation it was proposed to restore to France and her allies all that had been taken from them; a measure that must have been more dangerous to us at that time than it could be at present, because Tippoo Sultaun was then in force, and in connexion with France. In the Mediterranean, we did not then stipulate for the establishment of the republic of the Seven Islands, which now form a barrier to Turkey on the eastern side. In the West Indies we were in possession of Cape Nicola Mole and Jeremie, in addition to our other conquests; them we agreed to give up, keeping only the Cape and Trinidad. Upon the whole, he was decidedly of opinion that the terms now obtained were more favourable for the country than those proposed at Lisle.—He then entered into an examination of the present articles, which he contended were calculated very much to effect the security of our Eastern and Western possessions. To those who wished to continue the war for the purpose of reducing the power of France, he wished to state, that another campaign could not be made at a less expense than forty millions, and a perpetual annuity (except for the operation of the sinking fund) of two millions per annum, in addition to our other burthens. Even certain success would not have been worth such a price. He perfectly concurred with his noble friend in thinking that we ought to watch with care any tendency to increase the colonial system of this country. He was by no means satisfied of the wisdom of those whose object seemed to be to prevent France from becoming a commercial power. He wished to see France possessed of commerce; he wished to see her possessed of interests which would make her conscious of our maritime power. He wished to see her possessed of interests which, in the case of an unfortunate rupture, we might have the means of attacking. A right hon. friend of his used to say, that in this contest we had gained all which we had not lost; but in concluding this treaty we had acted with the greatest honour and good faith to our allies; we had preserved all our ancient dominions, and had made important acquisitions both in the East and in the West. Independent of all this, an arrangement had been made with the powers of the North, by which our rights had been fully recognised and secured; and finally, that great and most beneficial measure, the union with Ireland, had been carried into complete effect. We had closed the contest with consolidated power, and with augmented means, which he was convinced would make the power of this country equal to that of France. He was ready, however, to acknowledge, that it depended upon the wisdom of government and of that House, whether this peace should be a blessing or a misfortune. On the part of the king's present ministers, he could only say, that the peace which had been made honestly, should be kept faithfully. No encouragement should be given to any persons, whatever their character might be, to subvert the present government of France. It would require the utmost caution to accomplish all the objects which they had in view; they ought to adopt a line of conduct, not of suspicion and jealousy, but of prudence and circumspection; and he was bound in candour and fairness to state, that it would be necessary to provide new means of security, such as were never before known in time of peace. If he were asked, whether this was founded upon a suspicion of the sincerity of the enemy? he would answer, No; but he could not look upon the map of Europe, without being convinced that such was the conduct which their duty prescribed to them. The system to be adopted must be one plainly directed to the security of the country; not calculated to promote patronage or to excite jealousies. He flattered himself that when the subject came to be investigated, it would not be found difficult to adopt a system of defence, which would be fully adequate to the security of the country. He could not help expressing, upon this occasion, his sense of the danger to which this country would be exposed, if proper measures were not adopted for its security. There were many other points necessary to be provided for, but which it was unnecessary to enter into at present; nor would he, at that late hour, have troubled the House with his sentiments, but for the imputation which had been thrown out against him for keeping an improper silence.

The motion was agreed to without a division; and the House adjourned at half past three in the morning.

Nov. 4. Sir Edmund Hartopp brought up the Report of the Address to his majesty, on the preliminaries of peace with France.

Mr. Henry Lascelles said, that as he had supported the war, it became his duty to give his reasons for voting in favour of the peace. He had always considered, that the best way of opposing the politics of France, was by stemming the torrent of her military progress; but he did not now think it in the power of this country to prevent the acquisitions of France upon the continent. He was of opinion, that the glorious achievements of our navy had placed this country in a situation of honour; and considered that the exertions we had made, would be viewed by history as highly meritorious. Although he had given his vote for the preliminaries, yet, when he considered the state of France, he could not rejoice at the peace without a mixture of anxiety and apprehension; and in giving his vote, he had done it in full confidence that ministers would continue the military and naval strength of the country, upon that establishment which would prevent France from suddenly making any attempt against us; and that they would also keep a strict watch to prevent the effect of those principles which he considered the most serious evil against which we had to contend.

Mr. Windham* rose and said:—Sir; in the present stage of this business, and in a House so little numerous, I am not disposed to take up the subject in the way in which I should have wished to consider it, had I been able, with tolerable satisfaction to myself, to deliver my sentiments in the debate of last night. Something, however, I wish to say, founded in a great measure on what then took place. All that I heard, and all that I saw, on that occasion, tends only to confirm more and more the deep despair in which I am plunged, in contemplating the probable consequences of the present treaty.

Notwithstanding some lofty talk which we heard of dignity and firmness, and which I shall be glad to see realized, and a happy quotation, expressive of the same sentiments, from my right hon. friend not now present (Mr. Pitt), the real amount of what was said, seems to be little more than this:—that France has, to be sure, the power of destroying us, but that we hope she will not have the inclination;—that we are under the paw of the lion, but that he may happen not to be hungry, and, instead of making a meal of us, may turn round in his den, and go to sleep. This is not stated in so many words; but it will be difficult to show, that it is not the fair result of the arguments.

* "During the prorogation of parliament in 1801, the new ministers settled preliminaries of peace with France and her allies. This measure Mr. Windham regarded, not less in the terms than in the principle, as highly dangerous to the interests of the country. On the first discussion of this subject, which was upon an Address of thanks to his majesty, he was unable to deliver his sentiments; but on the following day, when the report of the Address was brought up, he pronounced the celebrated speech which he afterwards published in the form of a pamphlet, by subjoining to it an Appendix, which is valuable for the information it contains, as well as for the vigour with which it is composed." Amyot's Life of Mr. Windham, p. 48.

That I should have lived to see the day, when such arguments could be used in a British House of Commons!—that I should have lived to see a House of Commons, where such arguments could be heard with patience, and even with complacency! The substance of the statement is this. We make peace, not from any necessity actually existing (my hon. friends, with great propriety, reject that supposition),* but because we foresee a period, at no great distance, when such a necessity must arise; and we think it right that provision for such a case should be made in time. We treat, or, to take at once the more appropriate term, we capitulate, while we have yet some ammunition left. General Menou could do no more. General Menou could do no more in one sense; but in another he did, I fear, a great deal more,—a point to which I must say a word hereafter: he did not abandon to their fate those whom he had invited to follow his fortunes, and to look up to him as their protector. Both, however, capitulated; and upon the plain and ordinary grounds of such a proceeding, namely, that their means of resistance must soon come to an end, and that they had no such hopes of any fortunate turn in their favour, as to justify a continuance of their resistance in the mean time. The conduct of both in the circumstances supposed, was perfectly rational; but let us recollect, that those who stand in such circumstances, be they generals or be they nations, are, to all intents and purposes, conquered! I know not what other definition we want of being conquered, than that a country can say to us, “we can hold out, and you cannot; make peace, or we will ruin you:” and that you in consequence, make peace, upon terms which must render a renewal of hostilities, under any provocation, more certainly fatal than a continuation of that war, which you already declare yourselves unable to bear.

If such be the fact, we may amuse ourselves with talking what language we please; but we are a conquered people. Buonaparté is as much our master, as he is of Spain or Prussia, or any other of those countries, which, though still permitted to call themselves independent, are, as every body knows, as completely in his power, as if the name of department was already written upon their foreheads. There are but two questions: Is the relation between the countries such, that France can ruin us by continuing the war? and will that relation in substance remain the same, or rather will it not be rendered infinitely worse, by peace, upon the terms now proposed?—If both these questions are answered in the affirmative, the whole is decided, and we live henceforward by sufferance from France.

Sir, before we endeavour to estimate our prospects in this new and honourable state of existence, I wish to consider, for a moment, what the reasonings are, that have determined our choice, as to the particular mode of it; and why we think that ruin by war must be so much more speedy and certain, than ruin by peace. And here I will take pretty much the statement given by the hon. gentlemen who argue on the other side.

I agree, that the question is not, whether this peace be good or bad, honourable or dishonourable, adequate or inadequate; whether it places us in a situation better or worse, than we had reason to expect, or than we were in before the war. All these are parts of the question, and many of them very material parts; but the question itself is, whether the peace now proposed, such as it is, be better, or not, than a continuation of hostilities?—Whether, according to a familiar mode of speech, we may not go farther and fare worse?—Whether, to take the same form in a manner somewhat more developed and correct, the chances of faring better, compared with the chances of faring worse, and including the certainty of the intermediate evils, do not render it advisable upon the whole that we should rest contented where we are.

This I take to be the statement of the question, on the present, and on all similar occasions ; nor do I know of any addition necessary to be made, except to observe, that in estimating the terms of peace in the manner here proposed, you are not merely to consider the physical force, or pecuniary value, of the objects concerned, but also the effect which peace made in such and such circumstances, is likely to have on the character and estimation of the country ; a species of possession, which, though neither tangible nor visible, is as much a part of national strength, and has as real a value, as any thing that can be turned into pounds and shillings, that can be sold by the score or hundred, or weighed out in avoirdupois. Accordingly a statesman, acting for a great country, may very well be in the situation of saying,—I would make peace at this time, if nothing more were in question, than the value of the objects now offered me, compared with those which I may hope to obtain : but when I consider what the effect is, which peace, made in the present circumstances, will have upon the estimation of the country ; what the weakness is which it will betray ; what the suspicions it will excite ; what the distrust and alienation it will produce, in the minds of all the surrounding nations ; how it will lower us in their eyes ; how it will teach them universally to fly from connexion with a country, which neither protects its friends, nor seems any longer capable of protecting itself, in order to turn to those, who, while their vengeance is terrible, will not suffer a hair of the head to be touched, of any who will put themselves under their protection ;—when I consider these consequences, not less real, or permanent, or extensive, than those which present themselves in the shape of territorial strength or commercial resources, I must reject these terms, which otherwise I should feel disposed to accept, and say, that, putting character into the scale, the inclination of the balance is decidedly the other way.

* It would have been too much to have urged the plea of poverty in a country, which was at that moment exciting the envy and jealousy of all the world by its exorbitant wealth.

Sir, there is in all this nothing new or refined, or more than will be admitted by every one in words ; though there seems so little disposition to adhere to it in fact.—If we refer to the practice of only our own time, what was the case of the Falkland Islands and Nootka ? Was it the value of these objects, that we were going to war for ? The one was a barren rock, an object of competition for nothing but seals and sea-gulls ; the other a point of land in a wilderness, where some obscure, though spirited, adventurers had hoped that they might in time establish a trade with the savages for furs. Were these objects to involve nations in wars ? If there was a question of their doing so, it was because considerations of a far different kind were attached to them—considerations of national honour and dignity ; between which and the objects themselves, there may often be no more proportion, than between the picture of a great master, and the canvas on which it is painted.

If I wished for authorities upon such a subject, I need go no farther than to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox), who has recurred to a sentiment produced by him formerly with something of paradoxical exaggeration (though true in the main), namely that wars for points of honour are really the only rational and prudential wars in which a country can engage. Much of the same sort is the sentiment of another popular teacher, Junius, who, upon the subject of these very Falkland islands, says, in terms which it may be worth while to quote, not for the merit of the language, nor the authority of the writer,—though neither of them without their value,—but to show what were once the feelings of Englishmen, and what the topics chosen by a writer, whose object it was to recommend himself to the people : “ To depart in the minutest article, from the nicety and strictness of punctilio, is as dangerous to national honour, as it is to female virtue. The woman who admits of one familiarity, seldom knows where to stop, or what to refuse ; and when the counsels of a great country give way in a single instance, when they are once inclined to submission, every step accelerates the rapidity of their descent !”

We are not therefore, according to the present fashion, to fall to calculating, and to ask ourselves, what is the value at market of such and such an object, and how much it will cost us to obtain it. If these objects alone were at stake, I should admit the principle in its full force ; and should be among the first to declare, that no object of mere pecuniary value could ever be worth obtaining at the price of a war ; but when particular points of honour are at stake, as at Nootka or the Falkland islands (without inquiring, whether in those cases the point of honour was either well chosen, or rightly estimated) ; and still more, where general impression, where universal estimation, where the conception to be formed of the feelings, temper, power, policy, and views of a great nation are in question, there to talk of calculating the loss or profit of possessions to which these considerations may be attached by their price at market, or the value of their fee-simple, is like the idea of Dr. Swift, when he is comparing the grants to the duke of Marlborough, with the rewards of a Roman conqueror, and estimates the crown of laurel at two-pence.

The first question for a great country to ask itself,—the first in point of order and the first in consequence,—is this: is the part which I am about to act consonant to that high estimation which I have hitherto maintained among the nations of the world? Will my reputation suffer?—whether that reputation relate to the supposed extent of its means, to the vigour and wisdom of its counsels, or to the uprightness of its intentions. If, in any of these ways, the country is to sustain a loss of character; if the effect of what is proposed be to render it less respected, less looked up to, less trusted, less feared; if its firmness in times of trial, its fidelity to its engagements, its steady adherence to its purposes through all fortunes are to be called in question; it must be a strong necessity indeed, stronger than any which I believe to exist in the present instance, that ought to induce it even to listen to counsel liable to be attended with any of these consequences. It must be a weighty danger, that in the scales of a great country, can be allowed to balance the loss of any part of its dignity. What then shall we say of a country, which, abandoning from the outset every consideration of this sort, will not wait till it becomes insecure by ceasing to be respectable, but becomes unrespectable by ceasing to be secure? Which drops at once at the feet of its rival? Which begins by a complete surrender of its security; and suffers fame, character, dignity and every thing else to go along with it?

* The answer to be given to this question, in the case of the present treaty, will be best ascertained perhaps by recurring to what happened when the terms of the treaty were first declared. It was some time before any body could be found to believe them. The first reporters, when they stated that every thing was given up, except Ceylon and Trinidad; that Demerara, Cochin, the Cape, Malta, all were gone; were treated as persons who were joking, or who were themselves the dupes of some idle joke put about by the opposition. Nobody could believe that the terms of the treaty were in reality such as that description represented them. On the continent, where the speculations are apt to be more refined; after some time given to disbelief, the difficulty was solved by the supposition of secret articles. "Some great advantages were to be secured to Great Britain of another kind:" "Buonaparté was to abdicate:" "Louis the 18th was to be restored:" &c. &c. It never entered the thought of any one, that the state of things was finally to prove, what it appeared in the first instance; and that from mere impatience of contest, from sheer impotence of mind, Great Britain had thus suddenly stopped in her career, dropped down as in a fit, and, abandoning all her means of defence, was rolling herself in the dust at the feet of her adversary, regardless of what in future was to become of her, and looking to nothing but such temporary respite, as "the satiate fury" of the foe, or some feeling still more degrading to her, might happen to yield.

Whether such is the situation of this country, we shall judge better by taking a short view of the terms of the proposed peace. The description of these is simple and easy:—France gives nothing, and, excepting Trinidad, and Ceylon, England gives every thing. If it were of any consequence to state what in diplomatic language was the basis of this treaty, we must say, that it had no one basis; but that it was the status quo, on the part of England, with the two exceptions in its favour, of Ceylon and Trinidad; and the uti possidetis, with the addition of all the other English conquests, on the part of France. But what may be the technical description of the treaty, is, comparatively, of little importance. It is the result that is material, and the extent of power and territory, now, by whatever means, actually remaining in the hands of France. The enumeration of this, liable indeed in part to the disputed, but upon the whole sufficiently correct, may be made as follows:

In Europe.—France possesses the whole of the continent,* with the exception of

* This position will not be thought to have become less commanding by the completion of an event, which, lost as this country is to all feeling of its situation, does seem to have produced some slight sensation, namely, the extinction of the Cisalpine Republic, and the reproduction of it under the new form and title of the Italian. Those who before doubted, to what degree Buonaparté was master of Europe, may find here wherewithal to settle their opinion. It is not the mere assumption

Russia and Austria. If it be said, that parts of Germany, and the northern courts of Denmark and Sweden are not fairly described as being immediately under the control of France, we must balance this consideration by remarking, the influence which France possesses in these governments, and the commanding position which she occupies with respect to Austria, by the possession of Switzerland and Mantua, and those countries which have been considered always, and twice in the course of the present war, have proved to be the direct inlet into the heart of her dominions.

In Asia,—Pondichery, Mahé, Cochin, Negapatam, the Spice Islands.

In Africa,—the Cape of Good Hope, Goree, Senegal.

In the sea that is enclosed by these three continents, which connects them all, and furnishes to us in many respects our best and surest communication with them,—the Mediterranean,—every port and post except Gibraltar, from one end of it to the other,* including the impregnable of so much new territory, or of so much new dominion at least, over a territory already dependent; nor the new danger arising from thence to Austria (either of them circumstances, that in former times, would have set the continent in a flame), but what the state must be of the powers of Europe, whoever they are, when they can sit quiet spectators of this proceeding, without daring to stir a step to prevent it. The assumption of this territory, though it be only a change in the form of the dominion exercised over it, must by no means be considered as of little importance. As has been well observed (vide Cobbett's Register, vol. 1, page 114), the use to be made of a country, in any state of independence, however nominal, is by no means the same, as when that country is placed at once in the hands of the governing power. France is mistress, it is true, of Spain and Prussia, and of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Tuscany, and all the south of Italy; but not to the same degree of the two former countries, as she is of the others; nor of the others, in the same manner as she is of the new Italian Republic. There may be a difference of several weeks.

* Among the posts and ports included in this description, we must not omit to particularize the island of Elba, with its port, Porto Ferrajo. This little island, small in extent, but not small in consequence, and rendered nobly conspicuous at the close of the day, by the last parting rays of British glory, which fell upon it, was supposed by the provisions of the treaty of Luneville to have been left indirectly only in the power of France; and invaluable port of Malta; so as to exclude us from a sea, which it had ever before been the anxious policy of Great Britain to keep in her hands,—and to render it now, truly and properly, what it was once idly called, the sea of France.

In the West Indies,—St. Domingo,*

inasmuch as it was expressly stipulated, that it was to form part of the territories of the new king of Etruria,—a king made by France; in the wantonness of her malice, and as a mockery of the ancient sovereigns of Europe. The possession of the island, however, in this way was not thought sufficient; and therefore, that nothing might be wanting to mark that perfect contempt of good faith which has never failed to be manifested by the republic in all her transactions with other countries, Elba was to be obtained by a secret treaty with the king of Spain,—the chief of the house of which the king of Etruria was a member. The consequence was, that when Austria in the treaty of Luneville, and England in the late preliminary treaty, thought that they had left this island, such as it had always been before, part and parcel of the duchy of Tuscany, they found it, to their great surprise, rising up against them, as a separate possession in the hands of France, ready to be employed for the more easy subjugation of Naples, and for whatever other purposes France might have to prosecute in that quarter of the world.—It is not easy to conceive an instance of more contemptuous imposition on one side, nor of more forlorn and pitiable acquiescence on the other.

* Great doubt seems to be entertained at this moment, whether France will or will not finally obtain possession of St. Domingo; and great exultation to be felt in consequence by those, who, a few months ago, upon the ground that the conquest of St. Domingo, by France, was necessary for the security of our own islands, had consented to so extraordinary a measure as the sending out an immense armament, from the enemy's ports, in the interval between the preliminary and the definitive treaties. The probability is, that France will succeed, so far at least as to keep possession of part of the island; but should she not, then all the terrors affected to be felt at the establishment of a black empire, will return with ten-fold force; for the blacks will remain masters,—and masters after having tried their powers in a regular contest with European troops,—not to mention the hostility which they may well be suspected to conceive against us, who after various treaties and negotiations, the nature of which may require hereafter a little examination, finally lent our assistance to the sending out a force, intended for the purpose of bringing them back to slavery. Should the other event happen, and France obtain possession of St. Domingo, it may then well be a question, both the French and Spanish parts, Martinico, St. Lucie, Guadaloupe, Tobago, Curaco.

In North America,—St. Pierre and Miquelon, with a right to the fisheries in the fullest extent to which they were ever claimed; Louisiana (so it is supposed),* how long we shall remain in possession of Jamaica. So little can ordinary men enter into that profound scheme of policy, which would give to your enemy at a peace, or even before peace was concluded, what you had yourself been attempting to acquire during the war, at the expense of more than ten thousand men, and probably of twice as many millions of money.

* What is here supposed is now found to be the fact. By a secret treaty settled with Spain, on the 21st March, 1801, but not to be declared till after peace with England, or till ministers should be found, who, previously to peace, would suffer France to do what she pleased, Spain cedes to France the possession of Louisiana, and with it, as is supposed, that of the two Floridas. It is impossible to pretend that this event was one which could not have been foreseen. It was foreseen by the treaty of Utrecht; it was foreseen by the fears of every reflecting American; it was pointed out to the people of America, nearly six years ago, not only as an event likely to happen, but as likely to happen in the very mode which we have now seen (vide Cobbett's Register, page 199.) Putting foresight out of the question, the fact must have been known, had the ministers here either dared to question France, or instead of allowing France to negotiate for her allies, insisted on treating directly with those powers themselves.

Dreadful is their responsibility, by whom these precautions have been neglected, and by whom these things have finally been suffered to happen. But the crime or madness of those who have caused these evils, is less to us than the evils themselves. France has hitherto reckoned her progress by states and kingdoms: she may now count by continents: she has established herself in the new world. By the possession of these countries, placed as they are, and combined with those which before belonged to her, she will hold, as by a sort of middle handle, the two great divisions of this quarter of the globe, and will brandish these continents like the blades of that tremendous instrument, which did such signal service in the patriot hands of lord Edward Fitzgerald.

The consequences of this acquisition in one of the two hemispheres (North America) are well detailed, in different parts of the work above referred to [See p. 44, 199, 253, and 265]. France, planted now in the same continent with the United States, cutting them off from some of their richest districts, extending her settlements behind them, gra-

a word dreadful to be pronounced, to all who consider the consequences with which that cession is pregnant, whether as it acts northward, by its effects upon the United States, or southward, as opening a direct passage into the Spanish settlements in America.

dually but not slowly, till the mouths of the Mississippi shall be united with the sources of the St. Lawrence, will soon make them feel the want of that security which they have hitherto derived from an intervening ocean: and against a new and unconsolidated mass of states, will finally effect that, which it required only ten years to accomplish against the old and well-compacted governments of Europe. In the mean-while we may employ ourselves in considering, what is likely to be her control over the conduct of America as respecting this country; what the danger to Canada, and to that portion of our trade, which is carried on with those countries; what the effect of a French establishment in Louisiana and the Floridas, joined to what France will have in St. Domingo, Martinique, and Guadaloupe, upon the whole of our West-Indian interests and possessions.

But it is on the other side, and towards the South, that the scene is most awful; where we behold the whole wealth of the new world lying exposed in goodly prospect, and France, with no other point to settle than the moment when it may suit her convenience to take possession of it. Buonaparté, established in Louisiana, has as ready an access to the treasures of the Spanish mines, as any banker has to his strong box. Thanks to those who have given him the key of them. The wealth of Spain will from henceforward, directly and immediately, and with no necessity for any intermediate process, be the wealth of France: and let no man flatter himself with the hope, that it will become in her hands, what it was in those of its former possessors, the means of enfeebling strength, and relaxing industry and exertion. In succeeding to the riches of Spain, there is no ground to hope, that France will succeed to her weakness or folly. She will better profit by the example of her predecessors, and will keep her wealth in a due and perfect subordination to the higher and dearer interests of her ambition. Her mines will be only the store-house of her power. She will see, in these dark repositories, nothing but a magazine of future wars; which, like winds from the cave of Æolus, will rush forth to sweep the earth, and level whatever may yet be found to oppose the final accomplishment of her wishes.

In South America,—Surinam, Demerara, Berbice, Essequibo, taken by us and now ceded; Guiana, and by the effect of the treaty, fraudulently signed by France with Portugal just before the signature of these preliminaries, a tract of country extending to the river Amazon, and giving to France the command of the entrance into that river. Whether, by any secret article, the evils of this cession will prove to have been done away, time will discover.* In fact, (be that as it may), France may be said to possess the whole of the Spanish and Portuguese settlements upon that continent. For who shall say, that she has not the command of those settlements, when she has the command of the countries to which they belong;—cum custodit ipsos custodes? She has, in truth, whatever part of the continent of struction, does not present an image of more unequal contest, than Great Britain struggling with a power, which combines against her the old world and the new; which to the force of nearly the whole continent of Europe, to something in Asia, to much in Africa, and more in the West-Indies, adds the naval resources of the continent of North America, and the wealth of the Spanish mines.

All these latter dangers, be it remembered, are created solely and exclusively by the peace. While war continued, these resources could never have gone to the enemy; they might, at any moment when necessity had been pressing, or hope in Europe had become extinct, have been secured to ourselves. The fear of this was probably the cause which preserved so long to Spain and Portugal the nominal independence which they have enjoyed. But these advantages (we shall be told) could only be obtained by war; and war is ruin.—Not exactly indeed to every country; because to France it has proved the means of empire and greatness; and even in Great Britain, up to the period of the ninth year of war, the progress of ruin did not seem to be very alarming. We shall know, before long, what the efficacy is of that provision, which grave and sober men have made for the happiness and safety of their country, in peace.

* There is no chance that the evils of the peace in this respect will be done away, whatever may become of the particular cession here alluded to. Between the boundary settled by the treaty of Madrid and the boundary now contended for, in whatever treaty this latter is to be found, the difference is so small as hardly to be worth disputing. Either will give to France the command of the river Amazon. In this view the French may possibly concede the point: unless indeed the assurances given by our ministers, that they meant to do so, may be a reason with them for maintaining it.

South America she chooses to occupy; and as far as relates to the Spanish part, without even the necessity, a necessity that probably would not cost her much, of infringing any part of the present treaty.

Such is the grand and comprehensive circle to which the new Roman empire may be soon expected to spread, now that peace has removed all obstacles, and opened to her a safe and easy passage into the three remaining quarters of the globe. Such is the power, which we are required to contemplate without dismay! under the shade of whose greatness we are invited to lie down with perfect tranquillity and composure! I should be glad to know, what our ancestors would have thought and felt in this situation? what those weak and deluded men, so inferior to the politicians of the present day,* the Marlboroughs, the Godolphins, the Somers, the king Willlams, all those who viewed with such apprehension the power of Louis 14th; what they would say to a peace, which not only confirms to France the possession of nearly the whole of Europe, but extends her empire over every other part of the globe. Is there a man of them, who would not turn in his coffin, could be sensible to a twentieth part of that which is passing, as perfect matter of course, in the politics of the present moment?

* There have always been, in the House of Commons, some half-dozen or dozen sensible men, who having found out, that Great Britain was an island, have been of opinion that all continental connexions are injurious, and calculated only to fill the pockets of those, who, in return for English guineas, had nothing to give but the valour and military talents of their subjects. As the progress of reason is slow, this party had remained for a century or more in a very obscure minority, opposed by all who for their wisdom or talents, or supposed knowledge of public affairs, had figured at any time in the history of the country. But oppressed as the party had long been, they have lived to see the day, when their opinions are at length triumphant; and when the ministers of the country, with the full approbation of parliament and of the nation, are settling a treaty of peace upon a formal recognition of their principle, and declare in substance, that Great Britain has no longer any concern or interest in the affairs and situation of the continent. It is only unfortunate, that time has not yet been given to evince the truth of this principle by experience. When it shall be seen that the renunciation of foreign connexions, and retreat into our insular resources, shall have produced no harm, but that, on the contrary, the power and prosperity of Great Britain shall have risen higher than before, then will this doctrine have received its full and final confirmation.

But to all these mighty dangers we have it seems one great security to oppose; not that degrading and bastard security to which I have before adverted, and to which, I fear, I must again recur—that France is lassata if not satiata; that having run down her prey, she will be content to spare it, and be willing for awhile to leave us unmolested;—but a national, sober, well-founded security, applicable to the supposition that she may not be wanting in the will to hurt us, but will happily not possess the power. This great security, we are told, is our wealth. We are, it seems, so immensely rich, our prosperity stands on so sure and wide a basis, we have such a pyramid of gold, so beautifully constructed, and so firmly put together, that we may safely let in all the world to do their worst against it; they can never overturn it, and might spend ages in endeavouring to take it to pieces. We seem to consider our commercial prosperity, like those articles of property, timber, marble, and others of that sort, which, however valuable, may be safely left unguarded, being too weighty and bulky to be carried away.

Sir, the first circumstance that strikes one in this statement, is, that odd inconsistency, by which a country that makes peace on account of its poverty, is to rest its whole hope of security in that peace, upon its wealth. If our wealth will protect us, it is a great pity that this discovery was not made long ago; it would have saved us many years of painful struggle; have kept in our hands a great additional portion of these very means of protection; and have lessened considerably the dangers against which such protection is wanted. But wealth, I fear, abstracted from certain means of using it, carries with it no powers of protection, either for itself or others. Riches are strength, in the same manner only as they are food. They may be the means of procuring both. But we shall fall into a great a folly, as in the fable of Midas, if we suppose that when we have laid down our arms, and surrendered our fortresses, our wealth, alone, can afford us any protection. I cannot therefore, for my own part, understand what it meant by this, unless it be, that by superiority of capital, and priority of market, of which I allow the effects to be immense, we might, if things were left to themselves, in a fair competition, in a fair race, still keep a-head of our competitors, in spite of all the multiplied advantages which France will now possess. This might be so; though it is by no means clear that it would. But the competition will not be left to its natural course.* This game will not be fairly played. Buonaparté is a player, who, if the game is going against him, will be apt to pick a quarrel, and ask us, if we can draw our swords.—And here, perhaps, it is time to remark the singular fallacy, which has run through all the reasonings of gentlemen on the other side; that, namely, of supposing that in discussing the present question, the peace, such as it is, the state which is to be contrasted with the continuance of the war.—They forgot, or choose that we should forget, that this peace may, at any moment, at the mere pleasure of the enemy, be converted into a new war; differing only from the other, by the ground which we in the mean-while shall have lost, and the numerous advantages which the enemy will have acquired. There is not the least reason why this treaty, if the enemy should so please, should be any thing more than a mere piece of legerdemain, by which they shall have got possession of Malta, have established themselves in all their new colonies, have perhaps re-entered Egypt, have received back twenty or thirty thousand seamen, and have otherwise put themselves into a situation to recommence the war, with new and decisive advantages. If they do not immediately take this course, will be, simply, because they will hope to succeed as well without it; or, because they choose to defer it till a more convenient opportunity: the means will, at every moment, be in their power.

Two suppositions are, therefore, always to be made, and two comparisons to be instituted, when we talk of the merits of this peace: 1st, That the enemy will choose to adhere to it; or, 2dly, that they will break it: and the two comparisons to be formed in consequence are, 1st, The comparison between a continuation of the war and a state of peace, such as peace will be under the present treaty; and 2dly, a comparison of the war, so continued, with such a war as France may revive at any moment after the present treaty shall have taken effect.

* See Etat de la France, by Hauterive, a work published at Paris, in 1800, immediately under the direction of the French government, and universally understood to be intended as a sort of manifesto of their sentiments. See also the various regulations introduced for the prohibition of our manufactures, even in the interval between the preliminary and definitive treaties.

What the condition and feelings of the country would be, in this latter case, namely that of a renewed war, I need hardly point out. The dread in fact of what they would be, will operate so strongly, that the case will never happen. The country will never bear to put itself in a situation, in which the sense of its own folly will press upon it in a way so impossible to be endured. At all events, with its present feelings and opinions, the country never can go to war again, let France do what she will; for, if we are of opinion, that war, continued at present, must be ruin in the course of a few years, what do we suppose it must be, when, to replace us, where we now are, we must begin by the recovery of that list of places, which the present treaty has given up? France, therefore, will be under no necessity of going to war with us; and nothing but her own intemperance and insolence, and an opinion of our endurance and weakness, beyond even what they may be found to deserve, can force upon us that extremity. She has much surer and safer means of going to work; means, at the same time, sufficiently quick in their operation to satisfy any ordinary ambition; she has nothing to do but to trust to the progress of her own power in peace, quickened, as often as she shall see occasion, by a smart threat of war. I cannot conceive the object, which a judicious application of these two means is not calculated to obtain. A peace, such as France has now made, mixed with proper proportions of a seasonable menace of war, is a specific, for the undoing of a rival country, which seems to me impossible to fail.—Let us try it in detail.—Suppose France, by an arrangement with that independent power, Spain, similar to the arrangement which, in violation of the treaty of Utrecht, produced the surrender of Louisiana, and of the Spanish half of St. Domingo,*

should obtain the cession (which would be in violation of no treaty), of all the Spanish settlements in America: would you consider that as an occasion of war? Suppose Portugal, the integrity of whose possessions is in some sense or other guaranteed to her, but who is not prevented, I presume, by that guarantee from parting with any of them that she pleases, should choose, in kindness to France, to make over to her any of those settlements which she, Portugal, still retains,—would that, again, be a cause of war? By these two ways, without the infraction of any treaty, without any act which could be construed to be an aggression, much less which we should be inclined to treat as such, might France render herself completely mistress of the continent of South America. Is there any commercial claim, then, that France could set up, any commercial regulation which she could introduce, either in her own name, or that of her allies, of a nature the most injurious and fatal to our commerce, which we should make a case of resistance, and think of magnitude enough to involve the nation in another war?—The augmentation of her marine. To which professedly she means to direct all her efforts, and the increase of her establishments to any amount that she pleases; these are objects which it would be perfectly ridiculous to talk of, or to suppose that we should make the subject even of the most friendly remonstrance. Indeed, according to the modern doctrines of not interfering in the internal concerns of another country, I do not understand upon what pretence the armament of a state can ever become a subject of representation, since nothing sure is so completely an internal concern, as what any nation does with its own military or naval forces, upon its own soil, or in its own harbours. But setting aside these smaller objects, suppose France was to re-invade Egypt; was, without waiting even for the form of a surrender from the order, to take forcible possession of Malta; was to land a body of troops in Greece, and either in that way, or by

against the cession of any of these settlements as against the cession of St. Domingo; but it is one of the distinguishing characters of the late preliminaries,—and a most alarming one it is—that contrary to the almost uniform practice, they revived no former treaties; so that the treaty of Utrecht, as respecting this country and France, may be now considered as abrogated.

succours to Paswan Oglow, was to upset the government of the Porte;—would you be able, on any of these occasions, to satisfy those by whose opinions it is now the fashion to guide the counsels of states, that an interest existed sufficiently strong to call for the interference of this country, to prevent the mischief much less to redress and vindicate it when done? Why, Sir, we know that in the present state of opinions and feelings, and upon the principles on which the present peace has been made, not only no one, but hardly all of these put together, would drag the country into a renewal of hostilities, though, as is evident, its very existence might depend upon it. The consequence is, that France is our mistress; that there is nothing she can ask, which she must not have (she has only to threaten war, and her work is done);—that all the objects of interest and ambition which France can have in view, lie open before her to be taken possession of whenever she pleases, and without a struggle: her establishments will accumulate round us, till we shall be lost and buried in them: her power will grow over us, till, like the figures in some of Ovid's Metamorphoses, we shall find all our faculties of life and motion gradually failing and deserting us:

———Torpor gravis alligat artus;

If, in this last extremity, we should make any desperate efforts and plunges, that might threaten to become troublesome, and give us a chance of extricating ourselves, she will call in the aid of her arms, and with one blow put an end at once to our sufferings, and our existence.

Sir, are these idle dreams, the phantoms of my own disordered imagination? or are they real and serious dangers, the existence of which no man of common sense, let his opinions of peace be what they may, will attempt to deny? The utmost that any man will pretend to say, is, that he hopes (and so do I) that the evils apprehended will not happen; and that great as the risk may be, he thinks it preferable to those risks, which would attend a continuation of the war. None but the most weak or inconsiderate, if they are not disaffected, or absorbed and lost in the sense of some immediate personal interest, will feel, when they shall well understand the subject, that there is any cause of joy or rejoicing.

Here it is then, that I must advert again to that topic of consolation (miserable indeed must our state be, when such are our topics of consolation), to which, in order to make out a case not perfectly hopeless, we are willing to have recourse, and which, more I believe than any reliance upon our wealth, does really support us, in the situation to which we are reduced. This is the idea, that from some cause or other, from some combination of passions and events,—such as no philosophy can explain, and no history probably furnish an example of,—the progress of the revolution will stop where it is; and that Buonaparté like another Pyrrhus,—or rather like that adviser of Pyrrhus, whose advice was not taken, instead of proceeding to the conquests of new worlds, will be willing to sit down contented in the enjoyment of those which he has already.

Sir, the great objection to his hope, to say nothing of its baseness, is its utter extravagance. On what possible ground do we believe this? Is it in the general nature of ambition? Is it in the nature of French ambition? Is it in the nature of French revolutionary ambition? Does it happen commonly to those, whether nations or individuals, who are seized with the spirit of aggrandizement and acquisition, that they are inclined rather to count what they possess, than to look forward to what yet remains to be acquired? If we examine the French revolution, and trace it correctly to its causes, we shall find that the scheme of universal empire was, from the beginning, that which was looked to as the real consummation of its labours; the object first in view, though last to be accomplished; the primum mobile that originally set it in motion, and has since guided and governed all its movements.

The authors of the revolution wished to destroy morality and religion. They wished those things as ends; but they wished them also, as means, in a higher and more extensive design. They wished for a double empire; an empire of opinion, and an empire of political power; and they used the one of these, as a means of effecting the other. What reason have we to suppose, that they have renounced those designs, just when they seem to touch the moment of their highest and fullest accomplishment? When there is but one country, that remains between France and the empire of the world, then is the moment, when we choose to suppose that all opposition may be withdrawn, and that the ambition of France will stop of its own accord.—It is impossible not to see in these feeble and sickly imaginations, that fatal temper of mind, which leads men to look for help and comfort from any source rather than from their own exertions. We are become of a sudden great hoppers. We hope the French will have no inclination to hurt us;—we hope, now peace is come, and the pressure of war, as it is called, taken off, that the French empire will become a prey to dissensions, and finally fall to pieces;—we hope, that the danger to have been apprehended from the example of the revolution, is now worn out; and that Buonaparté, being now monarch himself, will join with us in the support of monarchical principles, and become a sort of collateral security for the British constitution. One has heard to be sure, that magni animi est separe; but the maxim, to have any truth in it, must be confined, I apprehend, to those hopes which are to be prosecuted through the medium of men's own exertions, and not to be extended to those, which are to be independent of their exertions, or rather, as in the present instance, are meant to stand in lieu of them.

Of this description are all those expectations which I have just enumerated; one of which is, that the French will fall into dissensions.—Why, Sir, they have had nothing else but dissensions from the beginning. But of what avail have such dissensions been to the safety of other countries? One of their first dissensions was a war of three years, called the war of La Vendée; in which, according to some of their calculations, the republic lost between the two sides, to the number of 600,000 souls. This was surely pretty well, in the way of dissension. Yet when did this interrupt for a moment, even if it might in some degree have relaxed, the operations of their armies on the frontiers, and the prosecution of their plans for the overthrow of other countries? As for changes of government, they have been in a continued course of them. Since the beginning of the revolution, the government has been overturned at least half a dozen times. They have turned over in the air, as in sport, like tumbler-pigeons;—but have they ever, in consequence, ceased their flight? The internal state of the country has been in the most violent commotion. The ship has been in mutiny;—there has been fighting in the waist and on the fore-castle;—but in the midst of the confusion somebody has always been found to tend the helm, and to trim the sails; the vessel has held her course. For one, therefore, I have no great confidence in the effect of these internal commotions; which every day become less and less likely, in proportion as the power of the present government becomes more confirmed, and as the people of France become more and more bound together by the common feeling of national glory, and by the desire of consolidating the empire which they have seen established. Such commotions may undoubtedly happen, and may of a sudden, when it is least expected, bring about some change favourable to the world. But it is curious to hear these chances gravely brought forward, as the best foundation of our hopes, and by those too, who a few weeks ago, while the war continued, would never hear of them, as entering, at all into calculation. It seems, that the chapter of accidents, as it is called, which could do nothing for us in war, may do every thing for us in time of peace. Whereas I should have thought just the contrary; that chances, such as are here intended, were not only more likely to happen in war, but, what is a little material, might then be better improved and turned to account. While war subsists, while armies are ready to act, while confederacies are in force, while intelligences are going on, while assistance may be lawfully and avowedly given, every chance of this sort may, if properly improved, lead to consequences the most decisive. In peace, all that fortune can do for us, falls dead and still-born. Nobody is ready, nobody is authorized to move a step, or stretch forth a hand, to rear and foster those chances, however promising, which time and accident may bring forth. It is not an answer to say, that such never have been improved. In regulating plans of future conduct, we must consider not what men have done, but what they may and ought to do. The only rational idea that I could ever form of resistance to that power, which unresisted must subdue the world, was, that it must be the joint effect of an internal and an external war, directed to the same end, and mutually aiding and supporting each other. All the powers of Europe could not subdue France, if France was united; or force upon it a government, even were such an attempt warrantable, really in opposition to the wishes of the people. On the other hand, no internal efforts, unassisted by force from without, seemed capable of rescuing the country from the yoke imposed upon it, so long as the several factions that governed in succession, could find means of securing to themselves the support of the armies. We are now required to believe, that what has hitherto failed to be performed by both these powers together is to be effected by one alone; and that with respect to any hope of a change of government in France, the war that has been carrying on for nine years has proved only an impediment! Such is the state of our hopes and opinions on that side.

But we have another hope, founded on rather a contrary supposition, namely, that Buonaparté, now that he is a king himself—and a king he is so far as power can make one—will no longer be an encourager of those absurd and mischievous doctrines, which, however they may have helped him to the throne, will be as little pleasing to him, now that he is fairly seated there, as to any the most legitimate monarch. Sir, I agree, that Buonaparté, like other demagogues, and friends of the people, having deluded and gulled the people sufficiently to make them answer his purpose, will be ready enough to teach them a different lesson, and to forbid the use of that language towards himself, which he had before instructed them in, as perfectly proper towards others. Never was there any one, to be sure, who used less management in that respect, or, who left all admirers of the French revolution, within and without—all the admirers of it, I mean, as a system of liberty—in a more whimsical and laughable situation. Every opinion for which they have been contending, is now completely trodden down, and trampled upon, or held out in France to the greatest possible contempt and derision. The hon. gentlemen on the opposition benches have really great reason to complain of having been so completely left in the lurch. There is not even a decent retreat provided for them.

But though such is the treatment, which the principles of “the Rights of Man,” and of the “Holy Duty of Insurrection,” meet with in France, and on the part of him who should be their natural protector, it is by no means the same, with respect to the encouragement which he may choose to give them in other countries. Though they use none of these goods in France for home consumption, they have always a large assortment by them ready for foreign markets. Their Jacobin orators are not to be looked for in the clubs at Paris, but in the clubs of London. There, they may talk of cashiering kings, with other language of that sort; but should any orator more flippant than the rest choose to hold forth in that strain, in the city where the great consul resides, in the metropolis of liberty, he would soon put him to silence, in the way that we see adopted in the sign of the silent woman. Buonaparté, being invested, in virtue of the rights of man, with despotic power, can afford to sanction the preaching of those doctrines in other countries, of which he will not suffer the least whisper in his own. While he is at the head of an absolute monarchy in France, he may be the promoter and champion of Jacobin insurrections every where else. The abject as well as wicked nature of Jacobinism in this country, which, while it would rebel against the lawful authority of its own government, is willing to enslave itself to France, finds no difficulty of allowing to him these two opposite characters; and I know no reason why we should suppose him disinclined to accept them.

I must confess, therefore, that I see as little hope for us on this side, as I do on the other. In fact, if I could believe, in spite of all probability, that there was any remission of that purpose, which has never yet ceased for an instant—the purpose of destroying this country—such belief, however produced, must be instantly done away by a view of the conduct of France, in the settlement of this very treaty. There is not a line of it, that does not either directly point to the destruction of this country, or, by a course a little circuitous, but not less certain, equally tend to the same object. What can France want with any of the possessions which she has compelled us to surrender, but with a view of rivalling our power, or of subverting it, or of removing out of our hands the means of controlling her farther projects of ambition?—Of the first sort are all her stipulations for settlements in South America and the West Indies: of the the second, her demand of the Cape and Cochin; and of the last, that most marked and disgraceful condition on our part, the surrender of Malta. What upon earth could France have to do with Malta, but either as a means of humbling us in the eyes of all the world, by the surrender of it, or of depriving us of a port in the Mediterranean, that might stand in the way of designs which she is meditating against the countries bordering upon that sea? The miserable pretexts which are formed to palliate this surrender, and the attempt to cover it, in part, by the show of delivering that fortress to the order, though much the greater part of the order are now living in the dominions of Buonaparté, and many of them actually serving in his armies, are wholly insufficient, either to conceal our shame, or to disguise the purpose of the French in making this demand. But the circumstances of the negotiation, not less than the treaty resulting from it, show, in another way, the folly of those hopes, which are founded upon the supposed intentions or characters of the persons with whom it is made. It does not augur very favourably for the intentions of a party in any transaction, that there appear in every stage of it the clearest proofs of duplicity and fraud.—What do we think of the artifice, which signs a treaty with us, guaranteeing the integrity of Portugal; but previously to that, at a period so late, as to make it sure that the knowledge of the transaction shall not reach this country in time, signs another treaty, totally altering the nature of that guarantee? What shall we think of the candour and fairness, which in a treaty with us, proposes, as a joint stipulation, the evacuation of Egypt, at a time when the proposers knew, though we did not, that every soldier of their's in Egypt was actually a prisoner to our troops? Where was their good faith to the Turks, when, in the same circumstances, they knowing the fact and the Turks not, they took credit from the Turks for this very evacuation? Why, Sir, it is a fraud upon a level with any of those practised at a lottery-office. They insure the ticket, at the moment when they know it to be drawn. And are these the people, to whose generosity and forbearance, to whose good intentions towards this country, and above all, to whose good faith, we are to deliver over, bound hand and foot, the interests of the British empire, to be destroyed or saved, as they, in their good pleasure, shall think fit?

I say nothing here on a topic, however closely connected with the present subject, the character of the first consul himself*—a character hitherto as much

ment is evidently defective without it. An opinion indeed prevails, and is insisted upon by persons of much apparent wisdom and gravity, that any inquiry into the conduct and merits of the first consul is unbecoming and improper; unsuited to the dignity of a great assembly, and incapable of being made conducive to any useful purpose. To many, however, it may seem, that just the contrary of this is the fact; that in the history of the world, an instance can hardly be found of any one, whose personal qualities were so much a subject of general concern, and consequently so proper an object of inquiry; and that the occasion of all others, when such inquiry must be most proper and necessary, was that in which we were preparing to sign a treaty of peace with the person in question, founded expressly upon our confidence in his character, and entrusting to the issue of our judgment in that respect, the whole of the interests, welfare, independence, and even existence of a great empire.

Without inquiring generally into the history of the person thus confided in, let us recur only to a few of those passages of his life, which apply most immediately to the trust, which we are here reposing. A detailed and most masterly exposition of these is to be found in Mr. Pitt's speech of the 3rd February, 1800, in which, among other particulars, an account is given of his proceedings towards the people and governments of the several states of Milan, Modena, Genoa, Tuscany, the Pope, Venice, and Egypt. Of all of these it may be said generally, and as it should seem without exception,—such was purposely the profusion of engagements, and such the uniform and systematic breach of them,—that not a single act was done, which was not in violation of some engagement, and certainly not a single engagement contracted, or profession made, that was not, in every part of it, grossly and in most cases instantly violated. The French rulers have, throughout, evidently acted upon the principle, that he who could divest himself at once of all moral feeling, and release himself from all moral control, must for the time have an immense advantage over those who should remain under the old constraints, and who might not be sensible immediately of the change which had taken place, or, when they were, might be long incapable either of adopting it into their own conduct, or of so correcting their ancient feelings and habits (the habit for instance of relying in some degree on men's assurances, yielding something to their professions, believing in part what they should solemnly assert), as to make themselves proof against its effects. Nobody has entered more fully into these views, or pursued them to greater extent, than the person of whom we are here speaking; whether when employed in the service of others, as in the instances, which we were proceeding to state, or when he afterwards set up for himself, and turned 'these instructions' 'to plague the inventors,'—the people who now find themselves under his yoke.

but pass on to the question, which meets us at every turn, and seems to stop the

In Lombardy, a proclamation, issued immediately upon his entrance into the country, and containing assurances the most solemn, of 'respect for property, respect for religious opinions,'—principles, which he declared to be those of the French Republic, as well as of the army, which he commanded,—was followed instantly by a succession of exactions, amounting to many millions sterling, and by such violations of every religious opinion and feeling, as could be intended only to produce, what it at last accomplished, the driving the people to something like resistance, and thus furnishing a pretext (unsupported as it was to the last, even by the insurrection which had been provoked), of murdering eight hundred of the inhabitants of a single town, and delivering over the country to military plunder and execution.

In Modena, the proceedings, though upon a smaller scale, were of the same cast and character.

In Tuscany, to the breach of the general rights of neutrality (that neutrality so prudently observed, as was declared in the House of Commons [by Mr. Fox], by the wise prince who governed that country); to the breach of a treaty made the year before by the republic, was added that of a positive engagement made a few days before by himself. In spite of all these rights, and treaties, and engagements, and for the sake of an act, which was in itself the grossest violation of one of them, viz. the seizing an enemy's property in a neutral port, he marched into the country with as little ceremony as if he had been taking up his quarters in a part of the republic; and having completed his work, agreed indeed to retire, but not till he had exacted from this unfortunate, though wise prince, certain conditions as the price of his departure, and among others a large pecuniary contribution, for the expenses which the French had incurred in thus invading his territories.

In Genoa, these breaches of treaty, and violations of faith, were diversified by a happy mixture of those measures, by which protection to the independence of states, is made to signify a forcible change of their governments; and defence of the rights of the people, the establishing over them a foreign and military tyranny. But as these proceedings, though equally a breach of faith with the others, seem to belong more peculiarly to the class which we have just noticed, we will say no more of them here; and for the same reason, as well as from the inutility of citing separate instances, where the whole proceed-progress of all argument, the great question—"What are we to do? The danger

ing from beginning to end is nothing but one continued instance, we will forbear to dwell upon all the flagitious violences, and cruel and scandalous outrages, which attended the invasion of the pope's states, in which, though breach of faith had no less a share than in any of the transactions before enumerated, it is lost and merged as it were, in the various other sensations of indignation and disgust, which the events of that period are calculated to call forth.

The last scene of these proceedings of the first consul, comprized within the period of his Italian command, lay in the states of Venice; and, as it happens commonly at the close of the peace, the incidents here seem to have become more numerous, and to possess something of a higher and stronger interest. The general description of them is, however, the same, 'a perpetual renovation of hope, and a perpetual disappointment;' professions of friendship followed by instant acts of hostility; assurances of protection serving only as a prelude to every species of violence; and a solemn treaty of peace, engaging to preserve to the country its government and laws, ending in the subversion of both, either by the immediate hand of him who signed the treaty, or, as happened in this instance, by the transfer of the country 'to the iron yoke' of that very power, the delivery of it from which was the professed object of his interference, and the ground on which all his proceedings were to be justified.

What happened on these occasions in Italy, was renewed afterwards, so far as respects fidelity to treaties and sincerity in negotiation, in all the transactions of a similar nature, in which Buonaparté was concerned, either as a commander acting with large discretionary powers, or, as placed himself, at the head of the republic. The detail of these would show, that mere change of time and place made no change in the character of the person, or of the system pursued. It appears by all, that good faith passed for nothing: that deceptions the most gross, artifices unheard of in diplomatic proceedings, were practised without shame or scruple. When a party was once engaged in a negotiation, and placed in a situation in which he could no longer help himself, it was in vain to expect that any regard would be paid to the professions, in which the negotiation began, or to declarations which occurred in the course of it. Any old engagement was set aside, or any new one foisted in, as suited the wishes, original or incidental, which France happened to entertain. Of all this proofs will be found, more or less, in each of the negotiations and conferences, which took place during the period here considered; that is to say, from the close of the campaign in Italy in 1797 to the final settlement of what is great; but how are we to avoid it? War cannot be eternal, and what prospect is called the peace of the continent; particularly in what passed at Luneville respecting the security to be enjoyed by Naples, and in the convention with the arch-duke at Steyer, relative to the armistice between generals Brune and Bellegarde.

But it is in Egypt, that the character of the first consul is to be seen to the greatest advantage. It is there that we are to look for it in its highest and most perfect state. It is in the rich and fertile plains of Egypt, under the heat of those more ardent suns, that his virtues seem to shoot forth with most luxuriance, and to acquire a spirit and flavour, unknown in the colder regions of Europe. We will say nothing here, of that gigantic contempt of good faith and public morality, which first conceived the project of the expedition; of the outrages which followed in the train of it; of the happy inversion of all right and justice, which treated as rebels, and consigned to instant execution, those of the inhabitants who presumed to defend their country against a foreign invader—an invader, whom none of them had offended, and whom half of them had never heard of, till they found him seizing upon their property, and putting to death all who dared to oppose him: we will pass over the massacre of three thousand prisoners, in cold blood, at Jaffa, and will consent to treat as doubtful the strange though hardly less authenticated fact, of his causing poison to be administered to the sick of his own army. The circumstance which most forces itself upon the attention, which most attracts the eye of the connoisseur in the midst of this vast and splendid collection, is that singular combination of all that is great, and all that is little; all that is great in guilt and mischief, all that is little and despicable in the means of its execution,—the pretence of having become a convert to the Mahomedan Faith, and the use to be made of that pretence for the purpose of committing an act of the most complicated fraud and treachery. Nobody conceives of course, for a moment, that faith, or religious opinion, had any thing to do in this proceeding from one end of it to the other. The case exhibits nothing but a renegade Christian, who is affecting not to be an Atheist, only in the hope that he may pass for a Mahomedan. The whole was a pretence, for the purpose of robbing an allied prince of his dominions. In this act, however, it is not the mere fraud and imposture that most excites attention: instances of that sort, in our police offices and criminal tribunals, are familiar to us every day. It is not even the horrid and blasphemous impiety of it: we have heard of Dutch schippers trampling upon the crucifix. What most characterises the transaction, what is its true distinctive property, is the singular and utter shame-

have we of reaching a period, when it may be terminated in circumstances upon lessness of it; the total abandonment of all regard for character or decency, which could commit such an act in the face of day, with all Europe spectators and witnesses, but placed only, as he hoped, at such a distance, that they could not interpose in time, could not cry "stop thief," so as to put the parties upon their guard and prevent the robbery from being completed. Buonaparté knew, that what he did in Egypt must be known in six weeks to all Europe. He knew, that in Europe there was not a human being, man, woman, or child, who would be the dupe of this pretended conversion, or who would see in it any thing but a shocking and base contrivance to strip the Turks of Egypt. But he was content, that the transaction should be so seen. He thought, that this cheating the Turk would be considered as a clever trick, a droll artifice; that the galleries in Europe would laugh at this, just as the galleries in our theatres do, when any piece of successful knavery is going on upon the stage,—when Filch in the Beggar's Opera picks Mrs. Di's pocket. And, to say the truth, he does not appear to have been in the wrong in this expectation. Such is the deplorable baseness of mankind, such the abject homage which men are willing to pay to crimes attended with success, to wickedness united with power, that none of the acts committed at any time by the agents of the French government, seem at all to have hurt their reception in the world, either collectively or individually. Their oppressions and cruelties excite no indignation; their low and scandalous frauds no contempt; their treacheries no distrust. In the case of the person here in question, you would swear, that his perfidies became him, and that, like one of Horace's mistresses, the more false and faithless he showed himself, the greater was his train of followers among the admiring and adoring governments of Europe.

There is a perfect contest for the honour of being betrayed by him. The examples of those unfortunate and confiding countries, who have been already seduced and undone, produce no caution, inspire no terror.

After the remark, made at the beginning of this note, it will hardly be asked, of what use is it to notice these facts? It is of some use to know betimes, the character of the person, who is in a fair way of becoming our master, and who, in fact, is so already, as far as relates to a perfect ascendancy over those who direct our counsels. But it is of great use in another view, to point out to notice,

such parts of the history of the first consul, as those which we have been speaking of. It is of consequence to know, who it is that particular persons admire. If it be true, that a man is known by his company (noscitur à socio) it is equally true, that some judgment may be formed from those, whom he extols and looks up to. What, it has been asked, must be the priest, where a monkey is the god? What must be the admirer, where the object of admiration, is a person capable of such a proceeding as the pretended conversion to Mahomedanism? It will be admitted, probably, that this is not to come in, in the heroic part of the character. But I wish to know, with respect to a large class of his admirers,—the enthusiasts of liberty, the assertors of rights, the respecters of the independence of nations, the abhorers of war, the lovers of peace and pacific arts, the exploders of military fame,—what in their estimation is the heroic part, or what they would point out as the subject of their panegyric? Is it possible, that they can hold out to us, as an object of admiration, the character of a man, whose merit, whatever its amount may be, must in kind be that of a soldier and a conqueror; whose sole occupation has been war; the foundation of whose fame and power was laid wholly upon military exploits; who unites in himself, all that these persons would profess to abhor in an Alexander and a Cæsar; who has been at once the conqueror of foreign nations, and the subverter of the liberties of his own? These things show, beyond a doubt, what, for the greater part, these eulogiums on the character of the first consul really are.—They are, either the base abject homage paid by the generality of mankind to successful crime; or the insidious praises of men, who, under the mask of liberty, patriotism, and respect for rights, are seeking to gratify their own spleen or ambition, and preparing the downfall of their country. Whatever credit may be due to him for military talents, and whatever certainly is due to him for decision, boldness, vigilance, address, capacity for great though wicked enterprizes, it will be difficult to account otherwise than is above done, for the sort of praises which we hear, and the quarters from which they come.

* The manner, in which people seem to have posed themselves with this question, has been the ruin of the country. They never seem to have got the length of discovering, that if France was bent upon their destruction, they were and must be, in an eternal war, unless either France should change her purpose, or they would submit to be destroyed. With all their fears and complainings, they have never been sensible to above half their danger. They seem always to have supposed, that like the contests in use among our common

Sir, the word eternal, which in any use of it is sufficiently awful, will undoubtedly not be least so, when associated with the idea of war. But I must beg leave to remind the House of a circumstance, of which they and the country seem never to have been at all aware, that the question of eternal war, is one, which it is not left for us to decide. It is a question which must be asked of our enemies; and is not less proper to be asked, if we could hope that they would answer us at the present moment, than it was before the signature of the preliminaries. The war depends neither upon conventions to be entered into between the two governments, nor upon acts of hostility which may be committed between the two people, by land or on the high seas; but on the existence or non-existence of that fixed, rooted, determined purpose, which France has hitherto had, and which we have no reason whatever to think she has relinquished—of accomplishing the final overthrow of this country. While that purpose exists, and shall be acted upon, we are at war, call our state by what name you please; and the only question is, whether France cannot work as effectually to her purpose in peace; and if peace is made in a certain way, infinitely more effectual than she can in what is professedly and declaredly war. I would really wish to ask, whether gentlemen have never heard of a people called the Romans, a set of republicans who conquered the world in the old time; and whom the modern Romans take as their model in every respect, but in none more than in what relates to the overthrow of this country? Among the nations that fell under the Roman yoke, there were but few whom they were able to fetch down at a blow,—to reduce in the course of a single war. All their greater antagonists, particularly the state whose fate is chosen as a prototype of our own, were not reduced till after repeated attacks, till after several successive and alternate processes of war and peace: a victorious war preparing the way for an advantageous peace; and an advantageous peace again laying the foundation of a successful war. This was at least the conduct of a great people; a people not to be put aside from their purposes by every transient blast of fortune. They had vowed the destruction of Carthage; and they never rested from their design, till they had seen it finally accomplished. The emulators of their fortune in the present day, are in no less a degree, the emulators of their virtues; at least of those qualities, whatever they may be, that give to man a command over his fellows. When I look at the conduct of the French revolutionary rulers, as compared with that of their opponents; when I see the grandeur of their designs; the wisdom of their plans; the steadiness of their execution; their boldness in acting; their constancy in enduring; their contempt of all small obstacles and temporary embarrassments; their inflexible determination to perform such and such things; and the powers which they have displayed, in acting up to that determination; when I contrast these with the narrow views, the paltry interests, the occasional expedients, the desultory wavering conduct, the want of all right feeling and just conception, that characterize so generally the governments and nations opposed to them, I confess I sink down in despondency, and am fain to admit, that if they shall have conquered the world, it will be by qualities by which they deserve to conquer it. Never were there persons, who could show a fairer title to the inheritance which they claim. The great division of mankind made by a celebrated philosopher of old, into those who were formed to govern, and those who were born only to obey, was never more strongly exemplified than by the French nation, and those who have sunk, or are sinking, under their yoke. Let us not suppose, therefore, that while these qualities, combined with these purposes, shall continue to exist, they will ever cease, by night or by day, in peace or in war, to work their natural effect,—to gravitate towards their proper centre; or that the bold, the proud, the dignified, the determined, those who will great things, and will stake their existence upon the accomplishment of what they have willed, shall not finally prevail over those, who act upon the very opposite feelings; who will “never push their resistance beyond their convenience;” who ask for nothing but ease and safety; who look only to starve off the evil for the present day, and will take no heed of what may befall them on the morrow. We are therefore, in effect, at war at this moment; and the only question is, whether the war, that will henceforward proceed under the name of peace, is likely to prove less operative and fatal, than that which has hitherto appeared in its natural and ordinary shape. That such is our state, is confessed by the authors themselves of the present treaty, in the measures which they feel it necessary to recommend to the House. When did we ever hear before of a military establishment necessary to be kept up in time of peace? The fact is, that we know that we are not at peace; not such as is fit to be so called, nor that in which we might hope to sit down, for some time at least, in confidence and security, in the free and undisturbed enjoyment of the blessings which we possess. We are in that state, in which the majority, I believe, of those who hear me, are in their hearts more desirous that we should be, than, in our present prostrate and defenceless situation, they may think it prudent to avow—in a state of armed truce; and then the only questions will be, at what price we purchase this truce; what our condition will be while it lasts; and in what state it is likely to leave us, should it terminate otherwise than as we are willing to suppose.

This brings us at once to the point. If we are to come at last only to an armed truce, would it not have been a shorter and better course, to turn our war into an armed truce, into which in fact it had pretty much turned itself, rather than to take the round-about way which has been now adopted, of making peace by the sacrifice of all the means of future war, in order afterwards to form an armed truce out of that peace? Let us state the account, and consider the loss and profit on either side.

The evils of war, are generally speaking, to be comprized under three heads: the loss of lives and the consequent affliction brought upon friends and families; the loss of money, meaning, by that, money expended in a way not to be beneficial to the country that raises it; and the loss of money in another sense, that is to say, money not got; by which I mean the interruption given to national industry, and the diminution of the productions thence arising, either by the number of hands withdrawn from useful labour (which is probably however but little material), or by the embarrassments and restraints which in a state of war impede and clog the operations of commerce. I do not mean, that there are not in war, evils which may be said not to be included properly under any of the above heads; among which may be numbered, the distress arising from sudden changes of property, even when the persons who lose, and those who acquire, are equally parts of the same community. This, however, is an evil that will be more felt at the beginning, than in the later periods of a war; and will in fact be likewise felt, though in a less degree, by a transition even from war to peace. The enumeration, now made, however, may be sufficiently correct for the present purpose. And, with this in our hands, let us consider, in what so very violent a degree, the present armed truce, or peace, if you choose to call it so, differs from what might have been our state, in the case so much dreaded and deprecated, of a continuation of the war.

To take the last first,—the loss of national wealth by the interruption given to commerce and industry; such is the singular nature of this war, such the unexampled consequences with which it has been attended, that it becomes a question, and one in itself of the most anxious and critical importance, on which side of the account the consequences of peace in this respect are to be placed: whether, instead of balancing the dangers of peace, if such there are, by accessions which it will bring to our wealth and commerce, we are not rather called upon to prove some great advantages which peace will give us in respect of security, in order to balance the diminution likely to be produced by it in our commercial opulence. That our commerce will suffer at the long-run, admits, I fear, of no doubt. If my apprehensions are just, it is in the diminution of our manufactures and commerce, that the approaches of our ruin will first be felt: but is any one prepared to say that this may not happen in the first instance? We have at present, subject to the inconveniences which war produces, nothing less than the commerce of the whole world. There is no part of the world to which our goods do not pass freely in our own ships; while not a single merchant ship, with the enemy's flag on board, does at this moment swim the ocean. Is this a state of things to be lightly hazarded? Does the hope of bettering this condition, even in the minds of those most sanguine, so much outweigh the fear of injuring it, that these opposite chances can upon the whole be stated otherwise than as destroying each other: and that of consequence, in the comparison of war and peace, the prospect of increased industry and commerce, which in general tells so much in favour of peace, must not here be struck out of the account? On this head the question between peace and war stands, to say the least of it, evenly balanced.

The next of these heads, the first, indeed, in point of consequence, but the next in the order in which it is here convenient to consider them, is the loss of lives, and the effect which war is likely to have on private and individual happiness. No man can pretend to say, that war can continue upon any footing, however restricted the circle of hostilities, without the lives of men being liable to be sacrificed; and no such sacrifice can be justified, or reconciled to the feelings of any one, but by that which must justify every such sacrifice, however great the extent; the safety and essential interests of the state. But if ever there was a war in which such sacrifices seemed likely to be few, not as an effect of any choice of ours, but by the necessary course of events, it was that which we should have had to carry on in future with the republic of France.

The great and destructive operations of war, the conflict of fleets or armies, or the consumption of men in unwholesome climates and distant expeditions, had ceased of themselves. I know not what expeditions we should have had to prosecute, unless new cases should have arisen, similar to that of the ever-memorable one of Egypt; where, the same motives existing, we should be sorry indeed not to have the means of acting upon them. But in general, our fleets would have remained quietly at their stations, and our armies have lived at home: the whole question reduces itself to a mere question of expense; and that again pretty much to a mere question of establishment.—The great heads of war expenditure, the army extraordinaries, would, in most parts, have ceased; and in the rest, have been greatly reduced. The chief question will be, not between an ordinary peace establishment and a war, such as, from circumstances, ours has hitherto been, involving expeditions to all parts of the globe; but between a peace establishment, such as that which is now declared to be necessary, and a war, which had become, and was likely to continue, merely defensive; in which we should have had nothing to do, but to maintain a competent force, with little prospect of being obliged to make use of it. The advocates for the present peace must find themselves always in an awkward dilemma, between economy and safety. We make peace in order to save our money: if we reduce our establishments, what becomes of our security? if we keep up our establishments, what becomes of our savings? Whatever you give to one object, is unavoidably taken from the other. The savings of the present peace, therefore, can be looked for only between the narrow limits of a high peace and a low war establishment; or, to state the case more correctly, between a high peace establishment and a war, reduced in the manner that I have described. I wish that a correct estimate were formed of the difference, in point of expense, between these two states; recollecting always that among the expenses of peace are to be counted the provisions necessary against the new dangers brought by the peace itself; the new dangers for example, which with Jamaica, and all our West-India islands are threatened by the establishment of the French in Saint Domingo, and other parts in that quarter of the world: the new dangers to which our empire in the East is exposed, by the re-entry of the French into the peninsula of India, and the cession to them, for such in effect it is, of the Cape and Cochin: in general, by the free passage now given to their ships and armies into every part of the world, and the establishment of them every where in the neighbourhood of our most valuable possessions.

Against all these dangers war provided, as it were by its own single act. The existence of our fleets upon the ocean, with an Admiralty order "to burn, sink, and destroy," shut up at once, as under lock and key, all those attempts which are now let loose, and require as many separate defences as there are parts liable to be attacked. A fleet cruising before Brest, therefore, was not to be considered as so much clear expense, to be charged to the account of the war; without deducting the expense of additional troops and additional ships, which the absence of the fleet might require to be kept, for instance, in the West Indies.

With respect to home defence. Considering the little reliance to be placed upon the government in France, now subsisting;

the still greater uncertainty with respect to any future government (such as may arise at any moment); and the increased defence necessary on land, in proportion to the diminution of our force by sea; I know not how we can remain secure with a military establishment, much less considerable than that which we should have had to maintain here in the case of war. — So much for the expenses of peace.

On the other hand, we must consider, what the reductions are that might be made to the expense of war, beyond those which the very scheme and shape of the war itself would unavoidably produce.

The expenses of our army as at present established, are excessive; but what should hinder us from adopting some of those expedients by which a country not more considerable than Prussia, under the regulations introduced by a former great monarch, is made capable of maintaining a military establishment superior to that of Great Britain?—The chief of those expedients, and that which we could best imitate, is, the putting at all times the half of the army upon the footing of militia, to be exercised only for a month or two, and to be at home for the remainder of the year. Other expedients might be suggested, if this were the proper occasion for discussing them.

It is true, as may be observed, that such a reduction of expense, if it can be at all effected, may be applied not less in time of peace than in time of war; and in a comparison, therefore, between the two, must be counted on both sides. But that circumstance, as is plain, does not do away the effect of what is here stated. If both sides are reduced, and reduced at all proportionably, the absolute difference, which is what we are here considering, will be reduced also; not to mention that, with a view to what will be the effect of the measure in other ways, such a reduction may be better applied to a large establishment, than it can to a small one. If an army of 80,000 men, for instance, may, for the moment, be reduced to half, because the remaining 40,000 will still be a sufficient force, it is not to be concluded, that a proportionate reduction might be made in an army of only half that number, when the remainder, left on an emergency for the defence of the country, would be no more than twenty thousand. Consider, therefore, when the reductions capable of being made, or certain of themselves to happen, in a state of war, such as war might be expected to be if continued from the present time, and when the new and extraordinary expenses incident to this peace shall have been calculated, to what the difference between the two states will amount; and taking then this difference at its utmost, compare the money so saved, with all the evils and dangers which peace, as now proposed, will give rise to; or, if the modern fashion is to prevail, and money alone to be considered, compare the value of the sinking fund, created by this saving, with the difference, in point of mere expense, of the circumstances in which we shall be placed at the commencement of any future war, should France choose to put us under this necessity. By the result of these comparisons must the question be decided.

Should it so happen (and who shall say, that it will not?) that our commerce, instead of increasing, or remaining where it is, should fall off; that our manufactures should decline; that, from these and other causes,—such as a great emigration, and considerable transfer of commercial property;—and above all from the great loss of territorial revenue, the income of the state should be lessened, to a degree equal only to this proposed saving, then we shall have incurred all the dreadful difference to be found in our situation in case of the renewal of war, and all the no-less-serious dangers during the continuance of peace, absolutely for nothing.

I select this only as the case which may be considered as the most probable. In argument, to be sure, having already agreed to take at par, our prospects with respect to the increase or decrease of our commerce and manufactures, I am not at liberty to insist on this case, or upon the more fatal one of a greater and more extensive decrease, without allowing those who argue on the other side, to avail themselves of the supposition, that the sources of national wealth may possibly be in a great degree augmented.

At all events, however, and whatever be the extent of these expected savings, and the improvement to be made in consequence in our finances, we are to estimate the evils and dangers which are to be placed in the opposite scale, the chief of which I have endeavoured to point out, though in a very hasty and summary manner, in the observations with which I have already troubled the House. They may be classed, generally, under three heads:—The ascendancy, which it is feared France may in time acquire, even in those sources of greatness, which we seem inclined to consider as a substitute for all others, our manufactures and commerce; supposing, as I am here doing, that peace continues without interruption, and even without any great advantage being taken, of the threat of a renewal of hostilities. Secondly, the effect to be produced, in a peace so constituted, by the continued use of this menace,—an engine of which it is difficult to calculate the force, applied, as it may be, to every point on which the interests of the countries are opposed, and for the accomplishment of every object which France may wish to attain. Thirdly, and lastly, war itself; begun of course at such moment, as France shall judge most advantageous to her, and when by a due improvement of the preceding period of peace, Great Britain shall have been placed in a situation to be least capable of resisting its effects. On these points, having spoken to each already, as far as the occasion seems to admit, though far short of what the subject demands, I shall detain the House no longer, but leave to every gentleman to form his own judgment on the extent and reality of these dangers, and finally to settle the comparison between these (with others connected with them) and the continuance of the war, such as war from this time might be expected to prove. The only head of danger, to which I wish now to speak, is one of a quite different nature; but so serious, so certain, so imminent, so directly produced by the peace itself, that I must not omit to say a few words upon it. This, is the danger now first commencing; and which may be conveyed in a single word, but that, I fear, a word of great import—Intercourse. From this moment the whole of the principles and morals of France rush into this country without let or hindrance, with nothing to limit their extent, or to control their influence. While the war continued, not only the communication was little, or nothing, but, whatever contagion might be brought in by that communication, found the country less in a state to receive it. The very heat and irritation of the war was a preservative against the infection. But now that this infection is to come upon us in the soft hour of peace; that it is to mix with our food; that we are to take it into our arms; that it is to be diffused in the very air we breathe; what hope, can we suppose, remains to us of escaping its effects?—This, I used formerly to be taught, before the weight of taxes had lessened our apprehensions of French fraternity, was one of the consequences most to be dreaded in peace, in whatever form it should come, short of the restoration of some government, not founded on Jacobinical principles. But somehow or another, the very idea of this danger seems long since to have vanished from our minds. We are now to make peace in the very spirit of peace, and to throw ourselves without reserve into the very arms of France. With respect, indeed, to one part of the danger, the principles of France,—meaning by that the political principles,—we are told, that all danger of that sort is at an end; that in this country, as every where else, the folly of the revolutionary principles is so thoroughly understood, that none can now be found to support them. Jacobinism is, as it were, extinct; or, should it still exist, we shall have, as our best ally against it, Buonaparté himself.

Sir, I have already stated what my confidence is in that ally. I know that neither he personally, nor any other of the free governments that have subsisted in France, have ever suffered these doctrines of Jacobinism to be used against themselves. But I must again ask, on what grounds we suppose that France has renounced the use of them with respect to other countries? We have heard less, indeed, of late, of her principles, because we have heard, and felt, more of her arms. For the same reason, we may possibly hear little of them in future. But do they therefore cease to exist? During the whole course of the revolution, France has sometimes employed one of these means, and sometimes the other. Sometimes the arms have opened a way for the principles, at others the principles have prepared the object, as an easy conquest to the arms:—In the flight of this chain-shot, sometimes one end has gone foremost and sometimes the other, and at times they may have struck their object at once; but the two parts alike exist, and are inseparably linked together.

Nothing, therefore, can, in my mind, be more idle than this hope of the extinction of Jacobinism, either as an instrument to be used by France, should her occasions require it, or as a principle ever to be eradicated out of any community, in which it has taken once root. However true it may be, that the example of France ought to serve as the strongest antidote to its poison, and that it does so, in fact, in the minds of many; yet it is equally true, that in another view, and to many other persons, it operates in a directly contrary way,—not as a warning, but as an incitement. What I am now speaking of, is,—however, not the danger of the political principles of France, but the still surer and more dreadful danger of its morals. What are we to think of a country, that having struck out of men's minds, as far as it has the power to do so, all sense of religion, and all belief of a future life, has struck out of its system of civil polity, the institution of marriage? That has formally, professedly, and by law, established the connexion of the sexes, upon the footing of an unrestrained concubinage? That has turned the whole country into one universal brothel? That leaves to every man to take, and to get rid of a wife (the fact, I believe, continues to be so), and a wife, in like manner, to get rid of her husband, upon less notice than you can in this country, of a ready-furnished lodging?

What are we to think of uniting with a country, in which such things have happened, and where for generations the effects must continue, whatever formal and superficial changes prudence and policy may find it expedient to introduce in the things themselves.

Do you suppose it possible, that with an intercourse subsisting such as, we know, will take place between Great Britain and France, the morals of this country should continue what they have been? Do we suppose that when this Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes, when that “revolutionary stream,” the Seine, charged with all the coluvies of Paris,—with all the filth and blood of that polluted city,—shall have turned its current into the Thames, that the waters of our fair “domestic flood” can remain pure and wholesome, as before? Do we suppose these things can happen? Or is it, that we are indifferent, whether they happen or not; and that the morals of the country are no longer any object of our concern?

Sir, I fear the very scenes that we shall witness, even in the course of the present winter, will give us a sufficient foretaste of what we may expect hereafter; and show, how little the morals of the country will be protected by those who should be their natural guardians, the higher and fashionable orders of society. In what crowds shall we see flocking to the hotel of a regicide ambassador, however deep in all the guilt and horror of his time, those, whose doors have hitherto been shut inflexibly against every Frenchman; whom no feeling for honourable distress, no respect for suffering loyalty, no sympathy with fallen grandeur, no desire of useful example,—and in some instances, I fear, no gratitude for former services or civilities, have ever been able to excite, to show the least mark of kindness or attention to an emigrant of any description; though in that class are to be numbered men, who in every circumstance of birth, of fortune, of rank, of talents, of acquirements, of every species, are fully their equals; and whom the virtue that has made them emigrants, has, so far forth, rendered their superiors! A suite of richly furnished apartments, and a ball and supper, is a trial, I fear, too hard for the virtue of London.

It is to this side that I look with greatest apprehension. The plague with which we are threatened, will not begin, like that of Homer, with inferior animals, among dogs and mules, but in the fairest and choicest part of the creation; with those, whose fineness of texture makes them weak; whose susceptibility most exposes them to contagion; whose natures being most excellent, are, for that very reason, capable of becoming most depraved; who, being formed to promote the happiness of the world, may, when “strained from that fair use,” prove its bane and destruction; retaining, as they will still do, much of that empire which nature intended for them, over the minds and faculties of the other half of the species.* “The woman tempted me, and I did eat,” will be to be said, I fear, of this second fall of man, as it was of the first. Sir, we heard much, last year, of the necessity of new laws to check the growing progress of vice and immorality. I suppose we hardly mean to persist in any such projects. It will be too childish to be busying ourselves in stopping every little crevice and aperture, through which vice may ooze in, when we are going to open at once the flood-gates, and admit the whole tide of French practices and principles, till the morals of the two countries shall have settled at their common level.

I must beg here, not to be told, that of this kind of argument the only result is, that we should never make peace with France at all, until the monarchy should be restored. The argument implies no such thing. That no kind of peace with France will be safe, till then, I am not in the least disposed to deny; but the nature of human affairs does not admit of our getting always what we may think most admirable. We must take up often with what is far short of our ideas, either of advantage or safety. The question at present is, whether, in either of those views, we ought to take up with the present peace; and among the evils incident to it, and immediately resulting from it, I state one, which, in conjunction with others, is to be weighed against its advantages; namely, the havoc likely to be made by it in our principles and morals. If any one should be of opinion, that this consideration is of so much weight, that war, almost upon any terms, is preferable to peace with a state, founded upon a declared atheism, and filled with all the abominations and pollutions certain to result from such an origin, it is not my business to dispute with him; but that is not the way in which the argument is applied here; nor is it indeed applied in any way, otherwise than as a consideration, making part of the case, and to which every body is to allow what weight he shall think proper. The misfortune of the country has been, that it has never seen and felt, fully, the extent of its danger. The country, speaking of it in general, and not with a view to particular places, or classes of people, upon whom the pressure of the war has borne with peculiar severity—has been so rich, so prosperous, so happy; men have enjoyed here in so superior a degree, and with such perfect freedom from molestation, all the blessings and comforts of life, that they have never been able to persuade themselves, that any real harm could befall them. Even those, who have clamoured most loudly about the dangers of the country, have given, at times, the most exaggerated representations of them, have really, and when their opinions come to be examined, never described this danger as any thing truly alarming. For their danger has always been a provisional and hypothetical danger, such as we should be liable to, if we did not conform to such and such conditions; but as these conditions were always in our power, and are now, as we see, actually resorted to, our real and absolute danger was, in fact, none at all. "You will be ruined, if you continue the war; but, make peace, and you are safe;" and unquestionably, as there can hardly have been a period, when a peace, such as the present, was not in our power—if such a peace can give us safety, there never was a period, when we could properly be said to have been in danger. We had a port always under our lee; so that if it came to overblow, or the ship laboured too much, we had nothing to do but to put up our helm, and run at once into a place of safety. But my ideas of the danger have always been of a far different sort. To me it has ever seemed, that the danger was not conditional, but absolute; that it was a question, whether we could be saved upon any other terms; whether we could weather this shoal upon either tack? The port appeared to me to be an enemy's port; where, though we might escape the dangers of the sea, we should fall into the hands of the savages, who would never suffer us to see again our native land, but keep us in a state of thralldom, far more to be dreaded than the utmost fury of the waves.

I have never pretended to say, that there were not dangers in war, as unquestionably there are great evils; I have said only that there were evils and dangers, not less real and certain, in peace, particularly in a peace made on such terms as the present. For terms of peace, in spite of what we here talked, have something to do with rendering our situation more or less secure, even in those respects, in which they are supposed to operate least. In general, though terms, however advantageous, would not secure us against the mischiefs of French fraternity, and the infusions of French principles and morals, yet they would make a little difference, I apprehend, as to the effect which peace would produce in the feelings of Europe; as to the air of success and triumph which it would give to the enemy, and of defeat and humiliation which it would impress upon us; as to the consequences resulting from thence, even with respect to the propagation of French principles, but certainly as to the confirmation of French power; and, above all, as to the situation in which we should stand, should France choose to force us again into a war. The port of Malta, strong as it is, would not, literally, serve as a bulwark to stop the incursions of Jacobinism. Figuratively, it would not be without its effect in that way; yet there would be some difference, I conceive, at the beginning of a war, whether we were in possession of Malta or not; and in the mean while, the knowledge of that difference, in the minds of the enemy, and of ourselves, would be quickly felt, in any discussions which might take place between us, in time of peace.

The dangers of peace, therefore, are augmented a hundred-fold by terms at once so degrading and injurious, as those to which we have submitted; on any terms on which it could have been concluded, it would have had its dangers, and dreadful ones too; France remaining a revolutionary government, and being, as it is, in possession of Europe. Whether that evil must not ultimately have been submitted to; whether the hopes of change, either from coalitions without, or commotions within, might not have become so small, and the evils of war, however mitigated, so great, that we must have made up our minds, after taking the best securities against those dangers that we could, finally to have acquiesced in them, is a separate question, which I will not now discuss. But the time, in my opinion, was not come, when such unqualified acquiescence on our part was requisite; when we were to cease to inquire what those securities were; or when we ought to have taken up with such securities, if securities they can be called, as are offered by the present treaty. The great misfortune has been, that this question of peace has never yet been fully and fairly before the country. We have been taken up with the war; that was the side of the alternative next to us;—and have never yet, till it was too late, had our attention fairly directed, or, I must say, fairly summoned, to the dreadful picture on the other side. If we had, we should never have heard, except among the ignorant and disaffected, of joy and exultation through the land, at a peace such as the present.

Here, Sir, I have nearly closed this subject. One only topic remains, a most important one indeed, but which I should have been induced, perhaps, on the present occasion, to pass over in silence, if in one part of it I did not feel myself called upon, by something of a more than ordinary duty.

[K]

When a great military monarch of our time* was at the lowest ebb of his fortunes, and had sustained a defeat, that seemed to extinguish all his remaining hopes, the terms of his letter, written from the field of battle, were—"We have lost every thing, but our honour." Would to God, that the same consolation, in circumstances liable to become in time not less disastrous, remained to Great Britain! I should feel a far less painful load of depression upon my mind, than weighs upon it at this moment. But is our honour saved in this transaction? Is it in a better plight than those two other objects of our consideration, which I have before touched upon, our dignity and our security? I fear not. I fear that we have contrived to combine in this proceeding, all that is at once ruinous and disgraceful; all that is calculated to undo us, in reputation as well as in fortune; and to deprive us of those resources, which high fame and unsullied character may create, "even under the ribs of death," when all ordinary means of relief and safety seem to be at an end. I am speaking here not of the general discredit that attaches to this precipitate retreat and flight out of the cause of Europe, and of all mankind; but of the situation in which we stand with respect to those allies, to whom we were bound by distinct and specific engagements. I must be very slow to admit that construction, which considers, as a breach of treaty, any thing done by a contracting power, under a clear bond fide necessity, such as the other party itself does not pretend to dispute. If an absolute conquest of one of the parties to an alliance does not absolve the other from the obligation which it has contracted, so neither can a timely submission, made in order to avert such conquest, when the remaining party itself shall not be able to describe that submission as injurious either to her own interest, or to that of the common cause. If we were not in a state to say to Sardinia, that it was better for us that she should continue her resistance, rather than accept the terms offered her; then, I say, we are not in a state to consider her submission as a forfeiture of the claims which she had upon us. We have left Sardinia, however, without an attempt to relieve her, without even a helping hand stretched out to support or to cheer her, under that ruin which she has brought upon herself, with no fault on her part, while adhering faithfully to her treaty with us. I must call that adherence faithful, which has continued as long as we ourselves could say, that it was of any use.—The case of Sardinia is, with no great variation, the case of Holland also. Both powers were our allies; both are ruined, while adhering to that alliance; both are left to their fate. But Sardinia and Holland are two only of our allies; and placed in circumstances of peculiar difficulty. There were others, it may be said, more capable of being assisted, for whose security and protection every thing has been done, that the most scrupulous fidelity could require. Naples, Portugal, and Turkey, will attest, to the end of time, the good faith of Great Britain; and show to the world, that she is not a power who ever seeks her own safety by abandoning those with whom she has embarked in a common cause. Sir, if I were forced to make a comparison between the instances, in which we plainly and openly desert our allies, and those in which we affect to protect them, I should say, without hesitation, that those of the former class were the least disgraceful of the two; because our protection is in fact nothing else but a desertion, with the addition of that ridicule which attaches upon things, that endeavour to pass for the reverse of what they really are.

The protection which we yield to these unfortunate powers, is much of the same sort with that which Don Quixote gives to the poor boy whom he releases from the tree; when he retires with perfect complacency and satisfaction, assuring him, that he has nothing more to fear, as his master is bound by the most solemn promise not to attempt to exercise against him any farther severity. We know, Sir, what respect was paid to this promise, as soon as the knight was out of sight; and it is not difficult to foretel, what respect will be paid by Buonaparté (without waiting even, I am afraid, till my hon. friends shall be out of sight), to this solemn stipulation and pledge, by which we have provided so effectually for the security of the dominions of our good and faithful allies.

The ridicule of this provision, which in any case would be sufficiently strong, has, undoubtedly, in the case of Turkey, something of a higher and livelier relish; Turkey being the power, in whose instance, and with respect to precisely the same party, the total insufficiency and nullity of such engagements has been so strikingly manifested, and is still kept so fresh in our memories, by the very operations with which the war has closed.

So much as to our conduct towards those powers, with whom we stood in the relation of allies, according to the usual diplomatic forms; and whom the common policy of Europe had been accustomed to consider under these and similar relations.

But there was another body of allies, not ranked indeed among the European powers, nor possessing much, perhaps, of corporate capacity, but who, as men, acting either separately or together, were equally capable of becoming objects of good faith, and in fact had so become, though by means different, in point of form, from those which engaged the faith of the country, in any of the instances above alluded to:—These persons were, the royalists of France, wheresoever dispersed, but particularly that vast body of them which so long maintained a contest against the republic in the West; where they formed the mass of the inhabitants of four or five great provinces, far exceeding, both in extent and population, the kingdom of Ireland.* I mention these parti-

* The population of these provinces is by no means stated with exaggeration, when it is said "far to exceed the population of the kingdom of Ireland." It might be described with truth, as "nearly, if not altogether, equal to the population of Great Britain." From Caen to Bourdeaux, without comprising more in breadth than belongs properly to the royalist country, there is a population, according to the statement of Mr. Necker, of little less than 9,000,000. In ascertaining the proportions of this population, which may be considered as royalists, we must distinguish between those who were only royalists in their affections; those who actively, though secretly, favoured the cause; and those who, at different times, openly appeared in arms. By the numbers of the last of these classes, by the manner in which they maintained themselves, and by the effects which they produced, we may form, perhaps, the surest judgment, though possibly a very inadequate one, of the general sentiments and dispositions of the country. If those, who have been most engaged in these scenes, and have at least the best means of knowing, may be culars of their force and numbers, not because they are material to the present purpose, but because they serve to obviate that delusion of the understanding, by relied on, it was a small portion of the inhabitants indeed, and those confined almost exclusively to the towns, who were not royalists in their hearts. But facts, and the inferences resulting from them, may after all be considered as the best criterion, especially to those who may not have the means of resorting to the testimonies which we have alluded to, or of appreciating the degree of credit that may be due to them. Of these facts the principal lie open to the observation of every body, and are of a nature little liable to be mistaken or misrepresented. They are—the length of time during which the royalist war subsisted; the armies which it obliged the republic to employ; the nature of the pacifications which took place in different parts of it; the anxiety which it evidently excited in the government, during the whole of its continuance; the interruption which it gave to the communication between the metropolis and the principal sea-ports—the transport of goods and passengers, and letters between Paris and Brest being sometimes stopt for a fortnight, requiring at times an immense escort, and being at all times attended with considerable danger, insomuch that officers going to join their ships often preferred a passage by sea, even at the risk of being taken by our cruisers;—these are the facts, which rest on no authority of individuals, and may afford some measure for judging of the degree and extent, to which the sentiment of royalism prevailed in this part of France. For facts of a description somewhat different, though of a character and magnitude not to be much concealed or disguised, such as the nature and progress of the war; the armies, which the royalists were able to bring into the field; the manner in which they employed them; the resources which they possessed; the energy which they displayed; for these, or other similar ones, the reader would do well to have recourse to an account (published here in 1796, and since translated) of Campaigns in the Vendée, by the republican general Turreau, the same, probably, who is now employed in something of a similar service in Switzerland, and who, though interested in some degree in magnifying the force of an enemy, whom he was employed to combat, and requiring in that respect, as well as in several others, to be read with some reserve and caution, may yet be relied on for the general substance of his narrative, and the principal representations which accompany it: and will afford to those, who may be new to the subject, much valuable information on the history and circumstances of this most extraordinary and affecting war.

which things, small in bulk, and filling but little space in the imagination, are apt to lose their hold on our interests and affections. The mention of them may, moreover, not be unnecessary in this House, where, I fear, from various causes, all that relates to the royalists is a perfect terra incognita, as little known or considered, as the affairs of a people in another hemisphere. The royalists were, however, a great, numerous, and substantive body, capable of maintaining against the republic a war, confessed by the republicans themselves to have been more formidable and bloody, than most of those in which they had been engaged; and of terminating that war by a peace, which showed sufficiently what the war had been, and what the fears were, which the republic entertained, of its possible final success. But let the numbers and powers of the royalists have been what they might; had their affairs been still less considered; had they been more disowned, discountenanced, and betrayed, than in many instances they were; had more such garrisons as those of Mentz and Valenciennes been suffered to be sent against them;* had they been less the

* In the early stages of the war of La Vendée, before the republicans had had recourse to the system of laying waste and burning the country, and had brought the war to a footing, in which no quarter was given on either side, whatever prisoners were taken by the royalists, were released upon the condition of not serving again, either against them, or against the allied powers; the royalists having imagined, for some reason or another, that the allies and they were engaged in a common cause, and that the neglect which they might seem till then to have experienced, was owing wholly to the precautions taken by the enemy for preventing any communication with them. When, therefore, they heard, in the year 1793, that the garrisons of Mentz and Valenciennes were marching against them, knowing that these garrisons had surrendered upon terms, and that one of the terms was, that they should not serve again till exchanged, they concluded that this was a new instance of republican treachery, and that these troops, a numerous and most formidable body, the garrison of Mentz alone being reckoned at twelve thousand, could not be employed in this service, without some scandalous breach of engagement, such as would excite in the breasts of the allies no less resentment and indignation, than it did in those of the royalists. What then were their sensations, when they found, that this was no treachery real, primary defenders and representatives of that cause, which the allies professed to support; still there were our formal proclamations, issued at various periods, not expressly engaging indeed to make stipulations for them in case of a peace, but calling generally for their exertions, and promising succour and protection to all those who should declare themselves in favour of the ancient order of things, and of their hereditary and rightful monarch. What I am to ask, is, have we acted up to the spirit, or even the letter of our own proclamations? or to the spirit of that relation, in which the nature of the war itself, independent of any proclamations, placed us with respect to these people? I am compelled to say, (I say it with great reluctance, as well as with great grief), I fear we have on the part of the republicans, but that the allies themselves in framing their capitulations, and providing that these garrisons should not serve against the other parties in the war, had wholly forgotten, or neglected, to extend this provision to the case of the royalists; who with an army of immense force in point of numbers, perfect in the mode of its composition, animated by the most heroic courage, headed by officers of great ability and experience, but still weak to a great degree by the extreme deficiency, and often total want of all the ordinary means of war, were left to prosecute, as well as they could, the desperate and unequal contest in which they were engaged, disowned and abandoned by all the world. When they found this, their feelings were indeed acute, and their constancy almost shaken. They did not despair: it was not their nature to do so; but left thus to themselves, abandoned to their own resources, without aid, without co-operation, proclaimed, as it were, to all Europe, as not even belonging to that confederacy, of which they might have been excused in hoping that they should have been placed at the head; they felt that their prospects were truly gloomy, and such as might well have excused them for relinquishing from that instant every thought of farther resistance. That they did not so relinquish their hopes; that they long maintained the contest with unabated vigour; that the war broke out afterwards with fresh violence; that it never ceased to be renewed at every favourable opportunity, till the last of the continental powers had submitted and made its peace; that the elements of it remain entire to this day;—these are truths, which ought to be known and remembered for the credit of those concerned, though they yield but little consolation in the retrospect, and can now unhappily afford no ground of hope for the future.

done no such thing. I fear, that a stain is left upon our annals, far deeper than that, which, in former times, many were so laudably anxious to wash away, in respect to the conduct of this country towards the Catalans. The Catalans were not invited by any declarations more specific than those which we have made to the royalists: their claim upon us was in some respects more doubtful. Yet, so far were they from being passed over in silence in the terms of the peace; so far were they from being abandoned to their fate, left to the merciless persecution of their enemies, that a stipulation was made for a full and complete amnesty for them; and, far more than that, a provision, that they should be put upon the same footing, and enjoy the same privileges, with that province which was in fact the most favoured under the Spanish monarchy. Yet, because more was not done; because they were not placed in the situation of enjoying all that they asked;—much of it, perhaps, having more of an imaginary than a real value;—because in a part, where their claim was more disputable, perfect and entire satisfaction was not given them; did a large and respectable majority of this House think it necessary to institute a solemn inquiry,—the intended foundation of proceedings still more solemn,—in order to purge themselves and the country, as far as depended on them, from the shame of what they deemed a breach of the national faith.

By what purgations, by what ablutions, shall we cleanse ourselves from this far deeper and fouler blot, of having left to perish under the knives of their enemies, without even an effort to save them, every man of those whom we have affected, as it must now appear, to call our friends and allies; with whom we were bound, by interests of far higher import than those of a disputed succession; who were the assertors with us of the common morality of the world; who were the true depositaries of that sacred cause, the very priests of that holy faith; with whom we had joined, as it were, in a solemn sacrament; and who, on all these grounds, but chiefly for the sin of having held communion with us, are now, as might be expected, doomed by the fanatics of rebellion, to be the objects of never-ceasing hostility, to be pursued as offenders, whose crimes can only be expiated by their destruction?

I agree with what has been said by my right hon. friend the chancellor of the Exchequer, that peace once made, all communication with this, or any other class of people, hostile to the French government, must completely cease. Whatever the government is, or whatever its conduct may be, with respect to us, if we think fit to make peace with it, that peace must be religiously kept. I am not for curing one breach of faith by another. But was nothing to be done, in the final settlement of that peace; and still more during the time which has elapsed since the first commencement of the negotiations? I wish a satisfactory answer could be given to those inquiries. I wish it were true, that, for months past, numbers had not been perishing throughout the royalist provinces, the victims of their loyalty and honour;—(men hunted down, like wild beasts, for acts, which that government may call crimes, but which we, I hope, have not yet learned so to characterize;—) simply for want of such means as might have enabled them to effect their escape, and, after the loss of every thing but what their own minds must bestow, to have sought an asylum in some foreign land.

Sir, I would gladly draw a veil over these facts. But our shame is too flagrant and glaring to be concealed: the cry of this blood is too loud to be stifled. I beg to wash my hands of it. The share which I have happened to have in the affairs of this illustrious and unfortunate people; the interest which I have always taken in their cause, make me doubly anxious to vindicate myself from any participation in the guilt of having thus abandoned them. I wish I could vindicate, in like manner, the government and the country. Among all our shames, it is that of the most fatal nature, and of which possibly, we shall longest rue the effects.*

* Those who may before have thought, that such a vindication was necessary, will not be less of that opinion, when they shall be told, that within the last twelve months, more than three hundred royalist officers have been taken and put to death in the western provinces, and that of these all but forty or fifty have suffered since the date of the preliminary treaty. In the name of all that is sacred, what justification can a government or a country offer for such conduct? Three hundred men, or at least a great proportion of them, sacrificed to the vengeance of their enemies, simply because we neglected, or refused to listen to their solicitations to be allowed an asylum in this country, when in consequence of the peace which we were making, their service could be no longer useful in their own! Do we mean to say that these persons had no claim upon us to the extent of what they asked? Or that we could not afford the expense of receiving, and providing for so many additional emigrants? Monstrous as either of these allegations would be, they would still be better than what alone remains,—the direct and unqualified confession, that we did not dare to admit into this country men, to whom we were bound by every tie to furnish a place of refuge and safety, lest by so doing we should give offence to our enemies. In what a state must the probity of a great country be, when, in a case like the present, such a motive can be made a principle of action? to what must the mind of a country be reduced, when it can bear, that such a motive should become manifest to the world?

Sir, I have done. I have stated, as I thought it my duty to do, what my apprehensions are, as to the nature and consequences of the present peace. If the evils which I impute to it, are not to be found there, if the dangers which I apprehend should not come to pass, no one will more rejoice in my error than myself; those who differ from me will have nothing to complain of; I shall have alarmed myself: I shall not, probably, even have to reproach myself with having succeeded in alarming them. But if any there should be (there are none I am sure in this House), who should say, that my fears are not imaginary; that they think of this peace as I do; that they apprehend it will ruin the country; but that they hope the country may last long enough to serve their turn; that being traders, they think the trade of the country may be lost;

It may not be thought a trifling aggravation (if in such a mass of shame, aggravations were worth thinking of), that, just at this moment, a condemned, though pardoned traitor, Napper Tandy, is released from prison, and allowed to sail to France, yielded, we presume, as an act of grateful attention,—a kind of marriage present, to the first consul. Napper Tandy, be it remembered, was not a person to whom the faith of the French government was pledged by any public declaration, unless it shall be contended, as perhaps it ought, that their decree of the 19th of November 1792 still continues in force: he was not a person engaged in one of those civil wars, of which history may furnish examples, wherein the rights and pretensions of the parties were so equally balanced, as to make it doubtful, on which of the two sides the crime of commencing hostilities and breaking that, being manufacturers, they believe its manufactures may decline; but that for this they care but little, provided the peace in the mean time shall prove advantageous to them;—to all such, if any there can be, there could be but one answer,—that they are a disgrace to their country and to their species; and that he must be as bad as they, who, upon such terms, could seek to merit their good opinion, or could solicit their favour. I trust, however, that no such men are to be found; but that all who rejoice in the present peace, do it under a persuasion, that the good which they may hope to derive from it, individually, is not to be obtained by the sacrifice of the final welfare and safety of their country.

Mr. Wilberforce said, that entertaining a high value for the talents and integrity of the hon. gentleman, he could not help feeling considerable surprise at what had up the public peace ought in justice to be charged. He was a traitor in the common sense of the word, and upon the clearest evidence of the thing, and was condemned according to the established principles, on which the lives of such persons have become forfeit at all times, and in all countries. The first consul however, as is supposed, thought fit to ask his release: and the government here complied with his request. Such was the state of the intercourse between the two countries on the subject of persons of this description. But the royalists of France, persons who had been acting in conformity to, perhaps in consequence of our proclamations; whose objects we had declared to be substantially our own, of whose assistance we had a right to avail ourselves, according to every principle of the law of nations; who are not to be confounded, as is often wickedly or ignorantly done, with rebels and traitors, the subverters of their respective governments, but were on the contrary the upholders of the constitution of their country, in opposition to such rebels and traitors; to these royalists we refused an asylum, lest we should offend the irritable majesty of a usurper, and indispose him to grant such terms of peace, as those by which the safety of the country is now so happily secured. If these things do not disgrace and dishonour a country, I am at a loss to know what the disgrace and dishonour of a country is. We seek to conciliate the favour of an imperious and vindictive enemy, by the desertion of our friends, and the sacrifice of our national faith and honour. Our enemy, we may rest assured, will only despise us the more, without our deriving from that feeling any relaxation of the motives, which have long led him to resolve on our destruction.

fallen from him. The hon. gentleman had said, that in signing the preliminaries of peace, ministers had signed the death-warrant of their country; and, as if to give greater weight to the assertion, the hon. gentleman had pronounced a funeral oration over its departed manes. The hon. gentleman said, that the general joy which the news of the peace had diffused, arose from the event alone, and from the ignorance in which the people were as to the terms. He, for one, would say, that he confided in the wisdom, justice, and moderation of his majesty's ministers. He was satisfied that they would display a high sense of what was due to the dignity of the nation, but would also show themselves sensible of what was due to the happiness of the people. The only substantial argument in the hon. gentleman's speech, was an argument which went against making any peace at all; because no peace, except a peace accompanied with a counter-revolution, would satisfy him. The principles prevailing in France were certainly dangerous; but, were we to go on eternally with war till a total change of morals should take place? Nay, these principles would insinuate themselves equally in time of war, and we should have the two evils together. The hon. gentleman had said, that peace was not at our option, but that the enemy might renew the war at his pleasure. Certainly he might; but if the peace were to have only a duration of three months, still he thought it was proper to make peace, in order to give Europe a proof of our pacific disposition, and to establish a character and create friends that might be of service to us when we should be compelled to enter into a new contest. In concluding this peace, ministers had acted in conformity to the general feeling of the country. The hon. gentleman had said, that we were at the head of a powerful confederacy. So, indeed, we had been; but our confederates had fallen off, one after another, and many of them were now against us. Yet it was fair in ministers to make use of those confederates, while any assistance could be obtained from them. It was by confederacies that William 3rd, and the great duke of Marlborough had confined the ambition of monarchical France within its proper limits. He had found gentlemen purging and acquitting themselves of the charge of entering into a war against Jacobin principles. He would confess, that opposition to these principles was one motive with him for giving his support to the war; not with a view of interfering in the domestic concerns of France, but of securing this country against the activity with which this sect was endeavouring to propagate its principles. It was the general opinion, that the government then existing in France was adverse to the wishes of the people; it was therefore not impolitic to give the French people an opportunity of declaring their sentiments with effect, by employing the French armies on the frontier. But when all our efforts to make an impression on France proved ineffectual—when the consequences were ruinous to us, and afforded France new means of annoyance—when we were left alone in the contest, was it not wise to make peace? It was true we might wait the chances of the war; but these chances might be against us.—He now came to the terms; and here he should observe, that the hon. gentleman was guilty of a strange misapplication of words, in saying that this country had thrown itself at the mercy of France. Any future historian, who should have occasion to mention England, would speak of her in very different terms. The hon. gentleman's mind was overcharged with anxiety, and he could not make fair estimates. As to the restitution of our conquests, he commended it. We had as many settlements as we could want or manage. It had become a matter of jealousy against us, that we had engrossed the commerce of the world. He had no idea of growing rich by the exclusion of others: let all grow rich together. It was an erroneous opinion, that in order to derive commercial advantages from any country, it was necessary that that country should be under our dominion. America was a proof of the contrary. We had dissolved our engagements with our allies. Ministers had acted wisely, when they gave permission to Portugal to conclude a treaty with France. He would make no reflections on the present government of Portugal; but there had been a sovereign of that country, who had said that he would suffer his palace to be demolished about his ears, rather than renounce his connexion with England. Ministers, however, regarded the weakness of the country, and the House should do justice to their motives, when it heard the noble secretary, who was untainted with the corruption naturally attached to diplomacy, explain them with so much strength and delicacy. There was one article of the preliminary treaty at which he felt some degree of uneasiness. He understood that Great Britain and France, besides engaging not to attack, or take possession of any of the Turkish territories, had also agreed to defend those territories against the attacks of other powers. He never could approve of such a contract, the extent of which could not be foreseen. It might involve us in a war with Russia, with Austria, or with other nations still more remote. He hoped, therefore, that in settling the definitive treaty this article would be so framed, as to express the meaning it ought to bear. The article relative to Trinidad he could not suffer to pass without a remark. The efforts which he himself had made to bring about the abolition of the slave trade must be within the recollection of many who then heard him: and if he had not lately called the attention of the House to this subject, it was not from having abandoned it. In the island of Trinidad, there still remained a quantity of land to be settled upon and cleared, which it would require a million of slaves to do. By England getting possession of this island, she would become instrumental in promoting the slave trade to an extent far beyond what it was ever before. This was a cost of human misery, which no man could contemplate without anxiety. When he considered the state of this country with regard to France, he was sure we should be exposed to dangers, great beyond all comparison—dangers that depended on moral causes, and which were sure in their operation; but which, as he before observed, would not be lessened by continuing the war with France. The principles of France had taken root more deeply in the human mind than many gentlemen imagined. They had shaken those political and moral obligations, which were the greatest support of civil society. The luxury and relaxation of religious principles that prevailed in France, were great and alarming; and according to Machiavel, who was no bigot, the country where they prevailed was in the high road to ruin. When, therefore, he considered the intercourse that was about to take place between Englishmen and the inhabitants of a great, ingenious, and luxurious nation—when he considered the number of people who might crowd from this country to France, allured by her pleasures and her arts, he could not but think the danger great; and he sincerely wished this subject might be considered, and some provision made against the effects of that which could not be considered so much a political as a moral disease. It was a disease to which all political writers and philosophers attributed the ruin of nations; and it was the duty of the legislature to bear the subject in mind, and give effect to that practical line of conduct which this reasoning should point out to them. If this was done, nothing was to be feared from France. But if we should suffer the tree to be contaminated, the least puff of wind would blow it down, notwithstanding the beauty and extent of its branches. He had no objection to see France in a state of happiness and prosperity: it could not be incompatible with that of Great Britain. The enlarged views of commerce in modern times had done away that false system of policy, by which one commercial nation thought to become prosperous by the depression and poverty of another. He would conclude with an earnest hope that government would attend to all the means of promoting our prosperity and security, and of preventing our morals from being injured.

Dr. Laurence took a wide view of the important subject before the House, the result of which was a strong condemnation of the preliminaries. He began by expressing his marked disapprobation of the vague manner in which they were drawn up. As we never, by any treaty, made such sacrifices; so never, by any treaty, was there left such room for alteration. He once thought he might have done some service by pointing out these omissions and inaccuracies, but the errors of ministers were now irremediable. Marquis Cornwallis was sent to Amiens, bound hand and foot. The French had been told, that we were so eager for peace, or rather that peace was so necessary to us, that there were no sacrifices which we would not make to obtain it. The treaty of Utrecht had been quoted a little unfortunately, he thought, on this occasion, the ministers who concluded it having been impeached. He could, however, have been contented to see it brought to point a moral, or adorn a tale, had not all its principles, which had procured us near a century of prosperity, been now completely abolished. He expressed unbounded indignation at the language used by some gentlemen, ascribing to ministers moderation and magnanimity, inasmuch as in the hour of success they had consented to terms, perhaps rather lower than they had a right to demand. Necessity was the only plea they could urge, and when they abandoned that, they laid themselves open to the most serious charge of misconduct. The learned doctor then went into a long history of the war, and explained the views of the different parties since its commencement. Afterwards he went on to draw a very alarming picture of the acquisitions of France, and of the deplorable situation in which we are left by the peace. The subjects of quarrel, he said, were immense, and we had no security but the chief consul might employ some one of them as soon as he had stripped us of our conquests. We could never begin a new war in such favourable circumstances as those in which we ended the present. He could hope little from our commerce. When a philosopher was shown, by an eastern monarch, his immense treasures, he replied, that the possessors of iron would soon get possession of it. The embassy of the marquis Cornwallis might illustrate this still better. He and his suite appeared in the utmost magnificence of dress and equipage, while they were received on the road by not the most superbly clothed, but the most military-looking corps in France. It was a well-known fact, that those troops who escorted him from stage to stage were all picked grenadiers. In as far as concerned our allies, the treaty was disgraceful in the extreme. After going over our different allies, he lamented, in a manner peculiarly bitter, the hard fate of the prince of Orange. Who would have expected, he asked, that, almost on the anniversary of the landing of king William to free us from slavery, his representative should be betrayed by us, and ruined, for no other reason than because he had adhered to our cause with unshaken constancy? For a lesson of fidelity to their allies, he desired ministers to look to the French. Never once had they been driven from any city or country without expressly stipulating for the protection and safety of those who had befriended them. Cooped up in Alexandria, Menou had refused to capitulate unless the English undertook for the security, in their persons and property, of Copts and Egyptians, Mahometans and Christians, Jacobites and Jacobins. By Jacobites, he said, he meant a religious sect known by that name.

Henceforth it would come to pass, that when the smaller states were obliged to choose a powerful ally, they would look to France; there they might expect protection; but from us only ingratitude and dereliction. He concluded by saying, that he was far from wishing to carry on war for ever, but he did wish to see it carried on till we could have peace. That state did not deserve the name which required us to remain in arms, and to submit to an abridgement of our liberties.—Dr. L. condemned, in very severe terms, the declaration of Mr. Wilberforce, who had expressed his approbation of the peace, even though it should last but three months.

Mr. Elliot said, that his mind was filled with the most gloomy and desponding apprehensions. He looked upon the peace as absolute and unqualified ruin. All the objects for which the war had been undertaken were at once given up, and we were now surrounded by accumulated danger. The treaty abrogated the public law of Europe, and went to abolish the title of sovereigns to their crowns. We allowed ourselves to be second to France, a situation in which we could not long exist, to such a degree were we envied by the rest of Europe. He saw no improvement in the dispositions of the chief consul. Did he now show less audacity of enterprise, or malignity of intrigue? Was his amendment to be discerned in the late transactions in Holland or Switzerland, or in the tragi-comedy acted at Florence? He continued to dictate new constitutions to his vassal republics; and, to bring monarchy into contempt, set up a prince of the house of Bourbon, after cruelly and wantonly dethroning the hereditary prince. The hon. gentleman sat down with observing, that he considered the treaty as a wasteful and unnecessary sacrifice of our honour and our interests, to procure a delusive and short-lived tranquillity.

The Secretary at War (Mr. Yorke) said, that the first thing he should take notice of was, the danger to which this country was said to be exposed by the peace now before the House. That danger arose from the geographical situation of France, and its relative condition with respect to this country. The geographical situation of France was certainly matter of just apprehension to this country; but the question to be considered, as arising out of that apprehension, was, whether there was any reasonable hope, by a continuation of the war, of reducing the power of France? If there was any hope of our being able to do so by another campaign, or by a number of campaigns, or that by them we could obtain security against the power of France, he should have thought it prudent to try the effect of such campaigns; but however well we might be convinced of the danger to us from the situation of France, if it was not in the power of this country to affect that power in any material degree by a continuation of the war, then the continuation would be useless. As long as we were able to have the alliance of the great powers of the continent to act cordially for the purpose of reducing the power of France, he had always been of opinion, it was for the interest of this country to act in co-operation with that confederacy, to make a common cause against the power of France. That confederacy, however, could not now be formed. It was impossible for any one to regret it more than he did; but what could we do if the coalition could not be formed? The last campaign had been as brilliant on our part as any that had ever taken place (the particulars of which he recited), but still he did not see what we were to gain by continuing the war. Indeed, he could not see that we could do better than to adopt the course held out yesterday by his noble friend (lord Hawkesbury), who had forcibly and happily conveyed his meaning by saying, we should adopt a system of mixed conciliation and firmness; a policy without which he apprehended this country could not long preserve its present prosperity.

Mr. Hobhouse said, he would not reply to those who were advocates for the continuance of the war, because they saw France in a condition so formidable, that no state would be able to withstand her power upon the continent. Other gentlemen had given a sufficient answer to that argument. He would only declare, that he lamented, as much as any man, the extent of the coast which she had acquired, and the preponderating influence which she exercised over surrounding nations. He wished to have seen her reduced within her ancient limits; but would it not be prudent first to inquire into the adequacy of our means to the accomplishment of so desirable an end? Mighty confederacies had been formed, and mighty exertions had been made, which had unfortunately not tended to the diminution of her greatness, but to the increase of her dominion. The nations of Europe could not be roused to enter upon a new coalition; and if they could, it would be attended with the same ill-success as their former ineffectual attempts. Where, then, was the hope of making any impression upon France on the continent of Europe?—Neither would he enter the lists with those gentlemen who disliked the peace from an apprehension of French principles, for they had already been defeated by the many able speeches which he had heard. Was it not an obvious truth, that opinions were not to be conquered by force of arms? Opinions, if, in their consequences, they were found to be mischievous, would always be abandoned, as soon as their pernicious tendency was experienced; and this was the case at present with those Jacobinical doctrines which had so long and so ruinously obtained in France, and which were now not less detested by the French, than the English nation. This happy change of sentiment in the inhabitants of France was not the result of force, nor ascribable to the British arms, but to the conviction that those baneful tenets had given birth to all the miseries of anarchy, and all the sanguinary excesses which they had witnessed.—Without farther delay, he would advert to the only two new points brought forward during the course of this night's debate. In the first place, it had said by a learned gentleman, that the preliminaries were loosely worded, and marked by a vagueness never before discernible in a treaty of this kind; but the learned doctor had advanced no proof in support of his assertion. Another hon. gentleman had, indeed, endeavoured to fix the same imputation upon the fifth article, which guaranteed the integrity of the Turkish empire. Now, said the hon. gentleman, as this article declares, that "the territories and possessions of the Sublime Porte shall be preserved entire, such as they existed previously to the present war," this country would be called upon, if Passwan Oglou were to succeed in detaching any part of the Turkish dominions from the Sultaun, to effect a re-conquest, and restore their integrity. But was the hon. gentleman not aware, that a contract was only binding upon the contracting parties; and that this article, therefore, could only mean, if interpreted by the plain rule of common sense, that France and England solemnly engaged not to infringe upon the Ottoman empire, as it existed previously to the war? We were not bound to interfere on account of any aggression by other powers, or of any internal commotions in the state. If France attempted the dismemberment of Turkey, it was a breach of faith, it was a violation of treaty, and afforded a good ground for a declaration of war on the part of England. Was not the same degree of reliance to be placed upon the honour of the French, as of every other government? The learned doctor said, No; and averred, that French perfidy was seen in the chief consul having, since the signature of the preliminaries with England, ratified a treaty with Portugal, which, according to the assurance of the noble secretary of state, he had agreed to cancel. But to him the explanation of the noble secretary was perfectly satisfactory, and thoroughly vindicated Buonaparté against the charge of infidelity to his engagements. The learned doctor would do well to wait until an official copy of the treaty in question could be produced, instead of indulging himself in rash and ill-grounded invective. —Another objection made to the preliminaries by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Windham) and the learned doctor was, that no provision was introduced for the security of the royalists, who had joined our standard, and co-operated with us to effect the restoration of monarchical government. General Menou, it was said, had bargained, in the capitulation of Alexandria, for the security of all persons who had taken up arms against their own government, and had aided his attempt to separate Egypt from the Turkish empire; but would gentlemen therefore say, that England, in offering a projet of peace to France, should have insisted upon a positive stipulation, that safe return and adequate provision should be granted to all those who had used every endeavour to overturn the existing government in that country? There existed no analogy between the two cases. Was any such article inserted in the projet at Lisle? Certainly not. Was any such provision to be found in the treaty with our American colonies? Certainly not. For his part, he greatly doubted whether France would have consented to treat at all, if the preliminaries had contained a condition on the part of his majesty in behalf of those whom the French government, whose legitimacy we had now acknowledged, regarded in no other light than rebels. His majesty's ministers had doubtless, in the most strenuous manner, recommended those unfortunate royalists to the protection and humanity of the first consul. What more could they have done? It was all which, consistently with propriety, could have been brought forward, and all which they promised in the proclamation quoted by the learned doctor. This proclamation from the king, in the early part of the war, invited such as were discontented with the existing order of things in France, to join the British standard, and held out to them an assurance of protection, but what degree of protection did it pledge? It stated that every support should be given to them "which the nature of the case would admit." How then had his majesty's government broken faith with the French royalists? He was ready to believe, without calling upon them for any declaration whatever, that they had urged their pitiable condition with the greatest force; and that they would still continue to show the greatest possible attention to their interests.—Of the peace itself, he was free to avow, that it commanded his full and unqualified approbation. He would state the principle upon which he gave his vote in favour of the preliminaries? It was, that such a peace was far preferable to the continuance of the war, and that the chance of obtaining an island or two was not worth the blood and treasure which would necessarily be expended in another campaign. He was a stranger to those gloomy apprehensions, as to the insecurity of this peace, which were entertained by some. The energies of the British nation had been frequently exhibited during the war; and he was at a loss to discover why our dominions, being increased so considerably, we should be less equal to the defence of our territories in another than in the past contest. Instead of suffering a low and depressed state of spirits, his mind exulted with joy. He gave credit to ministers for having concluded the best peace, which the circumstances of the country would allow. He was convinced that they had acted from the purest motives. Than the right hon. gentleman at the head of his majesty's councils, whom he was proud to call his tried and faithful friend, from earliest youth (the chancellor of the exchequer), a man of more private integrity and public virtue did not exist. With the greatest pleasure he gave his assent to the preliminaries; and if the future conduct of ministers were conformable to the specimen they had now given—if the pacific system should appear to prevail in all their councils—and if they did not continue the existing encroachments upon the constitution beyond the date of their expiration, they should have his unbounded confidence, and cordial support.

Mr. Baker said, that if the terms of the peace were not so good as he could have wished, he was convinced that it was not the fault of ministers, who, he was sure, had done every thing in their power to obtain the best possible terms for the country. The great question for the House to decide was, whether the terms of the peace were adequate to our situation, considering it with relation to the situation of France? and upon the best consideration he was able to give the subject, he was inclined to think they were. It had been said that we had now to contend against the power, and not against the principles of France. To this proposition he could not accede; because, in fact, we were contending against power founded upon those very principles. He had been very much struck with an observation which had been made by an hon. gentleman, that France, in the whole of this transaction, had shown nothing like any principles of conciliation. She retained every one of those possessions which she had acquired, by the exercise of those principles against which it was now supposed we had no longer to contend. It was unnecessary for him, in supporting this argument, to go over all the arguments that could be adduced upon the subject. He need not state the cases of Holland, Flanders, &c. Her conduct with regard to Flanders showed that she set all treaties at defiance when they interfered with her projects; and she now retained Flanders, which she had so acquired, to the great danger of this country. There was another part of the conduct of France which was revolted at in the negotiations of Paris and Lisle, but which seemed to have been admitted in this, viz. that whatever they acquired in the war, and incorporated with their dominions, became so absolutely annexed to their dominions, that they would not suffer them to become the subject of negotiation. The case of Belgium and of Savoy proved this assertion. This consideration seemed to have been overlooked in the present treaty. Besides, France had never, either in form or in substance, repealed the famous decree of the 19th November, 1792; nay, she had not only given it up, but she had invariably acted upon it. Another subject which he thought well worth attention was, the situation of St. Domingo. It was the intention, he understood, of France, to send out a very large force to that island, and they were not to be sent out in the ordinary way, in transports, but in ships of the line. The consequence of this would be, that France would have a very large force in the West Indies, and we must either keep an equal force or our possessions there would be at the mercy of France in case of a rupture with her. It would therefore, in his opinion, be necessary for us to keep up a large force. He then alluded to some articles which had appeared in the public papers, which were represented as secret articles of this treaty; they stated, that we were to guarantee the king of Etruria, &c. He merely referred to them as having seen them in the newspapers, without knowing whether they were authentic or not. Upon the whole, however, he decidedly approved of the peace; but at the same time he thought we ought to adopt every precautionary measure that we could, without exciting the suspicions of France.

Mr. Dawson rose to pay his tribute to those ministers who had concluded a peace which appeared to him to meet universal approbation. He was in Ireland when the news of the peace arrived, and he did not meet a man who was well affected to the constitution, who did not rejoice at it. With regard to the terms, he had such an opinion of the present administration, that he was convinced they were as good as could be obtained.

Mr. W. Wynn said, that after so many gentleman had so fully and so ably spoken upon this subject, he certainly was unable to add any thing new upon it, but he could not give a silent vote. He could not look upon the peace with the same sentiments of satisfaction as many gentlemen had done, because he thought it was big with danger to the country.

Colonel Wood said, that, to form a correct judgment on the subject, we must consider not merely the relative situations of France and England, but of those countries in respect to other powers of Europe. France he considered as invulnerable to any attack from England, for the purpose of abridging her continental power; but he believed few gentlemen considered every part of the united kingdom, as well as of our extensive colonies, as equally secure from France. Undoubtedly, by blockading her ports, and destroying her trade, France might have been induced, within some indefinite time, to accede to better terms than the present, but the dangers and evils likely to arise from lengthening the contest, no terms could, in his mind, compensate for. The addition of forty millions a year to national debt, exclusive of keeping many hundred thousands of our most valuable subjects idle, who could be employed in agriculture, manufactures, and the improvement of the country; considering the present state of our finances, as well as the burthens of the people, were weighty reasons with ministers for concluding the present peace. But there were many other cogent reasons, in the present state of Europe, which justified them in putting an end to so ruinous a contest. Gentleman cannot have so soon forgotten the confederacy of the northern powers to destroy the most important interests of this country; and, although the contest is for the present at an end, may we not reasonably conjecture that Denmark and Sweden are not still so well disposed towards us, as their own real interests ought to have led them to be? Russia, indeed, was now governed by a wise and just prince; yet, who would stake the security of their country upon the life of an individual? What reliance could be had upon the crooked policy of Prussia? and Austria, had she even the ability, has she still the inclination to renew the contest? Could we expect from Turkey any important assistance, at a time when she can scarcely prevent her own tottering empire from falling to pieces? Under these untoward circumstances, was England to wage war against France, for the object of reducing her continental power, at the time that these powers upon the continent most interested had themselves confirmed it? Such conduct would have been more wild than the adventures of Don Quixote. No person more regretted than he did the overgrown power of France; but no one could foresee but that very power, which was at present so formidable, might contain in it the seeds of its own dissolution. In regard to the conquests which were to be restored, excepting Malta, none appeared to him to be very material to the interests of this country. That island, from its situation, fortifications, and harbour, was invaluable to this country; and so long as we held possession of it, France could never look towards Egypt and Syria as the road to molest us in India. The Levant trade, although at present inconsiderable, was, he believed, chiefly to be attributed to the most unwise monopoly granted to the Turkey company, who do not themselves use it, yet by their charter precluded others from benefiting. As to the West India islands, we had still as many of them as could be for the interest of the country; and, unless those we had could be retained at a less expense of blood and treasure, we had better be without them. The Cape of Good Hope, undoubtedly, should France re-establish her marine, might be of consequence; but under the present circumstances he had doubts. Ceylon was of infinite importance, on account of its harbour; as was the Island of Trinidad, in the West Indies, for the same reason. Under all circumstances, he felt infinite obligations to ministers for putting an end to the war; and particularly to his right hon. friend the present minister, who, in an hour of difficulty and danger, charged himself with the helm of the state, and had for the present brought her safely into port.

Mr. Ellison repelled the idea, that the country was in a state of humiliation; on the contrary, he thought her recent conduct peculiarly glorious to her. She was true to her allies, and adequately asserted her own honour and interests. He thanked ministers for what they had done. The peace, he trusted, would unite every heart and hand in the country in support of its government.

Mr. Nicholls was confident that the peace would prove safe with respect to this country in every point of view. He expressed his conviction of the sincerity of the French government. Much seemed to be apprehended from France becoming a commercial nation; that her character in that respect would alter, he wished. He would rather see her attention turned to her commerce and colonies, than her power employed in hostile or destructive projects. In this view he wished she might regain the entire possession of St. Domingo, and he wished it with a view to the safety of our own West India Islands, and of Jamaica in particular; for in the present situation of St. Domingo, that invaluable island could not be safe. He also regarded the peace with satisfaction as the basis of reciprocal commercial benefits, and of the renewal of the commercial treaty with France. He firmly believed that the present treaty was made in the true spirit of reconciliation, and he gave ministers full credit for their conduct in procuring it for the country. At the same time, he was induced to commend the moderation displayed by Buonaparté, particularly with respect to Austria, which, he thought, was highly honourable to him. If riches were the object of the French, they, who were an enlightened and wise people, well knew that they were not to be acquired by the means of plunder and pillage. Such a line of conduct never made a nation rich, or Algiers would be one of the richest countries in the world. No, the French were well aware, that it was alone by habits of peace and industry that riches were to be acquired, and by commercial pursuits, which it was obvious could alone be successfully cultivated in the interval of peace.

Mr. Babington spoke in favour of the peace, and adverted to the article between France and England, respecting the guarantee of integrity to the Turkish territories, which principle he treated as highly impolitic and dangerous. He entertained a jealousy with respect to guarantees in general, though he was aware that circumstances might arise which might render such measures expedient. He considered Russia and Austria as the natural allies of this country, and as forming the most efficacious reciprocal checks upon France.

Mr. R. Thornton approved of the peace, for which he thought ministers deserved the thanks and gratitude of the country: it was the more acceptable, because unexpected by the great body of the people; and he had reason to think ministers had obtained the most favourable terms that could be had. France might be increased in bulk; but she was not proportionally so in real strength and muscle. Peace was desirable at almost any rate.

Mr. G. Ogle observed, that there was not a loyal man in Ireland who did not receive the tidings of the peace with joy and satisfaction; and, on the contrary, there was not a rebel, or a disaffected individual, who did not receive it with disapprobation and regret.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that by what had fallen from the hon. gentleman who spoke last, he understood, that those hon. gentlemen who so highly disapproved of the peace, were countenanced in that disapprobation by the feelings and opinions of the disaffected; and that so far as their feelings were hurt at the peace, those feelings (unexpectedly no doubt by them) were in unison with those of the United Irish. His right hon. friend who had led the debate that evening, seemed to think that peace could not be sincerely made on both sides, or firmly established with France, until, not only the government and political principles of France were changed, but even the morals and manners of her people were radically reformed. With respect to these measures, he should observe, that an answer to them all was comprised in a question asked by that hon. gentleman himself:—"Are we never to be at Peace?" He would answer—"Yes;" and at the same time would say, that he hoped and trusted, that, upon the principles cited from his right hon. friend, the government or the parliament of Great Britain would never be influenced to act. He had the highest respect for the character of his right hon. friend. He well knew the uprightness and firmness of his principles, and the ardour and sincerity of his patriotism. His regret at differing from him in points of such incalculable importance was, therefore, the more considerable. His right hon. friend had seemed to start at the bare idea of an end to our resources: With respect to these, he certainly could not say they were inexhaustible; yet, God be thanked, the national resources were far from being in that situation which some gentlemen seemed to consider them; and he would observe in the contemplation of their being farther removed from such a state, that he rejoiced that the sovereign had yielded to the advice of his confidential servants, in consenting to the preliminaries of peace. With respect to what had been said, in a comparative view, in regard to the negotiations at Lisle, he contended, that, in the way of argument, those who defended the preliminaries had a right to put the case as they had done; and that the House, which approved of the negotiation at Lisle, could not, in consistency or justice, refuse their approbation in this instance. It had been said, that the continental power of France was not abridged, and that Britain was confessedly unable to contest that power. It was never meant to say, that the power of Great Britain was not such, that, if properly used, it might, with every desirable effect be placed in the scale opposite to that of France; in this idea, he did not mean hostilely opposed, but in the way of comparison of their political power and influence. He must revolt at the idea, that, because France had made considerable acquisitions, England could not raise its head—far from it; and in proof of this he had only to desire those who doubted, to look at the state of our army and navy, and consider their achievements—to contemplate our national commerce, resources, and wealth—and, above all, our inestimable constitution. He should not omit, in a statement of this kind, the extent of our dominions and possessions, as well at home as broad: added to this, let the national character of both countries be thrown into the scale of consideration, and then compare the whole with all that France possessed, and he had no hesitation in putting the question, let any wise and candid man lay his hand upon his heart and say, on which side lay the advantage?

The Address was then agreed to, and ordered to be presented to his majesty by the whole House.

The King's Answer to the Commons Address.] To the Address of the Commons his Majesty returned this Answer:

"Gentlemen; I return you my thanks for this loyal and dutiful Address. The sentiments which you have expressed upon this important occasion are highly satisfactory to me, and calculated to produce the happiest effects."

Debate in the Lords on the Preliminaries of Peace with France.] Nov. 3. The order of the day being read, the Preliminary Articles of Peace were read at length by the clerk. After which,

The Earl of Romney rose and said: My lords; we have terminated a war, the most momentous in which Britain has ever been engaged; a war productive of the heaviest burthens, though patriotically and loyally borne. It was a war of necessity, for the defence of our allies and for the preservation of our religion, law and social order; and as it was on our part necessary, so, where we only were concerned, has it been accompanied by the most signal successes. Glorious as that war was in which the immortal Chatham presided at the helm of affairs, the present is equally splendid; our fleets have been victorious to a greater extent than even in the Seven Years war: they have crushed the navy, and annihilated the commerce of our enemy: the whole of maritime Europe, jealous of our naval power, combined to attempt its humiliation; they found all vain endeavours recoil on themselves. Egypt has witnessed the glorious exertions of the British troops. In that country we had to contend with an army much more numerous than our own, inured to the climate, and commanded by an able and skilful general. They were the chosen troops of France, who had fought under the conqueror of Italy in all his triumphant campaigns: and with reason had styled themselves the Invincible Legion; for invincible they were till they encountered British soldiers. In every other enterprize where Britons only were concerned, we succeeded. Success is the season for concluding peace. It is not wise nor politic to be, even in victory, pertinacious beyond the object of the contest, or to insist on terms more advantageous than those for which we originally fought. We have secured our religion, our laws, our constitution, our property, and our independence. The treaty before the House secured all the important objects for which the war had been carried on. The settlements of Ceylon and Trinidad, which we have retained, are of considerable importance. In India we have gained signal victories. We have conquered Mysore, and entirely destroyed the principal friend of France, who, with his father Hyder Ally, has been always forming projects hostile to England. We have also procured restitution to the allies who continued to adhere to us. We had driven from the Turkish dominions an enemy who had seized the most valuable part of the Sultan's territories, and the granary of his metropolis. To our allies, during the war, we behaved with magnanimous liberality. When fidelity to us was no longer beneficial to themselves, we released them from their engagements. France had, no doubt, obtained additions to her territories, far surpassing any conquests that Louis 14th had conceived possible. But the conquests of France were not the fault of Britain. We could not prevent its gigantic effort on the continent. Were we to persevere in a hopeless contest?

Were we, for an island more or less, not necessary to our security, to go on accumulating debt? It has been objected, that the peace cannot be lasting; but one great security for its permanence is the interest both of Britain and France. It appears to me, that the treaty insures to Britain security; and, as far as the uncertainty of all human actions admits, promises to be permanent. The noble lord concluded with moving the following Address:

“Most gracious sovereign; we, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your majesty our most sincere thanks for your gracious condescension in directing the preliminary articles of peace, which have been ratified by your majesty and the French Republic, to be laid before this House.—We can assure your majesty, that we have bestowed on them that serious consideration which the important objects they embrace so justly demand; and we beg leave to express to your majesty, with the most heart-felt gratitude, the satisfaction we derive from this important arrangement, which, while it manifests your majesty’s justice and moderation, and the regard and attention to good faith which have governed your majesty’s conduct towards your allies, will, we are persuaded, be productive of important national advantages, and promote the substantial interests of this country.”

Viscount Limerick supported the Address. He thought it augured strongly in favour of the treaty, that all ranks and descriptions of men in the country approved of it. In his estimation, the preliminaries were most opportunely concluded; their tenor was advantageous, and the whole proceeding highly honourable to the national character. Let the present situation of the country be compared with that in which she stood at the last peace, and the comparison would be decidedly in favour of her present circumstances. On the former occasion, our finest colonies were rent from the parent state. Island after island, and fortress after fortress, were shamefully ceded to the enemy. The ministry of that day were prevented from perfecting what they had well begun, by being driven from their seats by an unexpected and unnatural coalition. He hoped nothing of that sort would take place in the present day. On no former occasion had the skill and bravery of our navy and army shone forth with greater brilliancy. He would instance the cases of Egypt and Aboukir. He hoped that a stronger peace establishment would be kept up. The war he had always held to be necessary, and of course just; and the late ministers deserved the gratitude of the country for their conduct with respect to it. The present ministers likewise deserved the greatest applause. They were vested with the reins of government at a period of great difficulty, and their conduct had evinced their patriotism and ability.

Earl Spencer lamented the necessity he felt himself under from his sense of duty, to deliver an opinion opposite to that of the two noble lords who had last spoke. If he did not feel himself called upon by his sense of duty, he should much rather have deplored in silence the calamity of the present peace, and the enthusiastic joy with which the people had received it. He should rather have suppressed the mortification he felt at the degradation of his country: he felt peculiar pain at opposing the measures of men with whom he had so long acted, and with whom he was connected by the ties of friendship; but his opinion on this subject was diametrically opposite to their’s. He thought that no single object of the war had been obtained, and that we had sacrificed all means of protection. We had in every part of the world made cessions of countries which the valour of our forces by land and sea had conquered, and which would have secured us from the effects of the aggrandizement of France upon the continent. It had been said that we had protected our allies. What was the fact? How had we protected Portugal? It appeared that it was only a portion of her territory whose integrity was to be preserved. A part of the important province of Olivenza was to be ceded: our ally the prince of Orange was not even named in the preliminaries, although from his faithful attachment to us he had lost both his territories and his station. Could it be said that Ceylon and Trinidad gave either sufficient indemnity for the past, or security for the future? In India the bravery of our army had subdued Tippoo Saib, and placed that country out of danger; but by this peace, which surrenders to the enemy the Cape of Good Hope and Cochin, we afford them an entrance into Malabar; while in South America we have permitted Portugal to cede to France a strong military position at the mouth of the river of Amazons. In the West Indies we had surrendered Martinico, and left the French in possession of St. Domingo. In the Mediterranean we had surrendered every thing, and excluded ourselves. In Malta the French were to have equal footing with ourselves. In short, he saw nothing but a precarious peace. It was said it was the interest of France to maintain this peace, but who had learned to calculate the interest of an usurper? If ever peace was precarious, this was that peace. If ever precarious peace was dangerous, this was that peace. The French principles are triumphant, and adorned with all the attraction and dignity of success. He felt sorry to differ from ministers, and considered it now most peculiarly his duty to support such measures of vigour as might give the country a chance of safety.

The Duke of Clarence supported the peace. He considered that we had as much security as could be expected in those revolutionary times, from a government of the nature of the French Republic. His royal highness took an able review of the events of the last war: after bestowing the warmest encomiums on our fleets, he paid the highest tribute of applause to the gallantry of the British soldiers during the course of the war. In this respect he traced the glory of the British arms, not only in gallant exploits achieved upon the continent of Europe, but in the conquest of the enemy's colonies, and in the overthrow and destruction of Tippoo Saib. While the British arms were attended with such glory and success, a gigantic enterprise of the present first consul of France threatened for a time to interrupt their progress. 40,000 of the best troops of the French Republic embarked on the expedition to Egypt. This plan not only menaced all our possessions in the East, but threatened the existence of the Turkish government.—The first important check which this formidable army of French invaders met, was from a handful of British troops under sir Sidney Smith, long before the landing of that army which became in their turn the conquerors of Egypt. It was on the memorable 21st of March last, when a British army, engaged with a French army, proved itself superior both in courage and capacity. The French, although superior in numbers, were very inferior in military address. After passing very high encomiums on the conduct of our army, his royal highness passed to the brilliant achievements of our navy. The memorable 1st of June, 14th of February, 11th of October, and 1st of August, would be for ever brilliant and glorious in our naval history. The time was however come for making peace. Each of the powers, from their vast conquests, was placed in that predicament, that no blow could be given with effect on either side. France had completely overcome every contending power on the continent. Great Britain, as far as regarded maritime affairs, was in the same state. This was therefore (as expressed by a distinguished personage) no common peace; but a reconciliation of differences between the two greatest powers in the world! He considered the possessions that we retained as very judiciously selected, not only from their productions and real value, but on account of their situations and the advantages we might derive from their harbours. It was the obvious policy of Great Britain to pay her principal attention to commercial stations; while an immense power like France naturally looked to continental acquisitions. His royal highness concluded by giving his hearty assent to the motion.

Lord Pelham, in vindication of the treaty, compared it with the projet which the former ministers had given in in 1797. The only difference was, that the Cape of Good Hope, which by that projet was to have been retained, is now to be made a free port. This difference surely would not authorize a continuation of the war. As to no mention having been made of the prince of Orange, it was most evident that we had not the power to reinstate him by force of arms; but certainly no opportunity would be lost in negotiating for his interests. Naples, which now was possessed by the armies of France, was to be restored to its lawful sovereign. Malta was to be availing to neither of the contracting parties. As for Portugal, she had retained every thing that could be useful to retain, and had made no sacrifice that could be injurious. There was nothing in the West Indies which could have justified a continuance of the struggle, and in the East the overthrow of Tippoo had completely secured our empire from annoyance. Ceylon and Trinidad were important acquisitions; but it was much more important that we had overcome the erroneous opinions prevalent in England and in Ireland. He concluded with trusting the peace would be found advantageous and safe for the country.

Lord Westmeath was fully persuaded that we had obtained the securities of peace. We had consequently established, on the firmest basis, the prosperity and happiness of Great Britain. By the blessings of peace we might restore trade, improve agriculture, and strengthen our constitution. We had also an opportunity of checking the restless ambition of a few factious men, who take a pleasure in disturbing the peace and happiness of mankind. The time of trouble was past, and things would be restored to their former prosperity and vigour. Our system of government, instead of being the sport of mad theorists, who wished to overturn the glorious fabric of our ancestors, would, as hitherto, become the admiration of the world. By the peace which the ministers had attained, we might return to objects of industry and the blessings of peace. Ireland, instead of being a millstone about the neck of Great Britain, would prove an inestimable jewel.

Lord Grenville said, it would have been matter of the most heart-felt satisfaction to him, if he could have agreed to an address, stating that we had brought an arduous and important contest to a successful termination. If the fact was so, it would be matter of consolation to him for the remainder of his life. But much, he feared, that instead of this being the case, he should have to lament that those years which he had spent in endeavouring to attain it, would prove to have been spent in fruitless labour; for, according to the best consideration he had been able to give the subject, no one of the objects for which we had warred so long had been attained. The noble mover had justly stated, that security had been the object of the war. It was so; but instead of obtaining that object, we were in a situation of greater insecurity than we were at the commencement of the war, or at any time during its continuance. In examining the question before them, he thought it material to state what was precisely and distinctly the nature of the proposed motion. He conceived the question was not whether peace was desirable upon secure and honourable terms, for peace upon such terms was the object of every war; nor whether it should, or should not now be agreed to; for the honour of the nation was pledged to perform the conditions; but it was this: What are the merits of the present treaty? And shall the House carry to the foot of the throne an address which tells his majesty that they have fully considered those merits, and that the terms are such as deserve their approbation? To this he could not agree, because he thought the terms fraught with degradation and national humiliation. The question being thus narrowed, the next consideration was, how was it to be tried? It had been stated, that it was a question of terms, and that therefore the test must be by an examination of those terms; by weighing our cessions and our conquests; and by balancing our losses, our acquisitions, and our relative situation. In entering into negotiation, every statesman knew that the basis must be one of these two—either to take status quo ante bellum, or the uti possidetis, at the moment of negotiating. From one of these points every negotiation must set out. True it was, that if the state of things were such, that they could not be replaced in their original position; or that the superiority of one side was such as to render ridiculous such a project, at least every deviation in the other case ought to be narrowly watched and maturely considered. If we were inferior to our enemy, that most unquestionably must be taken into consideration. But that was not our situation: at no period of the last year were we inferior to the enemy in the means necessary to continue the contest with vigour and effect. If the situation of the country was elevated and prosperous, we ought to have had honourable terms of peace, because we were in a condition to demand them. This being the situation of our own country, what was the situation of France, and by comparing the two countries, what were their relative conditions? It was far from his intention to under-value the acquisitions of France; on the contrary he thought them more important than they were generally esteemed. She had made the Rhine the boundary of her empire; she had acquired Savoy, &c. and had not only extended her territory beyond what the most ambitious of her monarchs ever had in contemplation, but she had her frontiers protected by dependent republics and tributary kings.

On our side, we had successes no less brilliant and striking; we had multiplied our colonies, and our navy rode invincible. We had rescued Egypt; we had captured Malta; we had possessed ourselves of Minorca; and the Mediterranean was shut up from the ships of France and Spain. In the East Indies we had every thing except Batavia, and that we should have possessed, but it was not worth the cost of an expedition. We had the Cape of Good Hope, if not the only, at least an important key to the East. In the West Indies we had every thing desirable, Martinico, Trinidad, &c. &c. Upon the continent of South America we had an absolute empire, in extent almost equal, and superior to that power to whom we had restored it. He meant Surinam, Demerara, &c. Indeed, the value of it was not known until in British hands, it had felt the benefit of British industry and British capital. Such were the colonial possessions which we had acquired by the war. It was true that the war was not undertaken for the purpose of colonial conquests; yet the force of the country had been most wisely directed to that object; for whenever we were at war with France, one of our first objects must always be to cripple her marine, which could never be better done than by contracting her commerce—by depriving her of her colonial possessions. But although we were disappointed in the object of the war, these possessions should nevertheless have been held as pledges of indemnity, and still more as pledges for security; and if the continent of Europe could not have been restored to its former state, they ought to have been retained as a counterpoise to the power of France.—The noble secretary seemed to rest a great part of his defence of the treaty by a sort of argumentum ad hominem, by a comparison of the treaty with the projet of Lisle. He disdained to retract what he then did, but he thought the question ought to be decided by arguments of higher importance, and drawn from the nature of things themselves. But it had escaped the noble lord's memory that in addition to what they proposed to cede by the projet of Lisle, the present treaty gave up Surinam, Malta, and Minorca. Upon what new principle in negotiation was it, that, after four years of additional war and expense, they should offer more to receive less, which was the case, as between the present treaty and the projet of Lisle? The noble lord said, that they treated on a footing of equality. At Lisle the case was different; for at no time during the continuance of the war was the spirit of the country so much depressed as just as that period. If he were asked, why did ministers choose such a moment of despondency to negotiate? He would fairly say, that it was a moment preferred by no man; but they were fully convinced, though it was then a melancholy reflection, that the war could no longer be carried on, unless the people were convinced that peace would not be granted by the then rulers of France, upon any terms that could be acceded to. A variety of causes all combined to produce that despondency: the stoppage of the Bank, the defection of our allies, and, above all, the deplorable mutiny in our fleet. If such was then the situation of the country, the terms might have been defended upon necessity; but no man had ventured to assert that the present was a measure of that nature. It was said, that as much was secured by the present treaty as would have been by the projet at Lisle; but by that we demanded the Cape and Cochin; and though we gave up much for ourselves, yet we retained the dignity of stipulating for our allies. In that respect the two propositions differed as much as light from darkness. We then stipulated for Portugal, not equivocally but expressly; and we had also another ally who was not omitted in the projet at Lisle, though he was abandoned by the present treaty; namely, the prince of Orange. The noble lord had said, that some measures might be adopted in the definitive treaty relative to that point; but was it enough to say that some measures might be adopted? If they had insisted upon an indemnity for the prince of Orange, would the French have made it a matter of sufficient importance to break the treaty? If it should also appear that a great part of the losses of that prince arose from his attachment to this country—if many of the colonies which we had gained came into our possession by an order from him, and which was made the cause of confiscating his property, what could they think of themselves in restoring those colonies without stipulating that the confiscature for this surrender should also be taken off?—His next consideration was as to the guarantee of the integrity of the dominions of Portugal. His satisfaction at this part of the treaty was abated at an explanation he had heard from the noble secretary. But, in the first place, he begged leave to protest against the practice of signing preliminaries, which bore one view upon the face of them, but yet were limited by secret understandings between the parties. Let them know what the concessions were, and not betray them into an approbation of terms without knowing what those terms were. The noble lord told them that this integrity was as it had been settled by the treaty of Badajos; and by the explanation of the noble lord, it did not appear but that instead of guaranteeing the integrity of Portugal, it confirmed her dismemberment. But this was not all: the treaty of Madrid and of Badajos gave to France the means of a naval arsenal at the mouth of the Amazon River; and if French Guiana were to extend to the limits prescribed by those treaties, it would throw the whole of the Brazils completely under her control. To estimate the consequences of this, let their lordships look at our Indian dominions. What we had gained there we had gained by the war, and not by the preliminaries; for by the cessions we made to the French in India, we had put our own possessions in a state of great hazard. What he objected to was, the cession of Cochin and Pondicherry. The fort of Cochin was one of the strongest in India; and at the time of the treaty at Lisle, administration had made up their minds that on no consideration would they resign that fortress. When we had driven out Tippoo, and destroyed all competition in the Mysore country, there was no more ground for the French to remain in Pondicherry and Cochin, than for us to cede the Netherlands and yet claim to garrison the barrier town with our troops. They could have no object in retaining those possessions, but to excite the native powers against us. As to Pondicherry, it was of no great importance except as connected with Cochin; but as for the latter, he conceived it to be most dangerous in the hands of France. He asked, what would prevent her, being in possession of those places, from filling them with European troops equal to the number of our own in that country; and if so, would it not form a dangerous diversion, if, when we had any dispute with the northern native powers, we must also dispatch an European force south to protect the Ghauts, and the flat country? Combine this with the cession of the Cape. Much had been lately said of the little importance of the Cape as a point of commerce: he still retained the old-fashioned opinion that it was of very great importance. It was said, that it had of late become the practice to proceed direct to the destination in India, and not to touch at the Cape, which consequently rendered it less important. In answer to this he had to observe, that it was not matter of indifference, in case even of stress of weather, for an East India ship to have a friendly port at which she could enter to refit. But another consequence resulted from this argument: if the Cape was of no value, why retain it so far as to stipulate for a free port? The consequence must be, that this article in the preliminaries must be of no value if the Cape itself was of so little. He asked, was it of no value as a port of war? He had shown that there was a danger of the French excluding them from the ports of Brazil; and if they were also excluded from the Cape, they would have no means of sending an armament to the East. For though commercial ships might proceed direct, yet transports could not. Here was again an important difference between the present preliminaries and the projet of Lisle, by which we retained the Cape, Cochin, and Pondicherry. With regard to the West Indies, he was not inclined to undervalue Trinidad; but the advantages to be derived from it were as yet merely speculative. They were told that it was capable of becoming a great military station. It might be so. But what had we given in exchange?—Martinique. That was already cultivated—that was already a military situation: and so far was it from increasing our security, that he understood our military force was to be increased.—He came next to the Mediterranean. There we had possessed ourselves of every thing, and had ceded every thing. Gibraltar, Minorca, Malta, Porto Ferrajo, and Egypt, were all in our hands. The first indeed, we had retained; but every thing else we had given up. The first consequence of our liberating Egypt, was a treaty by our ally with the French, by which they were put in the same situation with ourselves in the dominions of Turkey. Malta we had also given up, which was a most important military station, and had reserved its future protection to a subsequent discussion; but no future arrangement respecting that island, could put us in the same situation in which we stood before the war. As the treaty did not specify who the protecting power was to be, it would be indecorous in him to say more upon the subject; but he would add, that in contest with that power he would hold that important fortress as a pledge for our acquiescence in any demands which might be made. He begged to notice a deviation from all accustomed practice in signing the present preliminaries. It had been usual to make the preliminaries as comprehensive as possible, and leave but little to the definitive treaty. It was so in the treaties of 1763 and 1782; and the reason of the policy was obvious, because it fell precisely under the situation of a naval armistice, by which blockaded ports were opened: they could furnish them with naval stores, and make new distribution of their forces. He confessed, therefore, that though the ministers would resist any new demands, yet he was not sanguine that they would obtain any better terms at Amiens. This observation applied to another article, which was left for future discussion—he meant the Newfoundland fishery. England had nothing to wish but that it should remain as it stood at the last peace. What occasion was there, then, to throw open this subject, especially as any new arrangement must be made in favour of France? One point more, as respecting Naples. If we treated Naples as our ally, we ought to have stipulated effectually for her; at present the terms were perfectly illusory: France was to withdraw her troops, but she might go into the Cisalpine Republic, within sixty miles of Naples; and it might happen, that all which she would get would be a precarious respite of three days.—Having thus gone through the important parts of the treaty, he asked, whether the situation of France justified her in these exorbitant demands? If we treated upon a footing of equality he saw no reciprocity—all the sacrifices were on our part, and none on theirs. The result, in his opinion, was, that we had given them the only thing they wanted—the means of creating a navy, and of rivalling us in our commerce. This treaty would extend their commerce as much as their territory. But why it was done, was not so satisfactorily explained. It was not from necessity, for all the noble lords had protested against that plea, and he rejoiced to hear it. There was one thing farther:

if it was not a measure of necessity, was it one of expediency? Were the disadvantages of the war more than the advantages of the peace? He could not think so; instead of security, we stood in greater danger than ever. He saw no motives to submit to such a peace. He would not suppose the threat of invasion could influence it; if it did, that would be repeated whenever the enemy had a point to carry. At the last peace it was necessary to show that the united fleets of Spain, France, and Holland exceeded our own—that was not the case at present, nor could it become so. By the peace, however, we had removed every security which we before possessed. Malta, Minorca, the Cape, Cochin, all surrendered, and our only security was upon the word of France. Much had been said of our reliance upon France. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the French government had an equal interest with our own in suppressing Jacobinism; admitting, that the republic was a kingdom, except in the name, and that there was as much disposition there to support regular government, as if the lawful heir of the house of Bourbon were on the throne of France: still the ambition of France, as directed against this country, would, under her enormous aggrandisement, be truly dismaying! Even under her monarchy, she at all times manifested a disposition to take advantage of our broils. Why, under the consulate, were we to expect such a different line of conduct? Reviewing the present state of Europe, no man could answer for a long continuance of peace. Ten years of peace were as much as the wisest man would venture to calculate upon. And it was worth while to consider in what degree of improvement the two countries might be, as to the means of warfare, at the expiration of that period, should any possession of ours, or more probably of our allies, tempt the cupidity or ambition of France. It was a serious thing to see the interests of the country signed away. He felt for the members of the present administration every kind of personal respect; but he differed from them most decidedly in this instance. Still he appeared not before their lordships as a professed oppositionist. He would strenuously and zealously support them, after this much-to-be-lamented business was disposed of, in every act of firmness and vigour which they might display in repelling those efforts and repress-

ing those principles, which have produced the present war and the sufferings of the European world.—There was one thing more to which he would advert. He agreed cheerfully in the necessity of a peace establishment far beyond what had been necessary at the termination of former contests. The very nature of this peace rendered it doubly necessary. Let ministers, in this respect, behave with wisdom, firmness, and vigour, and they should have his decided support. They were bound to guard against the consequences of their indiscretion. We were now in a new situation. We were enfeebled, but not broken down: we were lowered, but not debased. Some of our out-works had been demolished; many of them surrendered to the foe; but the citadel yet remained; and while it was defended by the noble courage of united Britons, it would bid defiance to attack. We should meet with mortifications and disappointments; but we should, he trusted, still preserve our honour, our constitution, and our religion.

The Lord Chancellor entered into a defence of the peace. He was firmly persuaded, that the war had been carried on until it became hopeless to proceed any farther. It was undertaken to guard the country against the effect of principles and practices, which had been propagated and carried on by persons combined for the purpose of overturning the constitution. With this object in view, the war was attended with success; because those principles no longer existed to any extent that could be attended with danger. In advising his majesty to make peace, he would perish sooner than he would sacrifice any of the essential interests of the country; but when he said that, he must not be understood to vapour in praise of the peace, as if it was a very honourable one. His principal object had been the attainment of a secure and lasting peace, and the former ministers had often declared they had no other object in view; but from what had that night fallen from the noble lord, this was very evident, that unless his argument could be displaced from their lordships' minds, this country was gone and ruined. If the representation was true, which the noble lord had given of the external and internal state of this country, he would ask him at what period could he ever hope to make a peace? What were the restorations he would refuse? It was true that this country had got several possessions belonging to the enemy; but had France gained none at all? Had she no dominion over Naples or Portugal? It was stated that, in 1797, all the possessions of France would be restored, had the negotiation at Lisle been successful. A colony restored was certainly the same thing as if it had never been conquered. It was a fact, that, in 1797, a peace had been sought for with the French Directory; but the noble lord should recollect that nothing had been done at Lisle, except proposing the basis on which the parties were about to treat; and there was a material difference between a proposition and an ultimatum. It was not, therefore, certain what conditions would have been agreed upon, had the negotiations gone on. The noble lord's observations with regard to Portugal, were not well-founded; and, whatever consequences might arise from the new arrangements with regard to her American territory, it was an evil which could bear no proportion to that of continuing the war. He would not continue the war with a view of getting rid of the war. There were many things which he might have thought necessary to be insisted upon, but which circumstances prevented him from doing. He thought the circumstances under which this country had entered into the war might have imposed upon him a necessity of requiring that a competent provision should be made for the illustrious house of Orange; but he did not in his conscience think he would have been justified in hazarding the success of the treaty by insisting on such a condition; and he had therefore thought it wiser to leave it for future arrangement. With regard to what had fallen from the noble lord, as to the importance of the Cape of Good Hope, he confessed he had himself heard seamen and statesmen say, that it was a place of the first consequence. So far as it served for a harbour to our shipping on their voyage to India, it was of some consequence. This advantage was still to continue; but on what grounds could the cession of this port be a matter of regret? Was it because the place had been fed at a most enormous expense, from which this country was now happily relieved? He would not, then, say any thing about the value of this place as a free port, but if he had no other object in carrying on the war, than that of determining whether a certain point of land, at the extremity of

Africa, was to belong to Great Britain or to Holland, and considering at the same time that since this place got into our possession, no less a sum than 125 millions had been spent, and that another year would take away thirty millions more, without this country being one whit nearer the object in view, he had no hesitation in declaring which course he should pursue. The noble lord had found fault with the cession of territory and a port that had been made in the Mediterranean; and had asked what was to become of our fleets that were sailing in that sea? What would the noble lord have said on this subject, had he consented to make peace in 1797, when neither Malta nor Minorca were in our possession? If he conceived the occupation of them, on the part of Great Britain, as necessary to the security of this country, how could he have supposed it possible for England to make a secure peace when we did not possess those islands? As to Minorca, he did not think the occupation of it at all necessary to our security; and as to Malta, if we considered the facility with which it became an easy acquisition to France, it must appear that our security with regard to that port, must be increased with the difficulty of the French being able to take possession of it again, while under the guarantee of a third power. With respect, therefore, to Malta, we were evidently in a better situation than we should have been, had peace been concluded in 1797. As to our ships in the Mediterranean, if they had nothing else to do but to sail round that sea, he thought it by no means an useful employment. There was no use in keeping a naval station there, if we could not command the commerce of that sea; particularly so, if the French had taken possession of Naples and Portugal, as they might have done. As to the West India islands, he could assure their lordships, that if he could have got Martinique, he would have retained it for this country in preference to Trinidad. If it had not been in his power to obtain what he liked best, what alternative was there? Nothing but that of spending thirty millions more, in order that he might be able to ask himself, that day twelve months, how many more years were to pass away before peace could be made? If any noble lord maintained that peace ought to be rejected, when proposed on the terms of the treaty then before the House, on what terms would such noble lord consent to a peace? He knew there were some who thought it necessary to go on with the war until the ancient monarchy of France should be restored. He would not enter into the question how far that was a desirable object; but let it be ever so desirable, he would ask, how it could be done? If the present government of France was an evil, how was it to be removed? It could not be done without a great coalition of the European powers; and even when the combination did exist, it was able to effect nothing. If Great Britain was true to herself, she had nothing to fear from any principles that might still exist in France. She had already read France an awful lesson. The people of this country had reason, from the examples before them, to feel the value of their constitution. The greatest evil that was to be feared, was the effect which peace might have on a small band of people in this country, who might still wish to follow the practices of some disaffected persons in France; but to say that the present government of France was founded on principles destructive to civilized government was an absurdity in itself; and the people of England had too much sense to shed the blood of their countrymen in a civil war, for the sole prospect of gaining something which could never be called a system of liberty. He was confident that the vigour of the law would enable the government to prevent all internal mischief. As to the danger of the peace not being permanent, there was a greater chance of its being permanent now than in 1797, when the late ministers negotiated with France. Although he did not attempt to represent this peace as a glorious one; yet it was a peace which, he believed, would be conducive to the security of the substantial interests of the country.

The Earl of Moir said, that a noble lord near him (Grenville), among the various other objections that he had urged against the peace, had said that it was inadequate. It certainly was; but how inadequate? Inadequate to the expectations which that noble lord and his colleagues had so confidently held out at the commencement of the war—indemnity for the past, and security for the future. That the peace was a hollow and precarious peace, and inadequate to what we were entitled to expect, he could not admit. In order to decide upon this point, it was necessary to examine the relative situations of the French republic and Great Britain. France was an extensive continental power, and the maintenance of her greatness depended altogether on her army. Great Britain was an insular and a maritime state, and her security rested on her navy. Looking at the acquisitions and conquests of each country, Great Britain stood in a state of inferiority in point of strength and aggrandizement compared to the French republic. To ascertain, therefore, the value of the cessions that ministers had made for the purchase of peace, and to see whether they were necessary sacrifices or not, let noble lords weigh our acquisitions against the acquisitions of the republic. Were all the islands we had taken in the West Indies equally important with the acquisition of Savoy? Undoubtedly not; and yet Savoy was only a part of the immense territories which the army of France had conquered, and which the French government had united to its ancient possessions, and made part of its dominions. To negotiate a peace with any prospect of effecting it, ministers must necessarily accommodate the terms to the relative situations of the two countries, and a precise reciprocity of cession on a pertinacious contest for the uti possidetis, was out of the question where a weaker power had to treat with a stronger. The reasoning of the noble lord would not only serve to make an early peace impracticable, but to render the attainment of peace hopeless at any period, however distant. He, for one, rejoiced sincerely that peace was effected, he gave ministers credit for having made the best peace they were able to obtain; and it should have his cordial support.

The Earl of Warwick expressed his satisfaction that the country had been restored to peace, since it was highly necessary to put an end to the difficulty and distress that all ranks felt, but especially the labouring class of the people. At the same time, he must confess that the preliminaries appeared to him by no means adequate to the expectations that the glorious successes of the country entitled us to entertain.

Lord Mulgrave said, it appeared to him that peace was necessary, and if he looked at the projet of 1797, and compared it with the present preliminaries, he could not but think that peace was cheaply purchased at the price which we had consented to pay for it. It would puzzle a plain man to find out what beneficial consequences we could expect from prolonging the contest. France, compared with this country, could be vulnerable only at sea; and so glorious had been our success upon the ocean, that there scarcely remained a point in which the republic of France was penetrable. No man surely would be mad enough to suppose that we could make any impression on France by land. The continental powers, with whose united co-operations alone we could hope to produce any effect, had, one after another, abandoned the confederacy. No noble lord had hinted a doubt, that the islands of Trinidad and Ceylon were possessions of infinite value to our commerce, and our power as a maritime state. There remained only therefore to consider the cessions we had made. It could not be expected that we were to hold all our acquisitions in the West Indies when peace was to be negotiated. With regard to Minorca, past experience showed, that though of no great intrinsic value, it would always be in the possession of the state most powerful at sea. In the war of 1754, the French conquered it, and took possession. In the war of 1778, we retook it, but ceded it at the peace of 1783. In the late war we had again taken it, but by the present preliminaries we had ceded it. Neither that however, nor the island of Malta, were of material consequence to us, but in time of war. With regard to Cochin, the holding of it was important or not, according to circumstances. While we were masters of the Mysore country, Cochin might be in the possession of any other power, without the least danger to us. The Mysore in other hands, Cochin would be of infinite importance to us. Much had been said by his noble friend about the Cape of Good Hope, who had laid great stress upon its value. Though he had never seen the Cape himself, yet he had heard from professional men, that it had been greatly over-rated in this country; that it was an expensive, unproductive settlement, and obliged to be maintained, ever since we obtained possession of it, at an enormous expense to this country. Let their lordships conjecture what his surprise must have been, when he heard that a right hon. friend of his (Mr. Dundas) had declared in another place, that if a minister should dare to propose the surrender of the Cape of Good Hope, he ought to lose his head. After having gone through his observations on the conditions of the peace, his lordship proceeded to speak of the splendid display of valour and skill exhibited by our army and navy in the course of the war. He said, he felt peculiarly proud at seeing the distinguished object opposite to him (lord Nelson) a living monument of the prowess and intrepidity of our admirals. The conduct of our army in Egypt would entitle them to immortal fame, and those that have outlived the siege of Alexandria, might say with our Henry the 5th, speaking of the battle of Agincourt,

“He that shall live this day, and comes safe home,

Will stand a tip-toe when this day is nam'd,

And rouse him at the name of Crispian :

He that shall live this day, and see old age,

Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours,
And say, To-morrow is St. Crispian.”

The Duke of Bedford said, that the preliminaries should have his support. With regard to the war, which ministers had just put an end to, the noble lord who had arraigned the preliminaries in terms of such severity, might recollect, that it was owing to the ill conduct of it, that an inadequate peace was now made. It could not be forgotten, that he and his colleagues had uniformly been humbled by every turn of ill fortune, and elevated beyond bounds by the return of success. In the one situation, they had condescended to hold the most abject language, and, in the other, they had assumed a tone of arrogance and insult. If it were not at the expense of the country, what a triumph might not he and his friends feel, at the fulfilment of their predictions, that a war so misconducted would surely end in an unequal and disgraceful peace. It was painful to him to allude to matters so often discussed; nor would he have done so, had he not been compelled to it by the speech of the noble lord, who appeared to consider his own projet, in 1797, so highly preferable to the present preliminaries, without at all taking into his consideration, the expense of the war for the last four years, and the victories the French Republic had obtained on the continent within that period, which, notwithstanding the extraordinary success of our arms, had placed the French Republic, if possible, in a higher situation than that in which it stood in 1797. He did no more than act consistently with the language he had held for years, in declaring his thorough approbation of the peace, unequal as it was, and disgraceful as it might be. He entertained a lively hope, from what he had heard from the noble secretary of state, that the king's present servants would conduct themselves on principles of more equanimity and less violence than their predecessors; that they would not be forward to show humiliation and abjectness to the strong, and pride and disdain to the weak. He returned them his thanks for having made the peace, and he trusted, that they would follow it up by a full restoration of the constitution to the people, and an immediate repeal of those statutes, which had originated in childish alarm, and unfounded apprehension of dangers that never existed, but in the minds of his majesty's late ministers.

The Bishop of Rochester said:—My lords; after what I have heard in this House this night from the gravest authority—in perfect agreement with what I before had heard elsewhere from authority not less respectable—I ought perhaps to be diffident of my own judgment, when it stands in opposition to the sentiments of those whose opinions I have long been in the habit of looking up to with respect and deference; who may be supposed, from the situations which they have held in public life, to be more competent than I can be to form an accurate judgment upon questions like that which is now before us. Nevertheless, when a resolution has been moved, that this House should approach the throne with an address expressive of approbation of the preliminaries of peace with the French republic which have been laid upon the table, I cannot consistently with my parliamentary duty give my vote of assent to the motion, unless a conviction were wrought upon my mind by argument, that these preliminary articles are, at least in the leading points, such as any one who pays regard to the interest and honour of the country may conscientiously approve. My lords, I shall not attempt at this late hour to go into the detail into which I thought to go when I came down to the House this night. The attempt indeed is rendered unnecessary, by the great ability with which the subject has already been discussed, by the noble earl who first rose in opposition to the motion, and the noble lord who followed on the same side. I shall therefore compress my argument as much as possible, and state my reasons generally for dissenting from the motion. But I think myself obliged to declare my reasons in a brief and general way; because, having the misfortune to disapprove in this instance of a measure of the executive government, which, as I guess, is likely to receive the approbation of a great majority of this House, it would not be respectful either to the House or the minister to give a silent vote of opposition; and I am the more anxious upon this occasion to explain the reasons of the vote which I shall give, because I am aware that it may seem strange, that any one should rise from the bench on which I have the honour to sit, to disapprove of peace.—My lords, I hope my mind is not insensible to the miseries of war: I am well aware how much it is the duty of the ministers of the gospel to promote what they can the tranquillity and concord of mankind, and to stop the effusion of human blood. God forbid, my lords, I should ever be wanting in that duty: God forbid I should not be the advocate of peace. My lords, I now rise the advocate of peace; for, because I would be the advocate of the substance and reality, I must and will be upon all occasions the open and decided enemy of the mere name, the pretence, and the counterfeit of peace. And what is any peace, but a mere name, a pretence, and a counterfeit, which contains in it the seed and germ of everlasting wars? And such, in my judgment, is the peace which, according to the preliminaries upon the table, his majesty's present ministers are concluding with the French Republic. My lords, I shall not go into the detail of the arguments which this topic opens. The subject might at any time be too much for my abilities; it certainly at present is too much for my strength. In mercy to your lordships and myself, I will be very general and brief. The general view of this wide subject, I can comprise, I think, in few words.—What is the present situation of France, my lords? Her present situation is, that she is possessed of a continental territory, which comprehends nothing less than the whole body of the ancient western empire. I call all this the territory of France, my lords, not forgetting that much of it belongs to other kingdoms and states which she calls her allies. But this makes no difference; for such is the French power, that those whom she honours with the name of allies, are in truth, her subjects, or, to speak more properly, her slaves. This vast tract of territory is covered with a population far exceeding any thing that was spread over the same surface when it was subject to the Romans; and this immense population is at the command and disposal of a government more energetic, more united, more prompt in execution, than the government of Rome was under any of her best emperors. This vast empire is fenced on the one side by a barrier of rivers, mountains, lakes, rocks, forts, which render it inaccessible to any of the neighbouring states that would be the most likely to assail it: On the other side, the termination is the whole length of sea-coast from the mouth of the Texel to the harbour of Brest; a coast which will be particularly formidable to this country when France shall have got up a navy; and that in no long time she will have a navy, your lordships cannot doubt, if you recollect what vast forests of timber clothe the sides of the mountains which crown the banks of the Rhine in a great part of its course. Now, my lords, I am very well aware, that our naval strength, and the successes of our navy, had the war been continued, could never have deprived France of any part of these vast continental dominions: But, my lords, I contend, that for this very reason this country ought to have retained the acquisitions of her naval victories; which were ours by the very same right of conquest by which France holds the greater part of her continental empire; and would have been in our hands a great drawback, as it were, from her general strength. My lords, this has been so fully argued by the two noble lords to whom I alluded before, that it is needless for me to dwell upon it: I shall only say, that no answer has yet been given to the arguments of these noble lords,—no answer, I mean, which takes hold of my mind. Noble lords indeed have entered into minute calculations of the value of each article of our cessions taken singly: Minorca is worth only so much,—Malta only so much,—and so on. But, my lords, this is not at all the question, What might be the value and importance of each separately?—the question is, What is the value and importance of the aggregate? My lords, what I ask of ministers is this: Why have they voluntarily ceded to France, without any compensation, in addition to their continental empire,—of which, by the continuance of the war, I grant, we could not hope to dispossess them,—but why have they ceded to them, in addition to that, the absolute sovereignty of the Mediterranean sea?—for that, your lordships must perceive, is the effect of the cession of every island and every port in the Mediterranean and the Adriatic. Then for our conquests in the West Indies. But here I am stopped: noble lords say, that the cession of these same West Indian islands was a part of the project of negotiation in 1797; that in effect that project received the sanction of parliament, by the address which upon that occasion we carried to the throne; and that parliament cannot now disapprove the cessions to which it consented upon that former occasion. My lords, I very well remember that the cession of those islands entered into the project of 1797; and I admit that the cession at that time was sanctioned by the address of parliament: But, my lords, I must deny that the sanction given to that cession then, binds us to an approbation of the same cession now; for although the islands ceded are in name the same, in value to the French they are very different. My lords, ask the French themselves: their own writers say, “We receive back the islands of St. Lucie, Martinique, and Tobago, improved and enriched by the culture, the industry, and with the capital of British subjects.” My lords, they say more; they say that these islands have no value but what they derive from having been some time in the possession of the English. Now, my lords, this being the case, the value of these islands must be infinitely greater now than it was in the year 1797; because they have been four years longer in our possession; and the cession of them might be a measure of sound policy in the year 1797, and a measure of very weak policy in the year 1801. Then, my lords, I ask again, Why have we given the French the key of re-admission to their Asiatic possessions, by the cession of Pondicherry?—which in a few years, I fear, will render our boasted conquest of the Mysore useless, if not detrimental, to this country: we shall have made the conquest not for ourselves, but for the French. Indeed I fear, that by the effect of this peace, it is not for Britain, but for France, that in every quarter of the globe our brave sailors and soldiers have bled and conquered.—My lords, what I dread as the worst consequence of this peace is, the revival of the spirit of Jacobinism in this country. My lords, in this country the spirit of Jacobinism is revived: we have already seen unequivocal symptoms of it. I allude not in this to the tumultuous joy of the rabble of this metropolis, when they dragged the two Frenchmen about the streets: I found my opinion of the resuscitation of Jacobinism on the sentiments publicly avowed by persons who move in a much higher sphere; who have dared to say, that “The terms of this peace are not bad enough for Great Britain—not good enough for France: that the interests of mankind demand that France should be exalted and Great Britain humbled.” My lords, I still have hope that this daring spirit will be overpowered and kept down by the energies of internal government. I should think it a great calamity indeed if that should take place which some noble lords seem to wish,—if the two bills should be repealed which I deem the essential barriers of the constitution; not, as some affect to think them, infringements of it.—My lords, I have freely spoken my sentiments. I hope my warmth has not betrayed me into expressions personally disrespectful to any of his majesty’s ministers, from whom I have the misfortune to differ upon this question. In this very measure, which I disapprove, I give them entire credit, not only for great integrity, but I suppose they have been influenced by considerations which might in some degree deserve the attention of great and able statesmen, as no doubt they are; and were I single in the disapprobation of what they have done, I should be very willing to suppose that it was owing to the inferiority of my own talents that I saw things in another light than they. Nevertheless, my own vote must be determined by my own judgment.—Before I sit down, I must say one thing more. The sentiments which I have now delivered to your lordships, I have never given to the public in any other manner nor in any other place. I think it necessary to make this declaration; because I find a report is got abroad, and has obtained credit among my friends, that I have been the author of certain letters addressed to the noble secretary of state for foreign affairs, which have lately appeared in the public prints. My lords, I declare, that however I may agree in the opinions contained in those letters (as I agree indeed entirely),—whatever I may think of the information and abilities of the writer (of which I think very highly),—yet I declare, upon my honour, I am not the author of them, nor have I any knowledge of the author. My lords, I hold my situation as a lord of parliament much too high, to condescend to attack a noble secretary of state in a newspaper, or in any other manner than as I now do, upon my legs in this place.

The Bishop of London said, he would detain the House for a few minutes only, being anxious to be heard, lest their lordships should be led to conclude that all the reverend bench were of the same opinion, with regard to the preliminaries of peace, with the right rev. prelate who had just sat down. He was satisfied with the peace, because after nine years of war, and two of famine, in which the people had suffered such severe distress, repose was absolutely necessary to the country, to recover its resources and renovate its strength. Not that he thought our resources were exhausted or would not be adequate to a continuance of the war, had such a circumstance unfortunately been necessary; but that he thought was not the case, because we appeared to have carried our successful arms by sea and land, to every quarter of the globe in which the French republic was vulnerable. It would, therefore, be a useless waste of money and blood, to continue the war without an object. For these reasons he would give the address his cordial support.

Earl Fitzwilliam said, after the sentiments respecting the war which he had repeatedly delivered in that House, he could no means consent to give a silent vote on the present occasion. It had been imputed to him, that he was unwilling to agree to any peace made with republican France; but that was not his sentiment. There might be conditions of peace to which he could readily agree to give his support, but they must be widely different from those upon the table. He could not but regard the peace that ministers had made, as a hollow and precarious truce, that carried with it no symptoms of security or permanency. His lordship proceeded to argue in support of this assertion at considerable length. He rested much of his reasoning on the terms of the projet tendered at Lisle in 1797, contending that they were more favourable to Great Britain, considering the then relative situation of the two countries, than the conditions that had now been obtained, which were disgraceful and humiliating in the extreme; and the exultation which the people in general had manifested on first hearing that peace was made, had appeared to him to be extremely suspicious, and to have been the effect of momentary delusion, which would vanish as soon as they should return to their reason, and calmly reflect on the importance of the sacrifices we had made, and the comparative insignificance of the cessions of the French republic. For the two islands of Trinidad and Ceylon, this country had been nine years engaged in war, and had wasted some hundred millions of money, and the lives of thousands of her subjects. Among other objections, not the least was the letting loose of corresponding societies, and giving an opportunity of dispersing the pernicious principles of the French republic to the seditious and disaffected. He highly disapproved of the peace, but, at the same time, he was far from wishing that the public faith should not be kept.

The Earl of Westmorland proceeded to discuss the grounds of objection which (earl Spencer and lord Grenville) had urged against the conditions of the peace, and said, that if the whole was a matter of mere terms, as one of them had stated, it was a little extraordinary that those noble lords should insist with so much indignation against the present preliminaries, after they had themselves offered the projet of 1797, and called upon that House to concur in an address to the throne approving of that projet. He then entered into a discussion of the terms of the projet of 1797, comparing them with the present preliminaries, and put several hypothetical cases, in order to show that, the relative situation of the two countries considered, the peace, such as it was, was a desirable one for Great Britain, and that it had been made at a happy moment.

Earl St. Vincent rose to take notice of an expression which had fallen from earl Spencer. That noble earl had said, that the preliminaries were attended with circumstances of humiliation and disgrace to this country. His lordship denied that any thing like either attached to them. The preliminaries, he was convinced, were equally honourable and advantageous to this country, and the share he had had in advising them being acceded to, he should ever consider as the pride of his life. By the peace, we had obtained two of the most valuable islands in the habitable globe, considered either in a political or a commercial view. On many other accounts, the peace was a fit subject of exultation.

Lord Nelson rose to say a few words respecting a point or two, in regard to which no one of their lordships could perhaps speak with more information than himself. And first, with regard to Minorca, an island of little value to us, as at too great a distance from Toulon to serve as a station to watch the fleets of France that put to sea from that port. To speak next of Malta: when the noble earl sent him down, the Mediterranean was in the hands of the French, and on his return from the battle of Aboukir, he thought it his first object to blockade it; because he deemed it an invaluable piece of service to rescue it from the hands of the French. In any other point of view, Malta was of no sort of consequence to this country. It was true it contained a most extensive and commodious harbour, with a strong fortification, which would at least require 7,000 soldiers to man the works. By the preliminaries, Malta was to be put into the possession of a third power, and he repeated, that in any hands but those of the French it became immaterial to us. With regard to the Cape of Good Hope, when the Indiamen were heavy ships, it might have been found useful for them to touch there and refit; but now, since the India ships were coppered like our men of war and swift sailers, it frequently happened that they sailed out to India without touching at any port whatever. He had himself been there, and he considered it merely a tavern on the passage, which served to call at, and thence often to delay the voyage. While the Dutch held it, you could buy a cabbage there for twopence; but since it had been in our hands a shilling was obliged to be paid for a cabbage. It produced little that made it worth holding, and it could not be maintained but at an enormous expense; he therefore thought, that considering the present situation of our territories in India, ministers had acted with prudence and economy in giving up the Cape, and making it a free port. That House had given their sanction to the terms that had been acceded to on a former occasion, and our gracious king had been pleased to assure his people, that he would be ready to open a negotiation for peace, as soon as the government of France should wear an appearance of permanency. Now, could any man say, that the republic of France was not as permanent as that of any other state governed by one man? Upon these grounds his majesty's ministers were pledged to seize the first opportunity of making peace with that republic, and, in his opinion, the preliminaries on the table were honourable and advantageous to this country.

The Marquis of Buckingham lamented sincerely that he could not give his consent to the preliminaries on the table, because he thought them highly humiliating and disgraceful to this country. In the first place, he held them to be dishonourable, inasmuch as they did not keep faith with our allies, but left them exposed and unprotected. Portugal, in particular, was most shamefully abandoned, and he could assure the House that the treaty with France, of which they had heard and seen so much, that there could be no doubt of its authenticity although they had it not parliamentarily on their table, had, been ratified since the 1st of October, the day on which the preliminaries were signed. By that treaty with France this country was all but excluded altogether from her former commercial intercourse with Portugal, and if it were true that the cloths of France were to be received as those of the most favoured nation, our manufacturers of woollen cloth would soon taste the bitter fruits of this peace, for they would not easily forget that Portugal, if not now our greatest customer for our woollen cloths, was certainly our oldest customer. So much, therefore, for the good faith of the peace! With regard to the security of the peace, there was nothing stipulated, but we were left to depend solely for its security on the bare word and honour of the person now holding the government of the French republic. What was there in the character or conduct of that person which should give us any just and reasonable hopes, that he would not take the earliest opportunity of breaking the peace? In what instance had he so far shown the milk of human kindness as to lead us to rely on his abstaining from fresh hostilities, as soon as he felt it his interest to recommence the war? Had he never betrayed a rooted jealousy towards this country, an implacable revenge, and a deep-lodged hatred? Was his milk of human kindness so superabundant and overflowing as to wash from his remembrance all his past animosity toward us? Since the signing of the preliminaries, the French had negotiated a private peace between the republic and the Porte, and prevented the latter from feeling a grateful sense of the assistance we had afforded it. So much for the good faith of the first consul of France in the first instance. Let their lordships remember, that by this treaty we had conceded every thing that would aid the French republic to recover its commerce and restore her marine. We had given to the first consul "a giant's strength," and we might be assured, he would "use it like a giant." Entertaining the sentiments he had expressed, he could not vote for the proposed address.

The Earl of Carnarvon said:—My lords, the noble and learned lord on the woolsack says, that the present is a necessary peace; he places us at the feet of France, suing for peace, and he laments that more advantageous terms could not be obtained. Other noble lords, speaking with ministerial information, assert, that the country never stood higher; that our resources are unexhausted; that we have treated for a peace, in an hour of triumph, upon equal terms; and they defend the peace, as safe, honourable, and adequate. The learned lord has felt that nothing but necessity could justify a peace so inadequate and dishonourable; and if the other noble lords have truly stated the flourishing state of the country, the terms must appear dishonourable and insecure. The noble marquis has expressed his opinion of the instability of the proposed peace. I confess that I feel no apprehension, that France will not wait till the definitive treaty has put her in possession of all the advantages of this peace; but when we have restored to France, without equivalent, all that she had lost in nine years of war, and to her allies, all that we had taken from them, with small exceptions, and disgracefully submitted to the uncompensated plunder of our friends and allies, she may then pursue, against this country, any object which her policy or insatiable ambition may dictate, and her augmented power may enable her to execute. We are called upon to approve the preliminaries of a peace, which, the moment it is put into execution, will place us in a worse relative situation than at the moment of its signature, or in any period of the war; and we must then depend on the good faith of a nation, not conspicuous for that virtue, and generally esteemed our natural enemy. Some noble lords have silenced all their apprehensions by a persuasion that this peace will have left us no bone of contention; it is a singular argument for the surrender of every thing valuable, that we shall enjoy the beggar's security, who cantat vacuus coram latrone: two articles retained by us in this unequal peace, may be objects of future hostility, and meant only as temporary concessions; or the present or future ruler of France may again adopt the maxim, delenda est Carthago, before the rest of Europe have recovered their exhausted strength. The learned lord, in his defence of his necessary peace, puts a question on each individual article, whether it was an object worthy the continuance of a bloody war, and the annual expenditure of millions, as if each separate article required a separate war, and its pursuit the separate expenditure of millions, as it may require separate discussions on its utility. The learned lord, who uses a question for an argument, may be answered by his own question, applied to France: Is each separate article worth to her a separate war and the expenditure of millions? The learned prelate truly observed, that the terms of peace were composed of all the articles, and could not be considered but as one good or bad peace, taken conjointly. Those who have considered the peace as a necessary peace, have only considered the state of this country, and have shut their eyes to the state of France. I scarce know any single object worth the expenditure of blood and treasure of a long war, and yet other circumstances in the relative situation of two countries, may make a war necessary: if this peace was desirable to us, was it not equally desirable to France? It may be reasonably imagined that France was as exhausted with the war as this country, and ready to purchase peace upon equal terms. The fact, I am persuaded, was so, and that terms more adequate, safe, and honourable, might have been obtained, had not our negociators ineffectually surrendered the interests of the country. Every article in the preliminaries is concession on our side, and advantage to France and her allies; and so much is left for discussion in the definitive treaty, that the principal effect of the preliminaries will be to show how much disposed we are to renounce every thing for peace. In the article respecting Portugal, nothing is obtained for her; we sanction the terms which France has imposed upon her, by reference to her existing situation, and we may, for aught we know, approve of our own exclusion from the ports of Portugal, which was understood to form an article of that treaty. The comfort given to us by the noble lord, that we may be better by the definitive treaty, and cannot be worse than now fixed, is as fallacious as his former reasoning; for the same observation is as just, and I fear will be more effectual, in the mouth of France, that they also may be better by the definitive treaty, and cannot without folly be worse; and then all the undecided points will probably be influenced by the same predominant influence which dictated the preliminaries; and it is impossible, under these circumstances, that I should approve the preliminaries as (under the existing circumstances) safe, adequate and honourable, or that it will produce such a peace, as the speeches from the throne have from the commencement of the war till this hour held out to the country.

Lord Hobart replied to the leading arguments that had been urged against the motion. With regard to Portugal, he said, the noble lord was under a mistake with respect to the possibility of the French being enabled by the treaty they had concluded with Portugal, to erect a port within 100 miles of the river Amazons, in South America, as far as depended on the river Arrouara being the limitation of the cession made to France. And as to the alarm taken by the noble marquis with respect to our being excluded from the usual exercise of our commercial intercourse with Portugal, there was undoubtedly an article in the treaty between that country and the French republic, which excluded us from all commercial intercourse with Portugal during the war; but, on the termination of the war, the exclusion was to cease and determine. As to the mutiny in our fleets having been one reason for forming the projet in 1797, in terms so favourable to the French, let it be remembered, that the mutiny was at an end before that projet was tendered to the French at Lisle, because lord Duncan's victory over the Dutch fleet took place in that year, which proved that there was no mutiny remaining; and after that, his majesty expressed his inclination, notwithstanding the success of his arms, to listen to any terms that might be safe and honourable to this country. His lordship supported lord Mulgrave's declaration, that Cochin was now of no importance to us, while we had possession of the Mysore territory; and that noble lord might, he said, have added, that Cochin was no port, that it had a bar before it, so that none but small craft could approach it. With regard to the cape, it could only be kept at an enormous expense to this country; it had already cost us a million of money; we had, on our first taking possession of it, imported home all the corn we found there, hoping to supply this country, and the consequence had been, that we had since, even during the great scarcity, been obliged to re-export corn to the Cape, to preserve the settlement from starving. As to any necessity for ships to touch there in their passage to India, he denied it to exist. With regard to the alarm, that the peace would encourage the seditious societies, and the agents of French principles, there was no ground for it. In the first place, France herself had abandoned those pernicious doctrines that the republic at one time held, and disavowed that extraordinary declaration of their determined purpose to overthrow all the established governments of Europe; and as to any apprehensions of the Corresponding Societies, and the advantage that domestic traitors might be inclined to take of the peace, he could assure the House, that already all the societies and disaffected persons shrunk their heads with shame and despair, exasperated, that so effectual an end was put to the possibility of carrying their traitorous designs into practice. In the course of the debate, several noble lords had taken notice of the stadtholder, our firm ally, and had objected to the preliminaries, on the ground that no care had been taken of him by his majesty's ministers: the fact was, they were not insensible to the stadtholder's claims on this country, for their best interference in his behalf, but it was at his express desire, that no stipulation was made in his favour, in the articles on the table, because an arrangement was negotiating, through the mediation of the court of Berlin, which promised a favourable issue. His lordship added a variety of other arguments and observations, in proof that the present preliminaries were the basis of a peace, as likely to be safe, honourable, and permanent, as the country, under all the circumstances could hope for.

The King's Answer to the Lords' Address.] To the Address of the Lords his Majesty returned this answer:

"My lords;—I thank you for this dutiful and loyal address. The satisfaction you express at the foundation which has been laid by the preliminary articles for the final restoration of peace, is highly acceptable to me; and you may rest assured, that I shall, on my part, use my utmost endeavours, to bring this important transaction to a conclusion, in such a manner as may most effectually tend to promote and secure the public interests and the welfare of my people."

Vote of Thanks to the Navy and Army employed in the Expedition to Egypt.]

Nov. 12. On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the following Resolutions were agreed to, nem. con. 1. "That the thanks of this House be given to admiral the right hon. lord Keith, knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, for the ability and perseverance with which he maintained his station on the coast of Egypt, and for the effectual assistance rendered by his exertions to the army in that country, in the several important services wherein it has been employed, which so essentially contributed to the final success of the campaign. 2. That the thanks of this House be given to rear admiral John Blankett, and to the captains and officers of the squadron employed on the coast of the Red Sea, for the zeal, activity, and perseverance, manifested by them in their co-operation with the army in Egypt: and that vice admiral Peter Raimier, commander in chief of the said squadron, be desired to signify the same to them. 3. That the thanks of this House be given to rear admirals sir Richard Bickerton, bart. and sir John Borlase Warren, bart., knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, and to the several captains and officers of the fleet, under the command of admiral lord Keith, for the zeal, activity, and perseverance, manifested by them in their co-operation with the army in Egypt, in the several important services on which it has been employed; and that his lordship be desired to signify the same to them. 4. That this House doth highly approve of, and acknowledge, the services of the seamen and marines on board the ships and vessels under the command of admiral lord Keith, and vice admiral Rainier, in the effectual assistance afforded by them to the army in Egypt, in the several important services on which it has been employed; and that the captains of the several ships do signify the same to their respective crews, and thank them for their meritorious conduct. 5. That the thanks of this House be given to lieutenant general the hon. sir John Hely Hutchinson, knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, for the ability, zeal, and perseverance, so eminently manifested by him in the command of the army serving in Egypt, by which the honour of the British nation has been so signally upheld, and additional lustre reflected on the reputation of the British arms. 6. That the thanks of this House be given to major generals Eyre Coote, John Francis Cradock, the hon. George James Ludlow, John Moore, Richard earl of Cavan, David Baird, the hon. Edward Finch, and to brigadier generals John Stewart, the hon. John Hope, John Doyle, John Blake, Hildebrand Oakes and Robert Lawson, and the several officers of the army, for their gallant, meritorious, and distinguished services, under the command of lieutenant general the honourable sir John Hely Hutchinson, knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, by which the honour of the British nation has been so signally upheld, and additional lustre reflected on the reputation of the British arms. 7. That this House doth highly approve of, and acknowledge the zeal, discipline, and intrepidity, uniformly displayed during the arduous and memorable operations of the army in Egypt, by the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers serving under the command of lieutenant general the hon. sir John Hely Hutchinson, knight of the most honourable order of the Bath; and that the same be signified by the commanders of the several corps; who are desired to thank them for their exemplary and gallant behaviour."

Similar Resolutions were, on the same day, moved in the House of Lords by lord Hobart, supported by lord Nelson, and agreed to nem. dis.

Debate in the Lords on the Convention with Russia.] Nov. 13. The order of the day being read for taking into consideration the Convention with Russia (see p. 18.)

The Earl of Darnley rose, and began with expressing the satisfaction he felt in having occasion to address the House, on grounds so different from those on which he had in the course of the last session found it his duty to offer his sentiments to their lordships, and to propose an inquiry into the state of public affairs, with a view to a vote of censure on the government of that day. He now meant to propose a vote of approbation of the conduct of his majesty's present ministers, but not without previous inquiry into the grounds on which he hoped to have their lordships concurrence and support in regard to the address, which he would offer to their consideration. He could not but give his testimony in praise of the conduct of his majesty's servants since they came into office, contrasted with that of their predecessors, whose servile imitators they had proved themselves not to be. The convention on the table, he considered as a striking instance of this. It was evident from that important document, that they had not continued to bully and insult the powers of Europe; but by a judicious mixture of firmness and moderation, had induced them to relinquish their unjust pretensions, and had finally established, upon an equitable and permanent basis, the maritime law of nations. Upon an admission for the just rights of this country, founded in the pure and unalterable principles of the law of nations, depended altogether the greatness and prosperity of Great Britain as a maritime power. That code of law was not a novel institution; it was as ancient as the introduction of navigation and commerce, and had been explicitly laid down by the ablest ministers of different countries at different periods of time, and had been uniformly admitted by all the states of Europe, as a code of law built upon a basis firm as the rock, because its materials were truth, justice, and the general convenience of all nations. Notwithstanding this undeniable character of the law of nations, such was the nature of mankind, and such the operation of the political interests and prejudices of the powers of Europe, during the existence of a long-continued war between any two of them, possessed of a marine that the law of nations had even in modern times been more than once attempted to be broken in upon, in order to serve the purposes either of assisting one of the belligerent powers, at the expense of the other; or of obtaining advantages to mutual states, which they were instigated to seize upon by the intrigues of one of the courts at war, who were glad to embroil their adversaries, by driving them into a new quarrel, and thus adding to their difficulties and embarrassments. Thus, in the year 1780, while this country was engaged in an extensive and complicated war with France, Spain, Holland, and the United States of America, the well-known confederacy, termed the Armed Neutrality, was entered into by the northern powers, and if they had succeeded in carrying into effect the principles on which that confederacy was founded, a fatal blow would have been given to the commercial prosperity and maritime greatness of Great Britain. Their lordships all knew how the danger of 1780 was averted, but when the glorious successes of this country by sea, and the unparalleled navigation and extension of commerce that we had attained during the war that had just been terminated were considered, it was not to be wondered at, that a jealousy of our superior prosperity should be excited in other powers by the intrigues of one of the belligerent states, and their envy and interests awakened, and prompted to a wish to avail themselves of the advantages which they hoped to be able to obtain while we were, as they might imagine, enfeebled by the enormous expense and continued exertions made during a nine year's war with one of the most powerful nations in Europe. His lordship said, he was persuaded that our resources were far from being exhausted; and that, had it been necessary, we were able to continue the contest, even though a new war had unfortunately been super-added to that which was then raging. He thanked God, the firmness and energy of his majesty's ministers had resorted to the best means of putting an end to their farther insisting on their pretensions, and had afforded them an opportunity of being convinced, from the specimen given them by a noble lord (Nelson) whom he had the pleasure of seeing near him, that if they persisted in their unjustifiable pretensions, this country had the spirit and the power to maintain its undoubted rights. Having thus traced the circumstances that had led to the engagement off Copenhagen, he proceeded to the consideration of the convention which had set at rest the differences that had last year arisen between the northern powers and this country, and established our maritime claims on a firm footing. Among the various parts of the treaty principally to be regarded as most worthy of their lordships notice and attention, the first and most important, was the abandonment of that false and dangerous proposition, that free ships make free goods. This proposition was effectually done away by the third article of the convention, in the different paragraphs of which there was a discrimination and definition of what were to be regarded as contraband of war, and enemy's property liable to seizure. The next point of importance was the right of search of ships under convoy; which was clearly ascertained and admitted, but with the limitation of exempting privateers from the exercise of the right in question. Many good reasons offered themselves in proof of the propriety of ministers having had the moderation to consent to this restriction, and perhaps, it might have been as well, if the right of search had never been extended to privateers; but in saying this, he begged their lordships not to understand him to have given a decided opinion upon this matter. With regard to contraband of war, the third important point to be found in the treaty, it could not have escaped their lordships, that in the third paragraph of the third article, the enumeration of what was to be considered contraband of war in future, with respect to Russia, military warlike stores alone, were to be found. He had no objection to confining that enumeration to Russia only, because naval stores were not the chief of the produce of Russia, and the imperfect state of her marine, added to the circumstance of her seas and rivers being rendered impassable, and locked from navigation during six or eight months of the year by the frost, made it a point of no great importance. Russia could injure Great Britain when at war with France in a very trifling degree only, by the few naval stores she could possibly furnish the enemy with. The matter stood on a different ground with Denmark and Sweden. By the ninth article of the convention, Denmark and Sweden were to be immediately invited by his imperial majesty, in the name of the two contracting parties, to accede to the present convention, and at the same time to renew and confirm their respective treaties of commerce with his Britannic majesty." By the treaty with Denmark of 1670, as explained by a subsequent treaty concluded in 1780, and by that of 1661, concluded with Sweden, naval stores are deemed contraband of war, and are considered as such by the law of nations, in respect to all other nations who are not protected by the special conditions of a treaty. The fourth important matter to be found in the treaty, was explained in the fourth paragraph of the third article, and defined the character of a blockaded port. By the words of that paragraph, the denomination of a blockaded port is given only to a port where there is, by the disposition of the power, which attacks it with ships stationary, or sufficiently near, an evident danger of entering. The term "sufficiently near" extended beyond the assumption of the armed neutrality, and placed in question as to what constituted a blockaded port, on an explicit and satisfactory ground. Having stated that these four points were the most important of all provided for in the treaty, and ascertained and established by it, and having expatiated at some length upon each, his lordship took notice of the first paragraph of the third article, viz. "that the ships of the neutral power may navigate freely to the ports, and upon the coasts of the nations at war." He said, he thought considerable stress was to be laid on the words "to the ports" as contradistinguished from the words "from port to port," which had been the language of the claim of the armed neutrality. The difference of expression in this particular appeared to his lordship, to secure an effectual prevention of the neutral from carrying the coasting trade of the belligerent powers during war, and it was manifested, he contended, by the definitions and conditions stipulated by the different articles of the treaty, that the ships of neutrals were only to be regarded as free ships when they had, bonâ fide, neither enemy's property nor contraband on board. Upon the whole he maintained that the treaty had secured every substantial advantage for which we had contended, though he admitted, that it bore evident marks of haste, and that the wording of parts of it might be liable to cavil, but before any lord proceeded to object to it, candour and impartiality required, that they should take into consideration the very difficult circumstances under which the present ministers came into office; the situation of unprecedented danger and apprehension in which the country stood when the rupture with the northern powers broke out; the unjustifiable combination entered into against the maritime power and importance of Great Britain; the perilous and expensive war in which the country was engaged; the pressure of the public burthens, and various other circumstances, which combined, rendered the part which ministers had to act, with respect to the northern confederacy, extremely arduous and delicate. Nor, he repeated, did he in the least despair of our resources, or doubted the power and spirit of the country to contest the point to the utmost with the northern powers, had such an unfortunate alternative been necessary; he only made these observations to show the difficult part that ministers had to act at the time, and that their bringing their opponents to such terms as appeared on the face of the convention, was the more worthy of the approbation of the House. Indeed, one of the strongest arguments in favour of the treaty was, that it had contributed materially to the peace with France, a matter which he did not intend to consider and discuss at that moment, though he gave it his decided approbation, not because he thought it a great and glorious, but on many accounts necessary, and the best that under the circumstances of the case we had a right to expect. If it was not a glorious peace, their lordships must ask them to what and to whom the situation of the country had been owing? To the late administration, and to their misconduct of the war. His lordship concluded with moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this House for his gracious communication of the convention which has been lately entered into between his majesty and the emperor of Russia, to which the kings of Denmark and Sweden have declared their readiness to accede. To express our just and grateful sense of his majesty's exertions for the maintenance and establishment of our maritime interests, whereby the essential rights for which we have contended have been secured to us, and provision made for exercising them with as little molestation as possible to the commercial concerns of the contracting parties."

Lord Cathcart took a summary but spirited view of the general disposition and conduct of the maritime powers of Europe, respecting this country, in the course of most of the wars in which we had been engaged within the last century, and pointed out the particular periods at which they had manifested a jealousy of our greatness as a naval power. Indeed, when it was considered how much our superiority at sea, accompanied by our extended commercial navigation, had been evinced in several wars, but more peculiarly so in the war that had been now brought to a conclusion, it was scarcely to be wondered at, that the enmity of other maritime states should be excited, and that they should easily be made the agents and instruments of those in hostilities against us, who had spared neither influence nor intrigue to induce them to adopt measures, that, prima facie, promised advantages to them; and which, as they were likely to distress Great Britain, must at all events prove beneficial to them. The claims which the northern powers had set up during the complicated war in which we were engaged in 1780, was formed under the fostering hand of the late empress of Russia, and assumed the title of the armed neutrality. The principles upon which that confederacy was established, were directly contrary to the known law of nations, and the acknowledged rights of Great Britain. These claims, which threatened the most fatal consequences to our existence as a maritime power, were then got rid of, and had, in a great measure, laid dormant since the affair in 1780, till their recent revival: all the sanctions of public law, the treaties of different nations, the general and acknowledged practice of Europe, the interests of various people were again discarded or despised: A new maritime code, formed upon other principles, and regulated by new theories, was to dignify this age of reason. But we had lived to see the discomfiture of all these vain and envious projects, and, through victory, to arrive at the blessings of peace. His lordship then adverted to some of the most striking parts of the treaty, and pointed their lordships' attention to the mode in which the principle, that free bottoms made free goods, was disposed of. The regulations of the present treaty he conceived to be founded in true wisdom, and to be dictated by a vigorous policy. The conduct of ministers with respect to the northern confederacy was such, in his opinion, as reflected the highest credit, not only on themselves, but on their country, which never, he thought, was placed in so honourable a point of view, or had come off with a greater accession of character than in that instance. He particularly applauded the vigorous and decided measures adopted by ministers on that occasion, in which a noble and gallant viscount then present, and to whom their lordships' thanks were so justly given, had shone with so much lustre; he fully agreed with the noble lord who preceded him, as to the situation of peril in which the country stood at the commencement of the year: The dark cloud that hung over the country at that time, in consequence of a dire domestic calamity, an unsettled administration, the dread of approaching famine, and the severe pressure of the public burthens, darkened the cloud still more, and might have disheartened minds less firm than those of his majesty's ministers; but instead of feeling despondency, they felt that the situation of the country was perilous in the extreme, but in proportion to the magnitude of the danger, they felt that it ought to be looked manfully in the face, and met with measures of prompt vigour and energy. Undismayed by the new war that menaced from the North, they determined at all hazards to maintain the national honour, and assert her just rights; they shrunk not, therefore, from the complicated conflict in prospect, but made ready for the occasion, and were prepared to fight France and her allies with the one hand, and the powers of the North with the other. One could hardly suppose, but a few months ago, that it were possible to stand on the proud eminence upon which we now find ourselves placed. If we looked back, what was our situation? After a long and expensive war, we found ourselves without any prospect of its termination: Ireland in a most unsatisfactory state, affairs at home in a very critical posture: our allies making peace with our worst foe: the northern powers of Europe, to crown all, preparing for a general maritime war, in which we were to fight single-handed. France, too, was in a singular situation. She had, at the commencement of the war, all the powers of Europe combined against her, but by various events, it had so happened, that she had no open enemy left. Dissatisfied, indeed, were many of the continental powers; but it suited not their circumstances to take an active part any longer against France. At this important crisis the decision, skill, and valour of this country, broke through the combination which had been formed against her wealth and greatness. A glorious naval victory opened our way into the Baltic; an armistice ensued with Denmark: our moderation was evinced in the very moment of our success and triumph. Other favourable circumstances occurred, which were all carefully improved by our government. A negotiation was opened with Russia, and the treaty which ensued had been laid before the House. Happily, the first blow we gave in the Baltic led to a termination of the contest; a termination highly advantageous and honourable to this country. The scruple that free bottoms made free goods, and the exemption claimed by our late opponents, were happily resisted, and these questions completely decided by the present convention, which, on the ground he had stated, he fully approved of.

Lord Grenville rose and said:

My lords;—If this convention offered to us any prospect of those advantages, which have been so liberally ascribed to it by the zeal of its supporters, they would, in my opinion, be well justified in having claimed for it from parliament an unqualified and unanimous approbation. The ultimate establishment and recognition of those principles, for which Great Britain fought and conquered at Copenhagen, would undoubtedly offer an occasion which we ought gladly to embrace, for just congratulation from this House to his majesty; and, far from opposing such a motion, I should think myself peculiarly called upon to concur in the praises of any statesmen, who had really, in the words of this Address “secured to us those essential rights, for which we have contended,” and which I believe to be inseparably connected with the existence of our naval power. Great, indeed, and sincere would be the satisfaction, which I should derive from the opportunity of expressing such commendation.

To the subject of this treaty it has been, for many years, my duty to allot a very large proportion of my thoughts and labours: and the sense which I entertain of its importance to the interests of my country, makes it impossible that I should now look with indifference to the mode of its final arrangement, or consider myself an unconcerned spectator, of a transaction, which is to decide, what rank we shall hereafter maintain among the nations of Europe. It is therefore with sincere concern, that I am about to deliver the opinion which I have formed, on a repeated examination of the convention now offered to the consideration of your lordships. But, on an occasion like the present, I think myself obliged to declare, without reserve, my full conviction, that should these stipulations remain unaltered, our system of maritime law, instead of having been confirmed by the issue of a successful contest, will be found to have been, in all its parts, essentially impaired; its principles shaken, its exercise embarrassed, and its clearest regulations made matter of eternal dissension and contest.

There is, indeed, one circumstance which renders the discharge of this duty much less painful to me than it has been on a former occasion. It is obvious to all who hear me, that, in the examination of this convention, we are engaged in a task, widely differing from that which was imposed upon us by the consideration of the preliminaries of peace. Whatever objections any man may have felt to the conditions of the French treaty, the public faith was pledged to its immediate execution. And those who most lamented, what they thought a wanton sacrifice of the public interest, security and honour, were, perhaps, the last to hope that any farther discussions with the French government would provide a remedy for dangers which threaten, in their opinion, the independence and existence of this country. In the present instance, we have treated, not with an enemy, but with an old and natural ally: not with the government of an usurper, who is still manifestly looking for his security in our dangers, and for his glory in our humiliations; but with a lawful sovereign, who has no real interest opposed to ours, and who has shown a decided attachment to the ancient system of connexion, so long established between the two countries. So obvious is, indeed, the natural principle of union between the two empires, that even if the errors of this convention, while they threaten the subversion of the British naval power, did promise some commercial advantages to Russia; we must believe that an enlarged and liberal policy, duly appreciating the permanent and solid interest of Russia herself, would reject the benefits to be purchased by such a sacrifice. Much more, if it shall appear, as I am confident it will, that even these imaginary advantages are, in fact, injurious to the very interests they are supposed to promote, and that the whole system against which Great Britain has contended, the whole code of projected innovations in the public law of Europe, is mutually dangerous to both empires, and can be profitable only to their common enemies, and rivals. In attempting, therefore, to state to your lordships what I conceive to be the defects of this Convention, my purpose is certainly not in any manner to obstruct the king's government, but to convey suggestions which may, I trust, be advantageously improved: not to call the attention of your lordships unnecessarily to the censure or disapprobation of the past, but to propose what may still be successfully attempted, and beneficially accomplished.

There can be little doubt that, upon the grounds which I have already stated, the emperor of Russia will readily consent to any reasonable proposal for the explanation, or amendment, of this convention. Even from those points, which have been intentionally conceded by Great Britain in this negotiation, I think it manifest that no advantage will arise to our ally. Whatever inconvenience or detriment may result from them to the commercial navigation or military marine of the British empire, the loss indeed will be ours, but the benefit will not be enjoyed by Russia. It will be transferred to other powers, in whose hands, according to the natural course of such events, it is far more likely to produce uneasiness at Petersburg, than to afford to that country any source of profit, or any solid ground of security, or strength. But, it is not so much for the acknowledged concessions, as for the dangerous uncertainty of these stipulations, that we are deeply concerned to provide an immediate and effectual remedy. And in this respect, at least, we may confidently hope to find at Petersburg dispositions completely favourable. Since, in addition to all those considerations of general policy, which the present state of Europe must inevitably suggest to every well-regulated mind, the mere wish to maintain peace, and to promote, by commercial connexions with Great Britain, the internal improvement of a great and extensive empire, must naturally dispose its sovereign to co-operate with zeal for the final termination of these irritating and hostile discussions. A great, and truly glorious work; but which can be accomplished only by such a distinct and definite arrangement, as being founded in justice, and constructed with provident and comprehensive wisdom, may afford to both countries a confident expectation of its continuance, and may remain for ever a solid bulwark of mutual security. Such is certainly the only conclusion of this business, to which we, on our part, can look with any reasonable satisfaction.

By the weak and temporizing policy, which Great Britain had pursued towards the Baltic powers, in the last years of our contest with America, their inadmissible pretensions had been encouraged and augmented. At the commencement of the last war, we did indeed obtain, by negotiation with all the principal governments of Europe, a renunciation of claims, which have never been advanced but with purposes hostile to this country. Even the wish to re-assert these claims appeared, at that time, to be abandoned at Petersburg; and this, not only from motives of friendship to Great Britain, but from a juster sense of the real interests of Russia. The principles in question were indeed within a few years after the armed neutrality of 1780, renounced by the practice of almost every state* which had been a party to that league; and in some of the official communications with the Baltic powers, during the war with France, pretensions were advanced, both by the empress and her successor, which went to the full extent of the ancient maritime law of Europe.† The effects of this change of sentiment ensured to us, for several years, the undisturbed exercise of our rights, in those quarters where they were the most important, both to our own interests, and to those of the common cause in which we were engaged. But when caprice and groundless disgust were suffered to interrupt this well-considered system of policy at Petersburg, the former pretensions of the neutral powers were soon renewed with increased hostility; and it was at last become manifest, upon the signature of the Convention of 1800, that, unless this country could then resolve to meet the necessity of the case, by bringing these questions to a distinct and final settlement, they would always be found to impede our operations, and embarrass our exertions in every future period of difficulty or danger.

It should also be observed, that the confederacy which we had to encounter, at that time, was far more formidable in appearance than in reality. It was, indeed, well adapted, if we shrunk from the contest, to dictate to us the most disgraceful and ruinous concessions; but little was to be feared from its hostility, if it was only met with fortitude, and repelled with energy. The marine of France and Spain, crippled by constant defeat, during a war of unparalleled success to England, was less able, than it may perhaps be found at any future period, to support the exertions of a Northern league. The union of the Baltic powers was neither cemented by common interest, nor by mutual confidence. And even the untoward circumstances of personal disposition and character, with which we had to contend at Petersburg, justified the expectation, that the resolutions adopted in that quarter would be found no less unsteady and fluctuating, than they were rash and violent. Every circumstance, therefore, appeared to indicate, that those who had been most eager to provoke the mischief, would, in fact, sustain the whole weight of the contest, in the success of which they were, indeed, alone concerned, and to the risks of which they were evidently the first exposed.

It was on these grounds of obvious policy that the persons then in his majesty's service, formed their plan, and prepared all the means of its execution. They had very soon the satisfaction of seeing it justified by the most complete success. Scarcely had the contest commenced, when it was decided by the victory of Copenhagen. The events which followed were still more favourable. At the very moment when the Baltic powers had incurred the penalty of their own precipitation, when their colonies were already in our possession, when their commerce was annihilated, the defences of their own ports destroyed, and the productions of their territories accumulating at home without purchasers, and therefore without value; and when their revenues, sinking under this total stagnation of trade, were unequal even to their ordinary peace expenditure, much more to the exertions of a war against Great Britain: In this critical and decisive moment, a change took place at Petersburg, which removed every obstacle to the restoration, not only of peace, but of friendship, and alliance with that court. A new reign commenced in Russia; the very first measures of which unequivocally proved, that principles of justice and policy had reassumed their influence in the councils of that great country; a country which has always much to gain by friendship with Great Britain, and much to offer in return; but which can never attempt to profit by our losses, or to engage in hostility against us, without the utmost detriment to herself.

In this situation the negotiations began, which have terminated in the present convention. More favourable circumstances have never offered themselves to any negotiators. No one can deny that we had at least the opportunity of effecting what this address asserts, that we have in fact accomplished; and although this convention be in truth very far indeed from meriting that panegyric, yet even this failure is not, I am persuaded, to be attributed to the designs, or dispositions of either party, but to the unfortunate precipitation produced by a mutual impatience, to accelerate the restoration of harmony and confidence.

It is, however, manifest, as I have already observed, that the occasion did most urgently demand a full and final settlement of the questions in dispute. To obtain this, as the reward of success, was the only rational object of the contest; to relinquish it after victory, is to deprive our country of the fair benefit of her own exertions. The means of such an arrangement as we ought to wish for, were completely in our hands; the dispositions were such as we could ourselves have most desired; and we had nothing to ask but what we had recently claimed in concert with Russia, what we had enjoyed in common with her, and what her true interests would always lead her to assert and to maintain for herself as well as for Great Britain. Fortunately, the same advantages are still, in great degree, subsisting. The dispositions, I trust, are the same; the interests certainly are unchanged. If, therefore, this charter of our future strength, this warrant of assurance for the undisturbed enjoyment of rights essential to our naval power, be still deficient in that precision and certainty, which could alone constitute its value, it behoves us to pursue with earnestness the means of full and satisfactory explanation, now, while the circumstances are still propitious, while the opportunity is still such as the most ardent hopes could hardly have anticipated.

Such ought, more particularly, to be the anxious wish of those who have borne any part in the formation of this treaty, and whose characters must answer to posterity for the consequences of all its imperfections. And let me add, such I am convinced is accordingly, at this very hour, the conduct which the king's government is actually pursuing. That some additional explanations have been proposed, and some fresh negotiations entered into upon this subject, even if it were not matter of public notoriety, would, to any man conversant in such transactions, be sufficiently apparent from the single circumstance of the long delay in the official publication of the treaty. Far from implying a censure, I hope I am understood to express, as I feel, the fullest approbation of this endeavour. No sentiment, no word shall fall from me, which can impede its success. My first desire is to assist it, and my only object is, by these observations, to impress on the minds of those who are to conduct it, the duty of pursuing it with zeal, and of extending it as far as the necessity of the case does really require. I must, however, agree with a noble lord behind me, that the course of proceeding, which under these circumstances is proposed to parliament, is, to say the least, extremely inconvenient, as I believe it is wholly without example. We are called upon to consider this arrangement, before it is possible that we should know its extent and operation, or satisfy our minds how far it will affect the essential interests of our country. The fact of the accession of Sweden and Denmark to this treaty has been stated to us; but the noble lord has truly observed, that until we shall know the precise terms of that accession, we must remain ignorant whether one material point of difference be not left without even an attempt to explain, or to adjust it. The British government has differed from that of Sweden as to the true interpretation of an article in our former treaties, which contains the enumeration of contraband. I have myself no doubt on which side the justice of that question rests; I am clear it is with this country. But to assert, that the question has not been disputed, would be to violate the truth; and whether it be settled or not by the present arrangement, no man can pronounce with certainty till the Swedish instrument of accession shall be laid before him.

But, if the noble lord's remark be thus evidently just and striking, when applied only to a single and detached question, perhaps intended to be left unsettled, what shall we say, if the same observation be equally true with respect to the very substance and essence of the whole treaty, which we are now called upon to approve? If some of the essential rights, for which we have contended, are, as I trust and believe, to be secured to us by the result of those explanations which are still depending at Petersburg, it manifestly follows, that the extent and value of that security must be judged of by an examination, not of this treaty, which we are now considering, but of some new articles, declarations, or notes, of which we are as yet completely ignorant. It would surely have been a more natural, I may add, a more respectful, conduct on the part of government, to have stated these circumstances openly to parliament, and to have postponed our examination of the measure, until it could be presented to us in that more perfect form, in which it is intended finally to stand. What we are now desired to do is nothing less than this: to pronounce upon the merits of a treaty, of which we know not what the conditions may ultimately be; and to declare those stipulations to be complete and satisfactory, which their authors themselves consider as requiring farther explanations, additions, or amendments. And if the discussions now depending shall, as I trust they will, be attended with success, your lordships must again be called upon to thank his majesty, for obtaining, by fresh negotiations, that identical security, which this address declares to be now completely acquired by the conditions of the treaty in its present form.

Not wishing to dwell more on this topic, I will now endeavour to lay before your lordships, as clearly as I can, and in the order pursued by the treaty, those principles of maritime law, for the maintenance of which we armed, and which this country was publicly pledged not to abandon but with its existence: and I will then submit to your lordships, in the same order, what appears to me to be the effect and bearing of these articles, as they now stand, upon each of the principles so stated. But before I enter on this inquiry, there is one farther observation, which I wish to impress upon the minds of all those who may consider any part of this question as worthy of their attention. In examining the tenour and effect of these articles, and in stating the sense, which will, as I think, hereafter be affixed to them by neutral powers, it is not my wish to persuade your lordships, (nor am I, indeed, myself persuaded), that such are the only interpretations of which the expressions themselves may possibly be susceptible. I do not even assert that they are, in every instance, those which, on the result of a doubtful balance, might be adopted by an impartial arbitrator, if such could ever be found to determine national questions between independent governments.

It is more than enough, for every purpose of this statement, if it shall appear that these articles are, in fact, ambiguous, and that they will fairly admit of contrary constructions. The subject is one which requires the utmost precision; the public interests call loudly for it, and, if that has not been obtained, no time should be lost in endeavouring to supply the defect. I cannot too often repeat, that this is my sole view in addressing your lordships on this occasion. The noble lords in government will not deny, that they themselves have thought some farther explanations necessary, for more effectually securing the objects which were in the contemplation of both the parties to this convention. What I urge, is, that the same precautions may be extended to all the points to which the same uncertainty applies. To do this while the dispositions of the parties remain the same, and the intentions of both are fresh in their recollection, will be not only practicable, but easy. If, on the other hand, from motives which I am unwilling to suppose, from any real, or any affected indifference to these great national interests, from any false security, or any mistaken pride, this favourable opportunity be suffered to pass away, the public mischief may be such, as no future diligence, or ability, can retrieve.

When these discussions are once closed

they cannot be renewed, but with difficulty and danger. Whatever shall then be left in ambiguity will be placed in the worst of all situations; in a state where we can neither abandon our right with dignity, nor maintain it with advantage. Where we shall neither obtain the credit which we might claim for its sacrifice, nor secure the benefits which we should derive from its assertion. To how large a proportion of these articles this remark applies, your lordships will judge by comparing them with the corresponding provisions in the hostile conventions of 1780 and 1800. Those conventions were framed with the avowed object of destroying our rights; this treaty is concluded for the purpose of securing them; and the difference of the stipulations, which are to produce these contrary effects on the same subjects, must, therefore, be looked for on the face of the instruments themselves. This comparison is rendered but too easy by a circumstance which I consider as having uniformly, and, in a very great degree, operated to our disadvantage throughout the whole conduct of this negotiation. I am far from supposing that the authors of this treaty can be ignorant of the advantage which a person employed in negotiation must always derive from treating on the basis of his own project, rather than on that of his adversary. They know, unquestionably, that concessions so introduced are often suffered to remain, in order to avoid the inconveniences of farther controversy or delay. That differences, even unintentional, and apparently inconsiderable, in the wording of an article, have often led in their result to the most important consequences; and that the party, who draws any such instrument, will naturally apply his principal attention to the perspicuity and accuracy of those stipulations which are most favourable to the interests he is employed to maintain. The skill and diligence of a public minister is, indeed, often best shown, in the security which he has thus provided to his country, against those ambiguous interpretations, and latent claims, to which the expressions chosen by an adversary might too probably be liable. This advantage, however, as it is known to both parties, cannot always be obtained even by the ablest statesmen; nor is it always equally important. Its value and effect are more or less considerable, as the nature of the subject to be arranged is simple or complicated, resting on undisputed facts, or involved in controverted principles. But it was of peculiar importance that this ground of preference should, in the negotiation of this treaty, have been secured to Great Britain.

Our interest in the whole subject, very far exceeded that of the power with whom we treated. Much of our security in peace, much of our energy and success in war, must hereafter depend on the accuracy and precision of the law, which is now laid down, by this convention, for the conduct of our navy, and for the guidance of our courts of admiralty. It must also be remembered, that the whole subject is involved in difficult and technical distinctions, in matters of detail, and in points of law, often very imperfectly understood by the continental governments, who have so little occasion to study them in their practical application: whereas, in this country, they ought to be familiar to every man who undertakes the conduct of the public interests. And if the king's servants had the smallest reason to distrust their own abilities or knowledge in this respect, they might, for the purpose of framing such a project, have availed themselves of the assistance of some of the greatest men who have ever professed the science of public jurisprudence. But whether this mode of negotiating were more or less desirable, whether it were safer to have treated for the final arrangement of these great questions on the basis of a British or of a Russian project, I must say, without reserve, that no circumstances could require from the ministers of this country that course which has actually been pursued in the present instance; a course which should, in my opinion, have been decidedly rejected from the beginning, not only on the considerations which I have already stated, but perhaps still more on that of the national honour and the dignity of the British crown.

In the form and wording of all these articles, the two hostile conventions of armed neutrality have been followed with a scrupulous and servile exactness wherever they could be made to apply. We have, therefore, negotiated and concluded this treaty, not on the basis of any British, or even of any new Russian project, but on that of the very same hostile and inadmissible conventions, which we actually went to war for the purpose of annulling. And we now stand, in the face of Europe, no longer as resisting, but as acceding to the treaties of armed neutrality; with modifications indeed, and changes in some important points; but sanctioning, by this concession, the general weight and authority of transactions, which we had hitherto considered as gross violations of public law, as manifest indications of hostile purpose, and as sufficient grounds to justify, on our part, the extremities of war itself. Whatever principles of maritime law may hereafter be contested, they must now be discussed with some regard to the treaties of armed neutrality. Whatever words of doubtful interpretation are transferred from those treaties into this convention (and many such are so transferred), must, according to one of the best rules of legitimate construction, be explained by a reference to the original instrument, where they were first introduced into the code of public law.

It is, therefore, under this impression, that we must proceed to examine the concessions of the present convention, and to compare them with those claims for which this country wisely determined, at the commencement of the present year, that it was necessary, even under all the difficulties of that moment, to incur the additional dangers of a northern war. What those claims were, is a fact which cannot now be disputed. At the opening of the last session of parliament, they were stated in this House, and, with much more ability in another place, as being included in five separate propositions, or principles of maritime law; every one of which the neutral league of 1800 had bound the contracting parties in that engagement to resist by force: and every one of which your lordships agreed with the government of that day, in considering as essentially necessary to be maintained for the preservation of our maritime strength, and, consequently, for the means even of our domestic security.

The propositions were as follows:

1. That it is not lawful to neutral nations, to carry on, in time of war, for the advantage, or on the behalf, of one of the belligerent powers, those branches of its commerce from which they are excluded in time of peace.*

* The claims of neutrals, for the security of their commerce, can evidently, in no case, be carried farther than that they may continue to trade in war in the same manner as they did in peace. This is stated by Bynkershoek,

2. That every belligerent power may capture the property of its enemies wherever it shall be met with on the high seas; and may, for that purpose, detain and bring into port neutral vessels laden wholly, or in part, with any such property.†

3. That under the description of contraband of war, which neutrals are prohibited from carrying to the belligerent powers, the law of nations (if not restrained by special treaty), includes all naval as well as all military stores; and generally all articles serving principally, according to the circumstances of the war, to afford to one belligerent power the instruments and means of annoyance to be used against the other.‡

as the whole possible extent of their demand, which he afterwards proceeds to limit by those considerations which results from the rights of the belligerent. "Quæritur quid facere aut non facere possunt inter duos hostes. Omnia, forte inquires, quæ potuerunt cum pax esset inter eos, quos inter nunc bellum est." Bynk. Quæst. Juris Pub. 1. 9.

† This has long ago been laid down as the universal and undoubted law of nations. See the Consolato del Mar. c. 273. Einécus says, "Idem statuendum arbitramus si res hostiles in navibus amicorum reperiantur. Illes capi posse nemo dubitat, quia hosti in res hostiles omnia licent, eatenus ut eas ubicumque repertas sibi possit vindicare."—De Nav. ob vect. &c. c. 2. s. 9.

"I believe it cannot be doubted, that, by the general law of nations, the goods of a friend, found in the vessels of an enemy, are free; and the goods of an enemy, found in the vessel of a friend, are lawful prize."—Jefferson's Let. to Genet, 24 July, 1797.

The law and practice of France has always carried this claim much farther than the British prize courts have ever done. We confiscate only the enemy's property found on board a neutral ship, but release the ship itself, with the remainder of her cargo. The French ordinances direct, that, in addition to the confiscation of the enemy's property so found, the neutral ship which carries it shall also be confiscated. We release all neutral property which is found on board an enemy's ship; but France considers it as lawful prize.—See Ordonnance de Marine, Art. 7, and Valin, p. 284.

In speaking here, and in other places, of the practice of France as constituting an authority of deserved weight on these subjects, I refer to her ancient maritime code, and not to the contradictory decrees, or to the corrupt and lawless decisions, of her revolutionary governments.

4. That it is lawful to naval powers, when engaged in war, to block the ports of their enemies, by cruising squadrons, bona fide allotted to that service, and fairly competent to its execution. That such blockade is valid and legitimate, although there be no design to attack, or to reduce by force, the port, fort, or arsenal to which it is applied. And that the fact of the blockade, coupled with due notice given thereof to the neutral powers, shall affect not only vessels actually intercepted in the attempt to enter the blockaded port, but those ships also which shall elsewhere be met with, and shall be found to have been destined to such port, under the circumstances of the fact and notice of its blockade.*

5. That the right of visiting and examining neutral vessels, is a necessary consequence of these principles. And that, by the law of nations (when unrestrained by treaty) this right is not in any manner affected, by the presence of a neutral ship of war, having under its convoy merchants ships, either of its own nation, or of any other country.†

transport chez l'ennemi, s'appellent marchandises de contrebande. Telles sont les armes, les munitions de guerre, les bois, et tout ce qui sert à la construction et à l'armement des vaisseaux de guerre."—Vattel, c. 7, s. 112. See also the letter of the American government to Mr. Pinckney, their minister at Paris, dated January 16th, 1797, which expressly declares, that by the law of nations, timber and other naval stores, are contraband of war. These are quoted as the two last authorities of undoubted impartiality on the subject. It has been copiously and variously discussed by the older writers on the law of nations; but the concise and luminous expression of Grotius includes the whole principle, by which reason shows that the question always must be governed, "In tertio genere (mercium), usus ancipitis, distinguendus erit belli status."—Grot. l. 3, c. 1, s. 5. See also the essay on contraband, by the able author of the History of the Law of Nations.

* The late judgments of the court of Admiralty have set this question of blockade in so clear a light, that it would be an injury to the reader to refer him elsewhere for the law of nations on this point. These judgments are to be found in the valuable collection of Admiralty Reports: a publication calculated to vindicate the national honour from much unmerited reproach; and to prove to the world that Great Britain administers the public law of nations with the same distinguished ability and unblemished purity, which have so long been the glory of her courts of municipal judicature.

Having thus faithfully recited these propositions, it is not necessary that I should here repeat those arguments which have long since undeniably established both the justice of the principles themselves, and their infinite importance to the interests of this country. The very address to which your lordships are about to accede, describes them, emphatically, as essential rights, and on that ground you are about to congratulate his majesty upon their final establishment and recognition. In what degree they are really secured to us, by the present treaty, is therefore the only point to be now considered; and this question, with the permission of the House, I will proceed to examine in detail.

The first of these principles, in the order in which I stated them, establishes the rule under which the belligerent refuses to neutrals the liberty of carrying on, during the war, those parts of his enemy's trade, from which they are usually excluded in time of peace. This rule has, in our practice, been principally applied to the coasting and colonial trade of France. From both these branches of her trade, France has, in every period of peace, excluded all vessels but her own; with such

† "On ne peut empêcher le transport des effets de contrebande" (we may add, nor that of enemy's property), "si l'on ne visite pas les vaisseaux neutres que l'on rencontre en mer. On est donc en droit de les visiter."—Vattel, l. 3, s. 114.

"Tout vaisseau qui refusera d'amener ses voiles, après la semonce qui lui en aura été faite par nos vaisseaux, ou ceux de nos sujets armés en guerre, pourra y être contraint par artillerie ou autrement, et en cas de résistance et de combat, il sera de bonne prise."—Ordonnance de la Marine de France, Tit. des Prises, Art. 12.

The Spanish ordinance of 1718 has an article to the same effect. With respect to the pretension that neutral vessels sailing under convoy, are exempted from this right of search, it is so unanswerably refuted in sir W. Scott's judgment in the case of the Swedish convoy, that nothing can be added to the authority of that argument. The history of the question has since been stated with very great ability by Dr. Croke, in his reply to Mr. Schlegel's pamphlet; and every person who examines those publications with impartiality, must I think, conclude, in the language used respecting this claim by Cromwell's commissioners in 1657, That a belligerent "cannot, and ought not, to put so much faith in particular captains at sea; that in no former treaty any such article is found; and that the neutral powers have no reason to desire any such novelty."

occasional exceptions only, as have more strongly proved her general principle of exclusion. But in war she has always found it impossible to maintain these monopolies. Pressed on the one hand, by our naval superiority, which has rendered the navigation of their own ships unsafe; and unable, on the other hand, to forego the resources which depend entirely on these important branches of her commerce, she has frequently endeavoured, under these special circumstances, to open both her colonial and her coasting trade to the vessels of neutral nations. But this attempt has uniformly been resisted by Great Britain; nor have the other powers of Europe been very forward to embark in a commerce which they knew we should justly consider as an interference in the war, and as a manifest breach of all the obligations of neutrality.

The right to carry on unmolested, during war, both these branches of the trade of France, although prohibited in time of peace, was, however, claimed in 1780, by the pretended neutral league, which was then formed for the purpose of destroying our naval power. And when, at the close of the last year, the same confederacy was renewed, with the same views, this unjust and inadmissible pretension was, with many others of the same description, once more openly advanced in hostile defiance to Great Britain. The claim which the confederates thus asserted, was, as far as relates directly to the coasting trade, expressed in the third article of the convention of 1800, under the following words, viz. "That neutral ships may navigate freely from port to port, and upon the coasts of the belligerent powers." The present convention has adopted very nearly the same expressions. By the first section of what there also stands as the third article, neutral ships are permitted "to navigate freely to the ports, and upon the coasts of the belligerent powers." And in the next section of the same article, corresponding also (though with a variation respecting enemy's property, of which I shall hereafter speak) with a clause in the treaty of 1800, it is expressly declared, that "the effects embarked on board neutral ships shall be free, with the exception of contraband of war, and of enemy's property."

Now, my lords, if these words do not actually establish the hostile claim of the northern league on this subject of the coasting trade, they certainly do not, on any fair construction at all, preclude it; and if the principle essential to Great Britain be not (as I fear it is) expressly negatived, it is left, at the best, in a state so very doubtful, as to afford a handle for perpetual cavils, and a copious source of interminable differences. A free navigation to the ports, and upon the coasts of any country, must, I think, imply the liberty of navigating freely, both to and from all those ports, and upon every part of those coasts. If any limitation of this liberty was intended, it must naturally be looked for in the same instrument which asserts, and guarantees, the general right. Some such restraints and limitations are accordingly specified in this article; and these must, I think, in all fair reasoning, be taken to be the only remaining exceptions, to that otherwise unrestrained freedom of navigation and commerce with our enemies ports, which neutrals are henceforward to enjoy. Among the exceptions thus specified, not even the most distant reference is to be found to that principle respecting the coasting trade, which we have hitherto thought, as this address declares it, a right essential to our interests. The liberty of sailing freely to any port of the hostile country, is plainly conceded and guaranteed: but it is not even intimated, much less declared, by any article of this treaty, that this permission is not to extend to ships laden with commodities purchased at any other port of the same country. No man, from reading this convention, could conjecture that we had ever asserted such a rule of public law. The very principle itself is consigned to utter oblivion, and any attempt on our part to renew its practical exercise, will henceforth be regarded as a breach of that solemn compact by which we have recognized the innocence, and guaranteed the freedom, of all neutral trade, not consisting in enemies property, or in contraband of war.

Nor indeed would it be easy to explain, in any other sense than that of a deliberate and intentional concession of the coasting trade, the admission of those words which guarantee to neutrals the free navigation, not only to the ports, but "upon the coasts of the powers at war." If a direct trade only from the neutral country to the ports of the belligerents had been intended, the first words of this section had amply secured it. If it was meant to permit a partial and successive discharge of the different articles of the cargo, at different ports, this also is secured by the general and unqualified permission to sail freely to those ports. And the addition of the words "upon the coasts," cannot possibly have been made with this view; because the words themselves have no reference to this purpose, nor do they even convey the idea to the mind of any man, whether he be accustomed to hear the subject spoken of in loose and popular language, or be expressed with the precision of statesmen and civilians. These words were first introduced into the treaty of armed neutrality in 1780. They were there employed for the express purpose of asserting the right of neutrals to carry on the coasting trade of the belligerents. From that treaty they have since been carefully transcribed, first into the hostile convention of 1800, and now again into this conciliatory arrangement, to which we are hereafter to look for the rule of maritime law. It will not be a very uncandid argument, on the part those who shall maintain that Russia having, in all these three cases, adopted these same words of sailing freely upon the coasts of the belligerents, meant to express by them in each of the cases the same claim: and on the other hand, that if Great Britain had now intended to stipulate for the renunciation of the right which Russia had before asserted, our negotiators would not have selected the very same expressions which were originally used for that assertion, and which even now are capable of no other interpretation, and must be either so construed, or regarded as wholly superfluous.

It would however be difficult for any man, at all acquainted with the nature of the subject, and with the situation and interests of the contracting parties, to believe that this point was in fact intended to be conceded by us, or was purposely involved in doubtful and equivocal expressions. Russia could have no object in contesting it with us: Russian ships will never carry on the coasting trade of the belligerents, nor will that country derive either commercial or political advantage, from obtaining this benefit for the vessels of Denmark or of Sweden, to whom alone it is likely that this stipulation will practically apply. But if this surrender of right was not in our contemplation, I am utterly at a loss to conceive why we should have been afraid to state with openness, and to define with accuracy, the extent of the concessions which really were intended; or why we should have forbore to require in return, that our remaining rights, whatever they might be, should be recognized with the same precision, and guaranteed to us with the same certainty.

I must however acknowledge, that to the next point of which I have to speak, the charge of ambiguity does not apply. On this head the treaty is unfortunately but too explicit. It is clear that we have admitted neutrals to carry on the whole colonial trade of France. That claim is indisputably and unequivocally conceded by Great Britain. I have already stated to your lordships on what grounds of policy and justice we have always hitherto refused to neutrals, during war, the privilege of trading with the French colonies. If this prohibition were once withdrawn, or if it did not attach upon the commerce of those colonies with the neutral ports of Europe, as well as on their direct trade with France, our maritime superiority would, at least in that quarter of the world, be completely eluded: the valour and energy of our navy would be deprived of the just reward which it now derives from its most profitable captures; and the enemy would enjoy, undiminished in war, as in peace, all those resources which are most applicable to increased exertions against the vital interests of Great Britain.

The instructions issued by his majesty at the commencement of the late war,* for the conduct of his navy, were therefore founded on this long-established principle; and the only relaxation of it which had taken place until the signature of this treaty, was by an indulgence granted to the united states of America, on account of the peculiarity of their local situation. That government complained that these instructions had driven the Americans to the necessity of purchasing in Europe, by a circuitous voyage, the articles of colonial produce necessary for their own consumption. If the other European colonies had at that time been open to the trade of America, while those of France were closed by us, the ground of this complaint would have been considerably weaker than

* Nov. 6, 1793. "That they shall stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of such colony, and shall bring the same with their cargoes to legal adjudication in our Courts of Admiralty."

it appeared to be under the circumstances which actually subsisted. Or if the complaint itself, however well founded, could not have been attended to by this country, without practically conceding to our enemies the means of bringing their colonial produce to Europe, the paramount claim of our own defence would justly* have superseded every other consideration. But this was by no means the case; it was evident that no vessel laden with French colonial produce, and met with by our cruisers on its passage to Europe, could allege a destination to New York, or Boston, which the mere fact of the course she was pursuing would sufficiently disprove; whereas if a voyage to Hamburgh or Copenhagen had been equally permitted, the same ship might proceed under this pretence to the very mouths of the French ports, waiting the first opportunity to enter safely, if not into Bourdeaux or Marseilles, at least into Cherbourg, Havre, or Dunkirk. Nor was it likely that the direct trade from the Islands to America could, under the peculiar circumstances of a war which had placed in our hands almost the whole of the West Indian possessions of France, be made the channel of any considerable circuitous supply of French colonial produce to Europe. On these grounds a relaxation of our principle was admitted in favour of a friendly power; but this was not done by any treaty, permanent, or even temporary; it was a spontaneous act of his majesty's government, resting on the king's authority alone, and subject to his discretion; and depending therefore for its duration, or its renewal, on the continuance or recurrence of the same circumstances which then led to its adoption.

The new instruction issued for this purpose in 1794, by his majesty in council,† permitted neutral vessels, during that war, to carry to the ports of the United States the produce of the French colonies. But in other respects the former order still remained in force; and from that moment, to the close of last year, amidst the numerous, and often groundless complaints of neutrals, I do not recollect that a single voice was ever heard either to question the justice of our principle, which confined their commerce with the enemy to those branches only which they had carried on before the war; or to dispute the correct application of that principle, as detailed in the instructions under which the British navy has uniformly been acting. Yet, in the present treaty, the whole of this long-admitted claim, its principle as well as its practice, is at once surrendered without reserve, and without compensation, by a permanent and perpetual concession. Not one word of exception has been provided for it; nor, as it should seem, has one thought of interest been bestowed upon it.

My lords, I am happy to see that I am honoured with the attention of my noble and learned friend who presides in this House, and whose situation peculiarly calls upon him to insure to his country that some remedy shall yet be obtained, while a remedy is still within our reach, for this unforeseen and almost incalculable mischief. He is the first in station among those venerable magistrates who administer to the subjects of this realm, and to all foreign nations having intercourse or commerce with us, the inestimable benefits of pure and impartial justice. He is also the first in that high commission of appeal, where the rights and interests, the claims and the complaints, not of individuals only, but of states and governments, are weighed with deliberate consideration, and determined with dignified and scrupulous integrity; and if his continuance in that distinguished office shall be as long as his country wishes it, he will often be required to pronounce authoritatively upon the construction of this treaty, and to promulgate from the seat of justice those numerous and important changes which it has suddenly introduced into our whole system of maritime law. I have long known the uprightness and integrity of his mind: I am certain, not only that when he decides as a judge he will forget that he is a minister, but that even when in debate in this House he delivers any opinion on matter of law, he will speak to us as a lawyer, and not as a politician. I take the liberty therefore to address myself to him, as to a person to whose opinion I always listen with unfeigned respect: and I ask him with confidence, whether, in determining a question of property between individuals, any earthly considerations could induce him to assert, that a neutral ship carrying on the trade of the French colonies with Europe (but not having on board either enemy's property or contraband of war), has violated any one of those conditions subject to which alone this convention has expressly guaranteed an unlimited freedom to neutral navigation? Let my noble and learned friend, before he answers this question, look to the second section of this third article of which I have before been speaking. He will there find it distinctly provided, that "all effects embarked on board neutral ships shall be free," with no other exception than those of contraband of war, and of enemy's property.

The sugars of Martinique or St. Domingo, if so embarked, will certainly not be contraband of war. The case which I put to my noble and learned friend, supposes them not to be enemy's property, but purchased by neutrals under a lawful sale. What is then the sentence which he must pronounce upon them? I answer, in the very words of this article, by which he is to judge, "the effects shall be free;" they shall pass freely, without capture, detention, or delay, to Denmark, to Sweden, to Russia, or even to France itself. Would such a sentence be conformable to the present law of nations? Is this now the rule which guides the practice of our cruisers, or the decisions of our courts? My noble and learned friend well knows that it is not. But we must henceforward submit to receive and recognise it, as an imperious and over-ruling principle, which is to silence the concurrent opinions of all civilians, to annul the uniform decisions of all British and all foreign courts of prize jurisdiction, and to be applied, as I shall hereafter show, not merely to the powers with whom we have ostensibly negotiated this transaction, but to the practice and the rights of every neutral state. If indeed any English ministers could be suspected of having deliberately consented to such a sacrifice, one should not have wondered that a sense of the fundamental change which it must introduce into the principles of our public law, should have rendered them so peculiarly solicitous to word it in the clearest and most decisive terms; lest some natural doubts should still remain among the other powers of Europe, whether the British government had really and knowingly agreed to a concession, which must appear to all the world almost incredible. Clearly and unequivocally indeed have they spoken. For your lordships will observe, that the article from which this new and dangerous consequence is to result, does not stop even at the decisive words which I have already quoted: it goes on to state, with a precision rarely to be found in this treaty, that "it is agreed not to comprise, under the denomination of enemy's property, the produce, growth, or manufactures of the countries at war, acquired by neutrals, and transported on their account." Apply these words to the case which I have already stated; their purport and effect must be, that the produce of Martinique, acquired by Danes or Swedes, may freely be transported on their account to any neutral country; or even to France itself, for in that respect there is no limitation. Even this is not all. As if it had been thought that additional words were still wanting to ratify our submission, or that repetition and tautology could give new validity and assurance to this explicit surrender of our rights: the article subjoins (still speaking of the produce of a hostile country, purchased and transported by neutrals), "which merchandize cannot be excepted, in any case, from the freedom granted to the flag of the neutral power."

Now, my lords, let those who have undertaken the sacred duty of maintaining, in negotiation with foreign powers, the rights of their sovereign, and the interests of their country, weigh in their own minds all the effect and force of these expressions. Let them ask themselves, whether any words can be found in language admitting of less doubt? Whether any purpose can be more distinctly expressed by an agreement, or any obligation be more clearly binding on the public faith? The thing spoken of in the treaty, is "the growth, produce, and manufacture of the territories of the belligerent powers." No man, I suppose, will deny that the colonies of France are its territories; or that the sugars, coffee, and cotton, are their growth and produce. The stipulation respecting this growth and produce is, that it may freely be acquired by neutrals, and transported by them without restraint to any other place. I am not aware that even the possibility of cavil is left to us, on this subject, much less any honourable plea, to which British ministers can now resort in defence of this most important right, which all their predecessors have successfully maintained, and the dereliction of which, when coupled with the other concessions of this convention, will place us in a situation hitherto unexampled in the history of the British navy.

Can we now contend that neutrals may not transport to Europe the produce of the colonies of France? Can we even refuse to them an unlimited intercourse with all the ports of all those colonies? Look at the treaty—the only object of which is to define and regulate such questions with a greater accuracy than before prevailed, and, as the preamble declares, “to fix invariably the principles of the contracting parties upon the rights of neutrality.” We have there expressly conceded, not in any loose and general provision, having other points principally in its contemplation, but in the precise words of an article, framed for the sole purpose of certainty upon this very subject, that all neutrals “may sail freely to any port of the belligerents;” to their ports in America, therefore, as well as to their ports in Europe: and that their commerce in the productions of those countries “shall be free,” with such limitations only as have no relation to this question of colonial trade. Must we then acquiesce in this change, and leave to neutrals the enjoyment of this new pretension? Or shall we, in failure of every other plea, lay claim to some hidden exception, to some implied reserve, by which we intend to profit, but which we have omitted to express? Shall we attempt to argue that the colonial trade is by us considered as a special case, to which this general concession does not apply? Even there also the framers of this article have met us; and, as if they foresaw the evasion, but were determined to guard against it, they have distinctly provided, not merely that this freedom of navigation shall in general be permitted, but that it shall not “in any case” whatever, be refused. On the whole, therefore, I have, for my own part, no hesitation, or difficulty, in declaring it to be my deliberate and conscientious opinion, that any judge, sitting to decide under this treaty as it now stands, and having regard to the obligation of his oath, must admit the conclusion which I have here stated: and that no minister can in negotiation contend against it, without betraying the deliberate and dishonourable purpose of breaking the public faith, and wresting from their true construction the solemn engagements of his sovereign. Nor, until I hear the contrary, will I believe that any man, capable of construing a treaty, can attempt to controvert this interpretation, however much he may wish to excuse the negligence, or hope to palliate the error, which constrains him to admit so dangerous a consequence.

Having stated this as the firm and unalterable conviction of my mind, grounded on reasons which I am confident it is impossible to shake, I think it just to add, in this instance as in the former, that I am thoroughly persuaded this effect was not in the contemplation of the framers of this treaty. It has, I have no doubt, resulted only, like that of which I have before spoken, from precipitation and inadvertency. But I have much more satisfaction in looking to the means of rectifying the omission, than in examining its origin, or in tracing its consequences. I am therefore happy to remark to your lordships, upon this, and upon almost every other concession of this treaty, that they are all points still susceptible of amendment; points on which Russia, disposed as she now is towards Great Britain, can have had no real interest to insist. Very great advantage would certainly result to other neutral powers from this particular concession; and its value to France might be almost beyond calculation; but to the Russian empire it can produce no benefit whatever. The colony trade of France in war, if we open it at all to neutrals, will naturally fall into other hands than those of Russia. If, therefore, in the spirit of conciliation and friendship, we propose at Petersburg to explain this article in a manner more consistent, both with our rights and interests, we must believe that such an explanation will not be refused. There can be no reason to apprehend that the mere desire of gratifying our common enemies, or rivals, would induce that court to insist on our adhering to an agreement into which we have been betrayed only by negligence or inadvertence, and the consequence of which may produce so material an injury to our naval power.

Having therefore expressed this hope, and trusting that the measures by which it may best be realized, will neither be omitted nor delayed, by those who are charged with the conduct of the public interests, I proceed to speak of the second of the general principles, which I have before enumerated. It is that which is opposed to the pretension that free ships make free goods. It is the principle on which we maintain that the goods of an enemy embarked on board a neutral ship are not exempted from those natural rights of capture and confiscation, which accrue to a belligerent whenever he meets with hostile property, not protected by the territorial jurisdiction of a friend. I am happy to declare, without reserve, that on this point the present convention seems to me to have obtained a sufficient recognition of the just and established principle asserted by Great Britain. Our advantage in that recognition is indeed confined to the single case of Russia, whose commercial navigation is of small extent. With respect both to Denmark,* and to Sweden,† as far as the public faith of na-

Art. 12.—“But lest such freedom of navigation and passage of the one confederate should be of detriment to the other, while engaged in war, by sea or land, with other nations, and lest the goods and merchandises of the enemies should be concealed under the name of a friend and ally, for the avoiding all suspicion and fraud of such sort, it is agreed, that all ships, carriages, wares, and men, belonging to either of the confederates, shall be furnished in their journeys and voyages with safe-conducts, commonly called passports and certificates, such as are underwritten, verbatim, signed and subscribed by the chief magistrate of that province and city, or by the chief commissioners of the customs and duties, and specifying the true names of the ships, carriages, tions is to be considered as binding, this stipulation was already contained in our treaties with both those powers, and was perhaps still more distinctly expressed than it is in the article of which I am now speaking. But I am far from thinking that the recognition of the same principle by Russia was therefore of slight importance: and I am desirous to give to the convention, on this head, the full credit to which I think it fairly entitled.

Most sincerely do I wish that the next principle which we have to consider, were left by the result of this negotiation on a like footing of advantage and security to Great Britain. It involves what is perhaps the most valuable of all the interests for which we have contended. It relates to the important concern of contraband of war. But before I speak of the consequences to be apprehended from the unparalleled inaccuracy of this part of the convention, it is proper first to advert to those more obvious and avowed concessions which it contains, and which apply to this essential point. The first of these relates to the duration of the present engagements. Our commercial treaties with Russia, which we had renewed in 1797, for a fresh period of ten years only, had, by a temporary stipulation, admitted the subjects of the Russian empire to carry, in their own ships, naval stores to the ports of our enemies. By the second separate article of the present convention, the treaty of 1797, which had been suspended during the short period of hostility between the two countries, has been re-established for the remainder of its terms; but the period of goods, and masters of the vessels, as also the exact dates, without any fraud or collusion; together with such other descriptions of that sort as are expressed in the following form of a safe conduct and certificate. Wherefore, if any person shall affirm, upon oath by which he is bound to his king, state, or city, that he hath given in true accounts, and shall afterwards be convicted, on sufficient proof, of any wilful fraud therein, he shall be severely punished, as a transgressor of the said oath.” Here follows the form of passport, which is to the same effect as that in the Danish treaty. And the article goes on, after some farther detail, to state, that “if the goods of an enemy are found in such ship of the confederate, that part only which belongs to the enemy shall be made prize, and what belongs to the confederate shall be immediately restored.”

its duration has not been extended. It will therefore expire within a little more than five years from this time; but the privilege which it conveyed to Russia of carrying naval stores to our enemies, will now not expire with it. The article which contained that concession has been separated from all commercial stipulations, and transferred from the treaty of 1797, which was of limited and short duration, into the present convention, which is expressly declared to be perpetual.* Let not any man that hears me, imagine this innovation to be a matter of inconsiderable consequence. Hitherto, as often as our commercial treaties with Russia were to be renewed, so often was the policy of this concession brought under our view, to be reconsidered, as any change should have occurred in the circumstances of the two empires, or in their mutual relations to each other. In the present state of the commercial marine of Russia, this privilege, confined as it is to Russian ships alone, cannot materially affect the interests of Great Britain; nor is likely that the next five years will produce any essential alteration in this respect.

But is this country equally secure in the perpetual surrender of such a privilege? Are we certain that the marine of Russia will for ever continue incapable of exercising it to an extent highly prejudicial to the most important interests of the British empire? What sentence of irrevocable law, what principle of reason or of nature, has barred all farther progress to a nation which has been raised, within the last century, from a horde of barbarians to rank with the first among the powers of Europe? Or, where is that bold and visionary prophet who, circumscribing by his predictions the exertions of a great and growing empire, has ventured to guarantee to us the perpetual duration of its present territorial boundaries? Has he never heard of the three successive partitions of Poland? Has he never looked to the present situation of Sweden and of Turkey? Or, is he to learn, that it is yet a problem how far that desperate system of partition may at this very hour be actively extending itself on the continent of Europe? The French republic has openly adopted it as the main spring of all her foreign policy, the great instrument of her present and future dominion. Left as she now is by our submission, the indisputed arbitress of Europe, what shall prevent her from inducing the continental powers once more to recur to the same injustice; to quench their mutual jealousies in the blood of their unoffending neighbours, and to seek their own security, not by a manly resistance against her encroachments, but by making themselves accomplices with her in the plunder and division of weak and defenceless states? From the personal dispositions indeed of the present sovereigns of those three mighty monarchies, better things may perhaps be hoped. Happy will it be for Europe, and happy for themselves, if they shall finally reject these revolting projects of illegitimate aggrandizement! But if the danger to which Great Britain may be exposed by the consequences of the present treaty, is to recur as often as the system of partition shall revive in Europe, we may too soon feel the want of some better security. We may find abundant cause to regret that we have not obtained for the interests of our country some more lasting safeguard than can be found either in the constancy of any personal character, or in the precarious tenure of human life.

Yet, if it were as reasonable, as it is in fact absurd, to contend that no Russian merchant ship can ever be constructed in those harbours which now contain a military marine not much inferior to that of France; if it were clear that no naval stores could ever be exported in Russian ships from the same ports to which the vessels of all other nations resort in crowds for the purchase of those very articles; if it were certain that Russia alone, of all the powers of Europe, never can henceforth extend her navigable coast, either by treaty or by conquest; if we had no reason at this very hour for wishing to place at her disposal the commanding port of the Mediterranean sea, as the only means which can now preserve it from an absolute dependence upon France; if the benefit of this convention could justly be withheld from all provinces or countries henceforth to be acquired by either of the parties; a principle which we ourselves have never recognized as to our own conquests, nor have maintained against Prussia in the recent example of Dantzic.

yet even then, making all these extravagant admissions, your lordships will still find, that we have, by another part of the convention, materially facilitated to our enemies the means of carrying on with Russia, even in her present state, an extensive commerce in naval stores.

By the seventh article of this treaty (copied with so many other of its stipulations from the hostile conventions of the northern league*) it is provided that the privileges of neutrality shall be allowed to such vessels only as have on board a captain and one-half their crew composed of the subjects of the power whose flag they bear. If these words are to be construed only as limiting the proportion in which the subjects of one neutral may be admitted to navigate the vessels of another neutral, I agree that they must be innocent, because I am sure they are completely nugatory. It must be quite indifferent to us by what neutral sailors neutral ships are manned: or, if we should find any imaginable advantage in the distinction, the powers, whose interests it affected, would very soon, by the practice of adopting and naturalizing the subjects of each other, make it impossible for us, even in a single instance, to ascertain the fact in question. But if this provision be construed, as I fear it will, as superseding every other restraint respecting the crews of neutral vessels; if hostile subjects as well as neutral may henceforth compose one half of the seamen who navigate such vessels, it becomes important to inquire what innovation has thus been introduced into the law of nations, and how far it may affect the interests of Great Britain. By the rule which is now generally received in Europe,† not one half, but one third only of hostile seamen are permitted to navigate a neutral vessel. If it had been meant that this rule should still subsist as to hostile seamen, and that the new provision of the article which we are now considering, should be super-added to it, but confined to neutral seamen only, we must suppose that this intention would have been distinctly expressed. It was the object of this treaty to fix invariably the rights of neutrality. It cannot therefore be presumed, that in treating on this very subject of the crews of neutral vessels, this important limitation of those rights would have been passed over in silence, if it were intended to remain. The plain interpretation of that silence must be, that the old rule is abrogated by the omission, and that, by the positive stipulation, the new rule has been substituted in its place. Russia, therefore, in construing this treaty, which, strange as it must appear, does not contain any general reservation of our former rights, will undoubtedly be well warranted to contend, that in the present case, as in that of contraband, the specification of the restraint implies the permission of all that it does not expressly restrain. If then, in any time of war, a crew, the half of whom are French, may sail under the protection of a Russian flag; and if to a vessel so manned we must allow the general rights of neutrality, and the special privileges of the Russian navigation, can any man doubt that great and essential detriment may arise to us from this concession. France herself, with all her parade of liberality, has not yet granted the like privilege either to Russia, or as, I believe, to any other country.‡ Yet, if this concession from Great Britain were really a benefit to Russia, it might, in some points of view, be less objectionable; but it is to France alone, and in her wars with England, that all the advantage of this article will accrue. A direct commerce, during war, is now authorized between the French and Russian ports, in vessels bearing indeed the Russian flag, but which will be navigated by a crew, one half of whom are French, and who will consequently have much greater opportunities than any which can now subsist of fraudulently disguising the

In stating to your lordship these last concessions, I have proceeded on the persuasion, that they are too plainly and clearly expressed, not to have been in the full contemplation of both the contracting parties. If the fact was otherwise, if these stipulations were originally intended to bear any other than their natural and obvious sense, I have only to repeat, in this case as in the former, that no time should be lost in removing all ground of ambiguity, by candid and amicable explanation. But, among the numerous instances in which such a revisal of the present treaty appears to be essential to the public interests, there is none of such extensive importance as that to which I must next intreat the particular attention of the House. On comparing together the different sections of the third article of this convention, one great distinction between them cannot fail to be remarked, even by the most superficial observer. The two first sections and the fifth, those which relate to the coasting and colonial trade, and to the proceedings of our maritime tribunals, are in their frame and operation manifestly prospective. They provide only for the future arrangement of the objects which they embrace; and they profess to extend no farther than to the reciprocal conduct of Great Britain and Russia towards each other. The third and fourth sections, on the contrary, those which treat of contraband of war, and of blockaded ports, do each of them expressly contain, not the concession of any special privilege henceforth to be enjoyed by the contracting parties only, but the recognition of a universal and pre-existing right, which, as such, cannot justly be refused to any other independent state. This third section, which relates to contraband of war, is, in all its parts, strictly declaratory. It is introduced by a separate preamble, announcing that its object is to prevent "all ambiguity * or misunderstanding as to what ought to be considered as contraband of war." Conformably with this intention, the contracting parties declare, in the body of the clause, what are the only commodities which they "acknowledge as such." And this declaration is followed by a special reserve, that it "shall not prejudice their particular treaties with other powers."

If the parties had intended to treat of this question only as it related to their own conduct towards each other, and to leave it in that respect on the same footing on which it stood before the formation of the hostile league of 1800, all mention of contraband in this part of the present convention would evidently have been superfluous. Nothing more could, in that case, be necessary, than simply to renew the former treaties, which had specified what articles of commerce the subjects of the respective powers might carry to the enemies of each other; and as we find that renewal expressly stipulated in another article of this same convention, we must, in common justice to its authors, consider this third section as introduced for some distinct and separate purpose. It must therefore unquestionably be understood in that larger sense which is announced in its preamble, and which is expressed in the words of the declaration which it contains. It must be taken as laying down a general rule for all our future discussions with any power whatever, on the subject of military or naval stores, and as establishing a principle of law which is to decide universally on the just interpretation of this technical term of contraband of war.

Nor, indeed does it less plainly appear from the conclusion, than it does from the preamble, and from the body of this section, that it is meant to bear the general and comprehensive sense, which I have here stated. The reservation which is there made of our special treaties with other powers, is manifestly inconsistent with any other more limited construction. For, if the article had really no other object in its view, than to renew or to prolong our former engagements with the northern crowns, what imaginable purpose can be answered by this concluding sentence? Was it necessary to declare, that a stipulation, extending only to Russia, to Denmark and to Sweden, should not prejudice our treaties with other powers? How should it possibly have any such effect? How can our treaties with Portugal or with America be affected by the renewal of those engagements which had long ago declared what articles might be carried in Russian or Danish ships? But the case would, indeed be widely different under the more enlarged construction which evidently belongs to this stipulation. The reserve was not only prudent but necessary, when we undertook to lay down a universal principle, applying alike to our transactions, with every independent state. In recognizing a claim of pre-existing right, and in establishing a new interpretation of the law of nations, it was unquestionably of extreme importance expressly to reserve the more favourable practice which our subsisting treaties had established with some other powers. And that which was before incongruous and useless, would therefore, under such circumstances, become, as far as it extends, an act of wise and commendable forethought.

On the whole, therefore, I have no doubt that neutral nations will be well warranted in construing this section as declaratory of a universal principle, and applicable to every case where contraband of war is not defined by especial treaty. Nor could we, in my opinion, as this treaty now stands, contend in future wars, with any shadow of reason, much less with any hope of success, against this interpretation, however destructive it must be of all our dearest interests. Least of all can we resist it, when we are reminded, that in a succeeding article of this very convention* we have bound ourselves, by the most distinct engagement, to regard all its principles and stipulations as permanent, and to observe them as our constant rule in matters of commerce and navigation; expressions exactly corresponding with those by which the parties to the two neutral leagues asserted both the permanence and the universality of the principles which were first asserted by those confederacies, and which the present convention so frequently recognizes and adopts.

It is therefore highly necessary that your lordships should carefully examine what is this general interpretation which the contracting parties have thus solemnly declared; what sense it is that they have thus permanently affixed to a term so frequently recurring in the practice and law of every civilized nation, and so intimately connected with the exercise of our naval rights, as that of contraband of war. The explanation given of this term by this convention, is neither drawn from any established usage, nor supported by any admitted authority. It is copied both in its letter and in its spirit from the same convention of armed neutrality, which, as I have often had occasion to remark, have so unfortunately been chosen as the models for this British negotiation. In the first of those hostile leagues the empress of Russia thought proper to declare, that her engagements with Great Britain on the subject of contraband, should thenceforth be considered as the invariable rule of natural and universal right; and that those commodities, which her own subjects were privileged by treaty to carry to our enemies, should not, in the commerce of any other nations, be reputed contraband, except by virtue of some special agreement. In strict adherence to this unprecedented and extravagant pretension, the article which we are now considering, adopts the same rule, and adopts it on the same grounds; enumerating all the commodities mentioned in the treaty of 1797, between Great Britain and Russia, and declaring that conformably to that treaty the two sovereigns acknowledge those commodities alone as contraband of war. And as from that enumeration, every article serving for the construction or repair of ships is carefully excluded, it follows, that the framers of this treaty have made the king of Great Britain publicly declare, that naval stores ought not, in his opinion, "to be considered as contraband of war;" and that he himself does not "acknowledge them as such!"

I must, however, here observe, that if no other objection existed to this part of the treaty except its extraordinary inaccuracy, this alone would make it absolutely necessary to resort to some farther negotiation on the subject. It is not possible that the future interests of this country on these essential points should be left to rest on the unsteady foundations of this precipitate transaction. The most important clause even of this important section, that which contains the very object and essence of the whole, is in one part of it so worded, that, as it now stands, no human ingenuity can extract from it a reasonable meaning. The enumeration of those articles which Great Britain has by this convention declared to be the only contraband of war, is, as I have already stated, carefully confined to the implements of a land war, to cannons and firelocks, swords and pikes, knapsacks, saddles and bridles, and the like; and, after going through this list, the treaty proceeds expressly to declare, not only that all other articles whatever shall not be subject to confiscation, but that they "are not to be reputed warlike and naval stores." Muskets and pikes, knapsacks, saddles and bridles, may, it seems, be useful for the construction of ships. But all other articles whatever, all iron and timber, pitch and tar, masts, hemp, sailcloth, cordage, and the rest, which the ignorance of our ancestors considered as necessary for the means of maritime war, are now discovered not only not to be contraband, but not even to be naval stores. The negotiations now depending at Petersburg, must, however, as I imagine, produce such a correction of this article as may at least make it consistent with common sense, and in some degree explanatory of the meaning which it was designed to convey. Anticipating, therefore, some such amendment, it may be proper for us to consider the clause as if it were already limited to its first declaration, that naval stores ought not, by the law of nations, to be reputed contraband of war.

To judge of the effect which such a declaration must produce on the situation of this country in any future war, it is necessary that we should once more recur to the history of the first treaty of armed neutrality. It was the undoubted object of that transaction, to disarm this country of her naval pre-eminence. Its authors, therefore, did not confine their views to the acquisition of special privileges for their own navigation. On principles the most hostile to our naval interests, they framed a universal code of maritime law,*

* Treaty between Russia and Prussia 8th May 1781. The preamble, after speaking of the determination of the king of Prussia to accede to the principles of the armed neutrality, adds—"Cette détermination de S. M. Prussienne répondant parfaitement au desir de S. M. Impériale de toutes les Russies de leur donner une base stable et solide, en les faisant reconnoître sollemnellement par toutes les puissances, comme les seuls capables d'établir la sûreté du commerce et de la navigation des nations neutres en général, leurs majestés se sont partées d'un commun accord à entrer en négociation, sur un objet qui les intéresse au même degré."

which they required that every other nation should implicitly adopt, and to which they bound themselves to obtain, either by menace, or by force, the reluctant acquiescence of Great Britain. In pursuance of the purpose thus openly avowed, they professed, on this very subject of contraband, to extend to every other country the special privileges which we had granted to Russia;* and they declared, without reserve, that a commerce with our enemies, in naval stores, was open to every neutral state, under the fundamental principles of the law of nature. Prussia, therefore, although not privileged by any treaty on this subject, yet claimed for herself the undisturbed enjoyment of this hostile trade. And this pretension, extravagant as it may seem, was not only recognised, but guaranteed to her by all the confederates;† who, at the same time, invited every other neutral power to enter into the like engagements, and to partake of similar advantages.‡

If under such circumstances the British government had then pursued the same conduct which has now been followed in the present treaty, no hope could have remained to us of ever re-establishing our rights. If this country had, in that moment, as in the present, adopted those hostile conventions as the basis of its own engagements, if we had then proclaimed to the world, in the words of this article, that naval stores ought not to be considered as contraband of war, and that we ourselves did not acknowledge them as such, can any man doubt in what situation we should thenceforth have stood? Not only would the Prussian claim have been by these admissions irrevocably confirmed, but the principle, thus solemnly recognised by us, must of necessity have been extended equally to every other country. The same advantage must again have been conceded to Holland, no longer fettered by any obligations of reciprocal assistance. It had before been reluctantly allowed to her as a special privilege and condition of alliance;* it had been recently withdrawn, as an indulgence too great to be continued to an indifferent spectator of our danger;† but it must, under such a declaration as the present, have been once more restored to her, as the inherent right of every neutral power.

The effect of the same principle must, at a subsequent period, have equally been felt in our negotiations with America. By their treaty of friendship and commerce with Great Britain, the United States had agreed, in 1794, to include in the enumeration of contraband, almost every article of naval stores. Accused on this account by the French and Spanish governments of hostility to the interests of France, the American ministers vindicated their impartiality by an appeal not merely to the justice of the rule, but also to the well-known fact, that Great Britain was immutably resolved to maintain it against every neutral power. They asserted (how truly it is immaterial here to inquire) that a contrary rule would better have promoted the interests of their own country. But they urged, with undeniable reason, that until Great Britain should consent to renounce ‡ her ancient rights, it was not to be expected that America should resist them by measures of unjust hostility.

† Order in Council, 17th April 1780, which recites that Holland had deserted her alliance with Great Britain, and placed herself in the situation of a neutral power not bound to this kingdom by any treaty; and thereupon suspends all particular stipulations respecting the neutral navigation of the Dutch in time of war, and particularly those of the marine treaty in 1674.

‡ Letter from the Executive Government of America to Mr. Pinckney, 19th Jan. 1797. Mr. Pickering's letter to the chevalier Yrujo, 17th May 1797: "Permit me to say, that our engagements with Great Britain ought to be no matter of surprise to the Catholic king, because his majesty has seen, during the whole course of the American war, how steadily Great Britain persisted, in opposition to the demands of all the maritime powers, to maintain her claims under the law of nations, to capture enemy's property, and timber, and naval stores, as contraband in neutral ships. Could H. C. M. therefore expect that Great Britain would relinquish her legal rights to a nation (the United States) which abounded in materials for building and equipping ships?"

Those rights we have now voluntarily renounced: and unless the renunciation be itself retracted, we must, in all future discussions with America, when the short term of our commercial treaty shall have expired, abide the consequences of that new rule of public law, which we ourselves have thought proper to proclaim. The same must be our situation with respect to Holland, with whom we have indeed made peace, under the auspices of France, but with whom we are little likely, under such auspices, to renew our treaties, either of commerce or alliance. The same must be our situation with respect to Spain, whenever that power shall think fit to acknowledge herself bound by the preliminaries of peace, to which France alone has hitherto pledged her faith. In the same state we shall stand towards Portugal, if it be true, as I fear it is, that while we boast to have guaranteed the territorial integrity of that unhappy country, by placing her colonies at the mercy of the enemy, we have at the same time imposed on her the ignominious necessity of abandoning her ancient alliances, and renouncing for ever her commercial connexions with Great Britain.* In the same state we shall likewise stand towards Prussia; and in the same towards almost every other maritime power in Europe, which is not a party in this convention. Not one of those powers will be bound to us by any special treaty on this important subject. To regulate their practice, they must look to the general law of nations; and they will find it in our own declarations contained in this very article. We have here publicly deserted our former claim; we have confessed that naval stores ought not to be considered as contraband of war, and that we ourselves no longer acknowledge them as such. We have expressed this avowal in the very words originally selected for the purpose of making it universal; and we have inserted it in our treaty with those very powers who had confederated for no other object than to enforce our observance of it.

If then we shall, in any future war, be manifestly unable to repel, by any just or reasonable plea, the claim of neutrals to trade with our enemies in naval stores, are we, on the other hand, better prepared to admit and recognise it? We, who so lately armed for the very purpose of resisting it; whose existence depends upon our maritime pre-eminence; and whose naval power can only be maintained by an adherence to the same principles on which it was established? What then remains, but that we should address ourselves with openness and confidence to the ally with whom we have concluded this dangerous stipulation? We have every reason to be confident of obtaining his consent to withdraw the concession, if it has been improvidently made: to rectify the error, if it has been committed through inadvertence: or to explain the misconception, if the meaning which the words suggest be really contrary to the acknowledged intention of the parties.

The special privileges of Russia, with respect to this question of contraband, are already sufficiently established, by the renewal of our ancient treaties. To the extent of those privileges nothing is added by this Convention; their permanence, if that point were considered as essential, might easily be secured by a separate stipulation; but to compel us to adhere to a declaration, which applies them universally to every other country, is contrary to the manifest interest of Russia, and cannot be desired by her sovereign, unless he were animated by very different sentiments than those which he appears to entertain towards the British empire.

I pass then to the next question, that of blockaded ports, on which it will not, I trust, be necessary for me to detain your lordships long. The stipulation on this subject is likewise declaratory; and it is transcribed with the variation only of a single word, from the corresponding articles of the two Conventions of armed neutrality. Those articles had declared, in substance, that no port should be considered as blockaded, unless where the power attacking it should maintain a squadron constantly stationed before it, and sufficiently near to create an evident danger of entering. In the present treaty, instead of the words, "and sufficiently near," the contracting parties have substituted, "or sufficiently near." And I have not the smallest doubt, that by this minute change, trifling and unimportant as it is, they did really intend to establish, in their full extent, the principles which Great Britain has maintained on this great question of maritime blockade, and which the article, in its original state, as it stood in the two neutral Conventions, was intended completely to subvert. I have already so often been compelled to point out the inconveniencies of this servile adherence, on our part, to the wording of a hostile treaty, that I am unwilling again to recur to the same topic, though in a case to which it is so peculiarly applicable.

Nor will I even dwell upon the glaring impolicy of resting so important a principle, as that which was here in contest, on the minute and scarcely perceptible variation of a single particle. But there are two farther objections to this stipulation in its present form, to which I am the more desirous of drawing the attention of those who are to explain, or to amend this Convention, because I think some remedy may yet be provided against the mischiefs which must, as I fear, necessarily follow from the words of the article, as it now stands. When we speak, in this article, of the power which attacks the port, it seems to me, that we do in some degree countenance the unfounded assertion, that a blockade by sea, like that by land, require an actual design of reducing, or conquering, the particular place to which it is applied. Whereas Great Britain now maintains, in her naval wars with France, as Holland * formerly maintained in her contest with Spain, that the blockade of one or more of the enemy's ports, or even of a considerable extent of his coasts, may lawfully be adopted, for the special purpose of intercepting his supplies, in order, by this pressure, to reduce him to just and reasonable conditions of peace.

The second objection which I have to state against this article is, perhaps, of still more importance, because it calls in question both the justice and the policy of the whole stipulation, even if interpreted in exact conformity with what, in the most candid construction, plainly appears to have been the intention of the parties. From the very nature of all naval operations, depending so much on the variation of weather, a squadron blockading a hostile port, and fully equal to the execution of that service, may, nevertheless, occasionally be unable to remain either stationary before the port, or even sufficiently near to it to create, at all times, an evident danger of entering. And if, as the words of this article import, the blockade is understood to continue so long only as that danger actually exists, and is, on the other hand, to be considered as being raised as often as the danger ceases, even for the shortest interval, the utmost confusion must inevitably arise, in all cases; but particularly in those of neutral ships met with at a distance from the blockaded port, but destined to it. No such ship can ever henceforth be detained, because by this stipulation it is made impossible that the officer of the belligerent should know whether the blockade does at that moment really subsist; and because the fact of its existence can alone justify the detention. It may, indeed, be asserted, without the least exaggeration, that even giving the fullest weight to that minute verbal change, on which so much is here made to depend, a strict adherence to the letter of this stipulation, in its present form, must utterly destroy our whole system of blockade by cruising squadrons. In order to enable ourselves to maintain that system, according to our present practice, we must contend for a more liberal interpretation of this treaty, drawn from the general spirit of the negotiation, or from the supposed intention of the contracting parties. In truth, the original article, from which this stipulation has unfortunately been copied, is so confused and intricate, as hardly to be capable of translation, or reconcileable with sense or grammar; and it is therefore but ill calculated to serve as a permanent rule, applicable to all the cases which are likely to arise on so nice and critical a question as that of blockade. It is, therefore, much indeed to be desired, that a new and more precise declaration of the law of nations, on this subject, may prevent those numerous differences to which we must infallibly be exposed, from leaving the question on its present footing.

Without, however, detaining your lordships longer on a point so clear as hardly to admit of illustration, I will now proceed to the last branch of this inquiry, and examine those stipulations of the present treaty which relate to the right of search.

Were it not, indeed, for the confident hope which I entertain of seeing the other deficiencies of this Convention supplied by the result of the negotiations now depending, I should consider all that regards this last point as being comparatively of very little moment. Not that I am at all desirous of depreciating a claim, which, as a part of our general system of maritime law, I have always thought of infinite importance; but because its whole value is, as I conceive, purely relative, and must always entirely depend upon the extent and nature of those principles to the maintenance of which it is applied. The privilege of visiting, or of searching a neutral ship, can in itself be of very little advantage. It is useful only as it facilitates the exercise of other rights; as it leads to the detection of frauds, and the prevention of unlawful commerce; and as it affords the means of ascertaining those facts which justify detention, seizure, and confiscation. If, therefore, we are henceforth to continue to neutrals the advantages which this Convention guarantees to them, our right of visitation, or of search, could be of little value. When we have opened to them the coasting and colonial trade of our enemies, what should we gain by acquiring the utmost certainty that they do in fact avail themselves largely of that permission? When we have declared naval stores not to be contraband, what would it profit us if we should examine every cargo of that description which is carried to the ports of our enemies? Or, when we have admitted that a port, blockaded only by a cruising squadron, is open to the trade of neutrals, what purpose would it answer to ascertain the name of every vessel sailing with such a destination? But if, on the contrary, that code of naval law which Great Britain has hitherto asserted, had in this negotiation been steadily maintained, and unequivocally confirmed, nothing could have been more important than to have crowned that great work, by placing beyond dispute the means of exercising those principles, the justice of which had finally been recognised.

Defective, therefore, as I must consider this treaty in its present state, I cannot help believing that its authors will be induced, if not by these suggestions, at least by their own reflections, to apply themselves with diligence and zeal to procure, for the interest of their country, some more effectual and permanent secu-city. And as in that case it is, I think, impossible to doubt of their immediate and complete success, I am desirous to solicit the attention of the House to what I have to state on this one remaining point, which would, under such circumstances, again become an object of very principal and leading importance. The general right of visitation and search follows of necessity from that of maritime capture. If we may lawfully make prize of the ships and property of our enemies, some inquiry is evidently necessary, that we may distinguish them from those which belong to neutrals; or, if any restraints may justly be imposed in war on the commerce of neutrals, it is only by examination that we can ascertain, in any particular case, either that the cargo is innocent, or the destination legal. This is indeed so manifest, that, if we except some idle declamation from the schools of French philosophy, I believe this right itself has never yet been seriously questioned.

But some of those neutral states, whose subjects have profited by speculations which their treaties admit to be unlawful, are always anxious to narrow the exercise of a right, the principle of which they cannot dispute. In this desire, and in a general hostility to the British naval power, originated both the practice of giving convoy to neutral commerce, and the pretension of exempting from visitation and search all vessels so protected. In the very few instances which can be alleged of any ancient practice of this nature, it is notorious, that the immediate object of the convoy so appointed, was to cover an unlawful commerce;* and if

* In 1656, the celebrated vice-admiral De Ruyter, after lying some time in Cadiz, sailed from thence for Amsterdam, with several merchantmen under his convoy. He was met in the Channel by some armed ships of England, then at war with Spain, which insisted upon search; but upon De Ruyter's declaring, "that there was not any thing in the fleet that belonged to the king of Spain," they desisted, and parted good friends. Yet, after this solemn declaration of a commander who stands so high in the annals of maritime fame, it was afterwards proved, that there was an immense treasure of silver on board these vessels belonging to the king of Spain, and his subjects in Brabant and Flanders, which De Ruyter had assured them he would transport in safety. And so important was the service to the enemy, that, if this money had not been conveyed, the king of Spain would not have been able to have brought his army history alone had not enabled us to reject this pretension, reason and justice were completely decisive against it. Our cruisers were required to receive the declaration of the neutral officer, as conclusive evidence of a fact which he has neither any interest to examine, nor any sufficient means to ascertain; which therefore, even if it were true, could not be known to him, and which, if it were false, it was made impossible that we should ever be enabled to disprove. All examination was denied to us, except that our ships of war might, if they pleased, send an officer on board the convoying ship, and there receive a communication of the papers and certificates belonging to the merchant vessels of the convoy. But if those papers were regular (and it would, under such circumstances, be strange indeed if they were otherwise), no farther search whatever could take place. This was the pretension, and this the law, which the hostile confederates in the league of 1800 bound themselves to impose by force upon Great Britain, after the deliberate and premeditated act of one of those powers had brought the matter to the issue of open violence.

From my own feelings I judge of those which your lordships must have experienced when you perceived, on reading this Convention, how little benefit we have, in this just cause, derived from the most complete success: how little the British admission of the present day differs in its practical application from that neutral claim, our necessary resistance to which was the immediate occasion of the war. The right of searching vessels under convoy, which was denied by the Convention of the armed neutrality, is indeed recognised by this treaty. But to what purpose it is recognised, we must learn by an examination of the subsequent provisions, which have limited the exercise of a right, the justice of which has been thus openly acknowledged. It is in the first place refused, now for the first time, to all privateers; a circumstance which I mention only for the sake of accuracy; but to which I am not disposed to object. Though I must at the same time declare, that if I think we might fairly acquiesce in this demand, it is by no means for those reasons which I have sometimes heard assigned. In the fulsome and dis-into the field.—See Dr. Croke's Reply to Schlegel, and the authorities there cited.

gusting cant of her false philosophy, France has lately declaimed against the whole practice of commissioning and arming privateers; but she has done so only whenever that practice appeared to offer more prospect of advantage to her enemies than to herself. In the contrary case, no power has ever pursued this system with greater eagerness.* The maxims of the British naval code do not depend on the fluctuating circumstances of occasional interest. They are fixed and permanent; drawn either from the immutable principles of natural law, or from the long-established usage of civilized societies. And whoever will turn from the fleeting dreams of modern speculation, to the immortal works of the great masters of this science, will easily convince himself that no practice can be more consonant to reason and justice than that of carrying on public war in some degree by individual exertions. Nor, although it be true that occasional irregularities may prevail, ought this country to renounce an important right merely because we hear some exaggerated statements of rapine and violence committed by those who exercise it. Such assertions are made with great facility, because it is almost always impossible to disprove them, unless the neutral would pursue his complaint in those courts which are constantly open for his redress. For myself, I must say, that what I have known of similar allegations which have sometimes been made against the conduct of his majesty's navy, and into which it has been my duty to inquire, does not dispose me to give unlimited credit to the assertions of this nature respecting privateers, made by persons who have often so strong an interest to conceal the disgraceful frauds of which they have themselves been guilty, and to deceive their own governments, as well as those of the powers at war.

I proceed, therefore, to consider the stipulations of this article, as they respect the future practice of the British navy in visiting and examining neutral vessels sailing under convoy. I have already stated, that the claim of the neutral league of 1800, confined this examination to a bare perusal of the papers of the neutral ships; which papers were for that purpose to be communicated to the belligerent by the neutral officer, on board his own vessel. Exactly the same proceeding has here been stipulated; and it is added in this treaty, as in the former, that if the papers so communicated shall be found to be regular, no farther search shall take place. An exception, however, is here subjoined, which constitutes the only practical difference on this subject between the two Conventions. It is not, as before, laid down absolutely, that no farther search shall in any case take place, but that none shall so take place, "unless some valid motive of suspicion shall exist." It would be injurious even to ask, whether, in concluding this treaty, its authors meant that it should be executed on the part of this country with justice, with liberality, and, above all, with that unblemished good faith which will, I trust, always continue to be the leading characteristic of British policy. It certainly was not the intention of his majesty's ministers to reserve to their country, under an ambiguous phrase, the power of eluding the whole object of the stipulation to which they have acceded. If, indeed, any such design could possibly have entered into their minds, which nothing but their own avowal will ever induce me to believe, it is manifest that in the present case the folly of such a purpose would, if possible, exceed its injustice. The only imaginable benefit which, in the most sanguine hopes of any man, Great Britain can ever derive from this treaty, is, that by a mutual good understanding, resulting from fair discussion and established by joint consent, we should prevent the future revival of claims which have always hitherto been urged against us in the periods of our greatest embarrassment and danger.

* By a declaration published in June 1780, the French government notified to its subjects its intention of granting honorary distinctions to the commanders and crews of privateers who might successfully annoy our trade. In the late war, the Directory, despairing of success in any farther naval operations, invited all the inhabitants of the maritime provinces of France to engage in privateers, and offered, for that purpose, to let to them for hire, all the ships of war which remained in their harbours after our victories.

What could be a more wretched policy than to hold in reserve for such periods a concealed and doubtful pretension, which now, in the security of victory and in the confidence of friendship, we have been afraid to avow? Your lordships, therefore, may well assure yourselves, that such is not the intention of the framers of this treaty. They certainly never will assert, either now, or at any future period, that right, from which we have agreed to abstain, except when some valid ground of suspicion shall exist, may still be indiscriminately exercised at our discretion, or continued as the established practice and daily usage of the British navy. It would neither be consistent with their own characters, nor (which is still more important) with the public faith, should they contend that mere individual caprice, that national misunderstandings, that a general disbelief of the good faith of neutrals, or even that a distrust applying to the particular case, but not founded on any special circumstances belonging to it, can furnish that valid ground of suspicion which this treaty has described. Such suspicion must evidently rest on some distinct and separate foundation; it must unquestionably be grounded on some fact, by which the ships to which it is applied can be very clearly distinguished from the common case of neutrals sailing under convoy. Unless this be true, the whole object of the stipulation is defeated, and every ship is liable to farther search. The exception which we have here inserted, manifestly admits the principle, while it limits the application of the rule to which it is subjoined. It recognises the validity of the claim, that, where the papers are regular, the ship itself shall not be visited; and it allows of such visitation only in the single case, where some valid ground of suspicion shall be found to exist.

It is necessary then to inquire what the cases are, in which alone, under the fair construction of this treaty, a British officer can now visit and examine a neutral ship, when sailing under convoy. As the practice has hitherto stood, the inquiry into the facts of the case preceded all conclusion to draw from them. Our officer first examined the papers of each ship, by going on board the ship itself to which they related. He compared them with the appearance of the ship, of its crew, and of its cargo. He questioned the crew. He judged on the spot respecting an infinite variety of small circumstances, which, taken together, might constitute a valid ground of suspicion. Even with all these advantages, the fraud often escaped his vigilance; and if, after the ship had thus been visited, every thing appeared to be regular, it was stipulated by our former treaties that no farther search should then take place. But the commanding officer decided for himself, upon the facts as they thus appeared to him; and if he saw, from this inquiry, a reasonable presumption of unlawful conduct, he detained the ship, and brought her in for farther search, well knowing that as often as he did so without sufficient cause, he was bound to satisfy all the costs and charges which he brought upon the neutral. In these cases, therefore, the suspicion arose from the search, and the detention of the ship was its just and natural effect. As the law will now stand, the suspicion must precede the inquiry; and it is expressly stipulated by another article of this treaty, that no detention can take place, unless the officer be already in possession of manifest and evident facts establishing the violation of neutrality.

There are very few cases likely to occur in practice, where any valid ground of suspicion respecting a neutral ship can bonâ fide exist before the search. Sometimes indeed, but by no means frequently, previous information has been received by the belligerent power of frauds applying to a particular ship before she sails. But in that case, the instructions given to our officers would naturally be, not that they should search, but that they should detain the vessel pointed out in such intelligence. Where this case does not exist, I ask how often it is likely that any valid ground of suspicion should really arise before the vessel has been visited? Can such suspicion exist in the mind of any man, unless it be excited by some circumstances, real or supposed, which have relation to the suspected object? And if not, let it then be considered what it is that a British officer can know, what it is that he can reasonably believe, or strongly suspect, with regard to a ship, the very name of which he never heard before, and which, when he goes on board the convoying frigate, is shown to him for the first time through a telescope, out of the distance of cannon shot? Her sails, her masts, the fashion of her rigging, and her hull, these it is possible he may distinguish. Will these inform him whether the property of the ship, or of all the goods, or of an part of them, be hostile or neutral? Whether the cargo be contraband or innocent? Of what nations the crew is composed, and in what proportions? Whether the object of the voyage be conformable to such special treaties as may apply to it, or whether it be consonant with the general law of nations? Can he even conjecture, at that distance, what concealed articles the ship may carry? What ostensible, and what real papers? What false passports; granted perhaps in blank in Europe, and filled up in the East Indies, with the name of any ship, whose owner is content to pay the regulated tariff of such frauds? * Will he, in such a situation, acquire the knowledge of those details with which the crew might be willing to supply him? Or, can he even satisfy his own judgment, whether the ship be sufficiently victualled and stored for the voyage which her papers indicate? Not one of all these! although these comprise all the principal grounds of suspicion which have hitherto led our officers to the detention of neutral vessels. Every one of these is now abandoned. Our officer knows nothing of the ship in question. He sees nothing of her, from which he can derive any information that could suggest suspicion; and he is permitted to receive no farther knowledge of her than what is supplied by a set of papers, which relate indeed, as he is told, to that particular ship, but which, if fraud be intended, may be kept in the cabin of a frigate for twenty years together, to be applied to every single vessel which may, during that period, claim the protection of convoy.

I see, my lords, now present, some of those noble persons, the memory of whose victories, obtained in support of their country's rights, will ever warm the hearts of Englishmen: whose splendid actions will live in our grateful remembrance, even although that fatal period should already have arrived when their effects must cease to operate: even although we should be found to have renounced, by these stipulations, the very claims which their exertions had established; and to have abdicated, at the same time, by a voluntary surrender to an inveterate enemy, that high pre-eminence of dignity and safety, in which it is their glory to have placed us, and which no human power but our own could ever have impaired. I should be happy to learn from them, or from any other man professionally conversant in such transactions, that any other effect can result from this article. I should be glad, indeed, to hear from the gallant officers of our navy, that, placed in such circumstances as I have stated, and confined within the limits which this treaty has prescribed, any one of them would consent to make himself responsible to his country for his success in detecting the frauds of neutrals. I will suppose that any number of ships, built and rigged in a neutral port, but being actually the property of France, manned with French sailors, laden with naval stores, consigned to the French government, and destined to the port of Brest, when under blockade, should, either by fraud, menace, or intrigue, obtain a neutral convoy. The masters of such vessels would of course hoist neutral colours; they would provide themselves, as usual, with false sets of neutral papers, disguising the property, cargoes, and destination of the ships; and those papers, if the fleet fell in with any of our cruisers, would be duly communicated to the British officer when he came on board the convoying frigate. The papers would then be verified; and, they being found in form, no search could take place, if there existed no valid motive for suspicion. I ask where any such motive can in this case be found? Are there any possible means by which the British officer is to become acquainted with any part of this complicated violation of all the principles which we claim to enforce? Without some previous knowledge of the facts, without some apparent circumstances to direct his judgment, can there arise in his mind any such valid ground of suspicion as would, in good faith, and under any fair construction of this article, justify his proceeding to visitation, or to search? The thing is manifestly impossible. No inquiry is to take place unless there be previous ground of suspicion, and no ground of suspicion can in this case possibly arise, unless there be previous inquiry. It is then but too manifest, that while we have in words established the right of visiting ships under neutral convoy, we have in fact so limited and circumscribed the practice, as utterly to renounce every beneficial purpose to which it ever could, by any possibility, be applied. It has often been asserted by this country, and I think it cannot be denied by any man who understands the subject, that the claim of exempting neutral merchant-ships from search, by placing them under neutral convoy, is inconsistent with the exercise of any part of the maritime law which has hitherto subsisted in Europe; and that if this claim be either recognised in principle, or admitted in practice, by Great Britain, she must thenceforth desist from every attempt to annoy the commerce of her enemies, or to intercept their supplies. If this be true, no farther argument can be wanting to satisfy your lordships how much it is to be desired that this great question should receive some more deliberate consideration than appears as yet to have been given to it.

It still remains, however, that I should request the attention of the House to one additional remark, which does indeed apply both to the whole of this treaty, as exhibiting a new code and system of maritime law, and also to every separate point on which I have hitherto observed: but the application of which to this particular article, of which I have last been speaking, seems to me to lead to consequences of the greatest importance. In every transaction, relating to subjects of this nature, but more especially in those in which we limit by new stipulations the exercise of our ancient rights, it ought to be the object of our particular attention to prevent, by the most explicit declarations, all possibility of converting our special engagements into general rules, applicable alike to all countries. But this point was obviously of peculiar importance at a moment when, as I have already observed, we are about to stand, with respect to so many great commercial states, on the footing of the general law of nations, not modified by any special contract. I know not by what fatality it has happened, that we have now done precisely the reverse of this. We have not even left it as a doubtful question, whether these stipulations shall extend to other countries. We have adopted, in this treaty, the very same clause which was inserted in the conventions of armed neutrality, expressly for the purpose of establishing the principles there promulgated, not only as a rule for all transactions between the contracting parties, but as a universal law, applicable to every civilized state. We have declared, that all the stipulations to which we have now acceded, "shall be regarded as permanent, and shall serve as a constant rule to the contracting powers, in matter of commerce and navigation." If any doubt could arise, as to the true meaning and extent of this declaration, that doubt would be at once removed by a reference to the conventions of 1780 and 1800, from which it has been almost literally transcribed. But, in truth, no other meaning can possibly be given to these words, but that which they have always hitherto been understood to bear; that of obliging the contracting parties to adopt these articles as their general rules of maritime law, to be observed indiscriminately towards all the world, except where they are superseded by the express conditions of any special engagement. No interpretation of less extensive operation could give to this clause a consistent meaning, or a rational object. Every treaty must of necessity bind the contracting parties in their transactions with each other, and it would be utterly absurd to have entered into a special stipulation solely for that purpose. Still more preposterous would it be to have chosen, with this view, the very words which Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, three out of four of the contracting parties, had recently used in so different a sense; and to have attempted to provide a security for Great Britain against the claims of other powers, by adopting an article, which has, for the last twenty years, been understood by her, and by all the rest of the world, as conveying that very meaning, which it was, above all others, her object to exclude.

If, therefore, there were no other reasons than that which is furnished by this single article, this alone would abundantly prove the indispensable necessity of proceeding, by farther negotiation, to explain the ambiguities, and to correct the errors, with which every part of this treaty unfortunately abounds. No man can seriously believe that any equitable proposal on this last point, any more than on those of which I have already spoken, if it were pressed with earnestness by the British government, could meet with real difficulty at Petersburg. What object can Russia have to limit or to proscribe the exercise of our ancient right of search? Why should she wish to prolong the animosities of the contest, when the passions which produced it have ceased to influence her councils? Will her commercial, or will her landed interests be promoted by undermining the resources of Great Britain? Will her naval strength be augmented by procuring for other nations the liberty of sheltering their illicit commerce, under the safeguard of a neutral convoy? Or is it consistent with the first principles of her policy, to break down the vigour of her natural ally, and to destroy the only hope of future resistance to the overbearing ambition of the French republic? No, my lords, she can have no such desire; and I am confident the noble lords themselves, the framers of this treaty, feel, in that respect, the most complete security. Satisfied by all our conduct, that we wish not by an abuse of victory to impose on her confederates injurious or humiliating conditions, Russia has, on the other hand, no inducement to concur with them in subverting, for the paltry profits of individual speculation, that ancient system of public law, which has for centuries subsisted in Europe: a system venerable for its antiquity, and respectable for its mildness, equity, and justice; but above all things, valuable to every established government, from the certainty and stability of its principles, by which it has fixed invariably the rights and duties of independent states; while the modern spirit of innovation, referring us continually for some more perfect rules of conduct, to the uncertain and visionary theories of the day, has produced a practice governed only by the shifting purposes of temporary convenience.

My lords, I will now detain your lordships no longer: I have faithfully discharged a duty which my country was entitled to demand from me. I should be sorry that my motives were misrepresented; I think they cannot be mistaken. At a moment of unusual difficulty, when we had been left once more to contend alone against an enemy, whose progress at that time threatened, and has now, I fear, destroyed the independence of Europe, we found ourselves suddenly attacked by a host of fresh enemies. Those powers, whose most obvious interest it was to encourage and to animate our resistance against the inordinate aggrandizement of France, adopted a conduct directly opposite. They seized the opportunity with eagerness, as one peculiarly favourable for extorting from us concessions destructive of our naval power; and they endeavoured to unstring the very nerves and sinews of our strength, at the precise moment when its exertions afforded the best hope of safety for themselves. In these circumstances it was the natural determination of a magnanimous and virtuous monarch to maintain, with unshaken constancy, the essential rights of his country, and to meet the difficulties of his situation with a firmness and energy, proportioned both to the magnitude of the public interests which were at stake, and to his own sense of the duty which he owed to his people. The wisdom of parliament, and the spirit of the nation, seconded this generous resolution; and by the blessing of Providence on so just a cause, the skill and enterprise of the British navy were crowned with brilliant and decisive victory.

It remained only that we should profit of our success in a manner corresponding with the principles on which it was obtained; not for the purposes of ambition or aggrandizement, but for those of justice and self-preservation. It was the reasonable expectation, I may add, it was the confident hope of every friend to the British interests, not in this country alone, but throughout all Europe, that we should avail ourselves of so favourable an occasion to establish, on a solid and immutable basis, those ancient rights which we have so long maintained, and for which an invincible necessity had driven us at last to contend in arms. Can it be matter of surprise to your lordships, that any subject of such a sovereign, that any citizen of the British empire, should feel, and should express an earnest and anxious wish, that a transaction so memorable for the dignity of its commencement, and for the glory of its progress, should, in its termination, be at least consistent with the honour and with the safety of his country? The anxiety which I have this day expressed on the subject of this treaty is not of recent date. It was, as must be well known to some of those who hear me, manifested long since, and in the very first moment in which I became acquainted with these stipulations. It is a desire not for public discussion, but for efficient and satisfactory amendment: a wish, not to censure or condemn, but to contribute, by such suggestions as experience or reflexion have produced, to remove the present disgrace, and to avert the future calamity which must otherwise, as I think, inevitably result from the inconsiderate precipitation of this transaction, and from the extreme inaccuracy which has been its natural consequence.

If indeed the discussion of this day had the most remote tendency to a revival of differences and animosities with Russia, I should most unwillingly have entered upon such a field. No event could, in my opinion, be more injurious to the only hope which can now remain of safety, either to this country or to Europe. By disunion in war, every effort has failed which has been made for self-defence by the continental powers. By distrust and jealousy in peace, all chance would be destroyed of possible resistance to the fresh encroachments which every day continues to produce. Yet even if this great evil were to be apprehended from this inquiry, the immediate and pressing importance of the object of this treaty might not improperly outweigh, in the minds of your lordships, all considerations of remote or contingent policy. Conciliation is indeed desirable; it is so always; and it is now indispensably necessary, as our last resource against certain and imminent danger. But to conciliate, by the surrender of just rights and of essential interests, to purchase present ease by the sacrifice of future strength, is a system which all experience, and all history have condemned; a system not less impolitic and ruinous in its effects than it is weak and disgraceful in its principle. But in the present case, one sentiment alone can prevail both in Great Britain and in Russia. The desire of every friend of peace, and every lover of justice, throughout the world, must be the same. All must concur in wishing that a precise and unequivocal arrangement on all the matters to which this treaty has relation, may confirm and strengthen the dispositions of friendship, between those to whom Europe still looks for its preservation, and may stifle the seeds of every possible difference which could either interrupt their present harmony, or embarrass their future exertions. By loose and uncertain stipulations on these important concerns, no interest is promoted, no right is asserted, no principle is finally established. From ambiguity and doubt, confusion and discord only can arise.

My lords, unless my judgment be blinded by my wishes, a moment more propitious than the present can never be expected, for such explanations as may still render this transaction adequate to the magnitude of the occasion, and to the importance of the interests concerned. The hope of convincing those with whom it rests, that this attempt must of necessity be made, and the earnest desire of contributing, by these suggestions, to its ultimate success, as they have been the only inducement to myself, so I am confident they will be the best excuse which I can offer to your lordships, for the trouble which I have now presumed to give you.

The Lord Chancellor began by observing, that in the opinion which he meant to give on the present subject, he must request their lordships to be on their guard against what he should say, as he had been a party to the present transaction; had given his advice as to its adoption, and therefore must be interested in supporting it. He must tell the noble lord, that the words of the treaty did not bear the interpretation which he put upon them. The rights for which this country contended were now completely admitted; and what stamped an inestimable value on the present treaty, and made it the most valuable ever entered into, was, that even the violation of it on our part could not be resisted by violence on the part of the neutrals, but the matter was to be peaceably settled before the competent tribunals of the country. Having been personally called upon by the noble lord to say, whether, in his judicial character, leaving out all idea of his political functions, he would give to the article respecting the carriage of the colonial produce of an enemy by a neutral ship, the construction of the noble lord, he must say, that the call was not quite consistent with the noble lord's usual circumspection; since he must recollect that he might feel himself personally responsible for the construction, as having assisted in forming the paper, and that therefore he could not totally divest himself of his political character; but if it were possible for him to do so, he would not hesitate to say, that he should not agree with the noble lord in the construction that he had put upon the clause. More he could not say, as perhaps in the final adjustment of this and other points with the Northern powers some modification might take place. The learned lord went through the several points of the treaty, and contended, that the settlement had been made on a liberal basis, which showed to the world that Great Britain was not intolerant in her power, and that she did not wish to stand upon trivial points and nice distinctions. The nation had gained the great objects for which they contended, viz. that free bottoms did not make free goods; that ships of war had the right of search; that the blockade of ports should be recognised as legitimate; that the exercise of these rights should be regulated upon clear, intelligible, and liberal rules; and, what was of more consequence than all, that any casual violation of them should not be a cause of quarrel, but should be the subject of amicable adjustment. These were the heads of the treaty, and as to slight objections, from the wording of particular clauses, he must think that they were not to interpret this paper as they would an indictment. When the noble lord said that he objected to particular expressions because they were taken from the convention of the neutral powers, with some variation, he must answer, that he liked them the better for being so taken. The variation showed that we did not recognise the doctrine as there assumed. Thus, in regard to the words, "free navigation to the ports and upon the coasts," it was manifest that we did not mean that they should enjoy free navigation to and from the ports of an enemy. And in the same way, the "or" in the article recognising the right of blockading ports, was all that we could desire, since it established the doctrine, that if our squadron was stationary off a port, or sufficiently near to make an evident danger of entering, such port was to be considered in a state of blockade. The introductory part of the treaty was like the preamble of a bill—it explained the necessity for the act, and showed the spirit in which it was made. In the first place, the neutral power could not set up any such pretension as that of carrying on the coasting trade in time of war. The words of the treaty were "that the neutral ships should be at liberty to navigate from the ports and the coasts of the nations at war;" and the clear understanding between the parties on this point was, that when a Russian ship should happen to take in a cargo, part of which was to be delivered at one port in the enemy's country, and part in another port, such ship should be at liberty to put in at the several ports where she was to deliver the several parts of her cargo. But if at any of those places it should appear that she took in any part of the enemy's property, for the purpose of conveying it to other ports, if, in short, she should attempt to carry on a coasting trade for the enemy, then the cargo would be liable to search and confiscation.

He desired noble lords to look at some of the late treaties entered into between this country and France, and there they would find the same principle laid down. No doubt, therefore, could exist as to the clear understanding between the parties on this subject; and the sense of it must be explained by the official documents that existed between both countries. The next point alluded to by the noble lord was, that of stating that the neutral power could by the treaty carry on the colonial trade of the enemy. Were he to decide judicially on this part of the treaty, he would put a construction upon it very different from that of the noble lord. He would just ask, whether, if it had been intended to give up a right of such essential value as the one in question, some notice would not have been taken of it in the treaty? He had no doubt but the clear understanding was, that the right should not be given up; and a farther explanation might still be had on the subject. During the late war, the persons who at one time governed France had maintained a monstrous and unjust proposition, which showed how far the country at that time departed from those usages which before had been sacredly observed by nations. They pretended they had a right to confiscate all the goods belonging to neutral countries, because they had been originally the produce of Great Britain; and the only pretence they had for doing so was, that of their being British property. The principle acted upon in the present treaty was quite different. The words declared, "that this country would not consider as enemy's property such goods as having formerly belonged to the enemy, had since been acquired by neutral nations." It was impossible therefore to suppose, that because we were not to prevent neutral nations from acquiring the colonial produce of the enemy, we were to enable them to carry on their colonial trade. On the subject of contraband trade, the feelings of the noble lord had led him to put an interpretation on the words of the treaty which they did not bear. If any other treaty had been examined with the same acumen and the same exactness, it would be found liable to objections still more numerous than were now urged. In putting a construction on a treaty, the intention of the parties must be looked to; and that formed the true interpretation of it. The noble lord had observed, that this treaty would be laying the foundation for a contraband trade, which all other neutral nations would think they had a right to carry on. But the noble lord ought to have known that this was only a specific treaty with one nation, which could not bind any other power, and had nothing to do with any treaty that might be entered into with Denmark or Sweden; and which could never hereafter give either Holland or America the right of carrying on a contraband trade. The treaty was confined to Russia alone; and we had no quarrel, nor were we at war with Russia. There was here a complete renunciation of the coasting trade: there was a clear, unequivocal admission of the right of search; and he would ask, on the whole, if the country had not established the right for which she had contended? With regard to the right of search, he must say, he wished he could see that right exercised by privateers as well as by king's ships, as these vessels formed a great part of the naval power of the country; and rejecting that false philanthropy by which the practice of privateering had been condemned in France, he would regard it as most essential to the interests of this country. As, however, the right of search by privateers might be resisted, and could not be exercised in some instances without a declaration of war on one side or the other, he thought it better to give it up altogether. The objection made by the noble lord as to the right of search on the part of Great Britain, applied not to the right itself, but to an undue detention after the search was made. The captain of the belligerent power would have the right to go on board the ship that guarded the convoy. If, then, he had no motive for suspicion, he might go away without making any search. But if he had a sufficient motive, he was not bound to declare what it was, but might proceed to his search. If, after the search, it appeared that there had been no justifiable motive for detention of the vessel, then he was responsible to no power for what he had done except his own country. He contended, that notwithstanding what the noble lord had said, a search might still be made; and that there would be as little danger of neutral vessels containing contraband goods now as formerly. From the nature of the thing itself, the ground of suspicion must depend on the discretion of the officer; and he was to determine from other circumstances, besides the examinations of papers, whether he had not a good cause to make a search. Upon the whole, therefore, it appeared to him that the question in the present case was, whether any treaty could be less objectionable than the present? He was convinced in his own mind that it was a treaty of considerable merit, and tended to secure to this country some of her best and most essential interests.

Lord Holland said, he certainly should vote for the address, but not upon any of the reasons assigned by the mover and seconder. He agreed with a great deal of what had fallen from the noble lord, who had so accurately divided the rights claimed by this country as her undoubted maritime rights, under five distinct heads. He owned that he did not consider those rights entitled to all the stress and importance which the noble lord had imputed to them; at least, he must strongly object to the manner and the moment in which they had been insisted upon, as he did not think it was any justification of the late war with the Northern powers on our part, to allege that we went to war merely to insist on some of the principles comprehended in those rights. The late ministers, he thought, had much to answer for, in having idly wasted the blood and treasure of the country in a war with the Northern powers, merely to maintain a speculative point. At the same time he declared, that the learned lord on the woolsack had not satisfied him that those rights had been effectually secured by the present convention. With regard to the concessions that had been made in the convention, upon the manner of enforcing the observance of those rights, he highly approved of them, and should vote for the address, because he considered these concessions as likely to tend to the conservation of the peace. Having touched cursorily upon each of the five heads stated by lord Grenville, he spoke of the former treaties that existed between Sweden and Denmark and this country, and read several clauses of the two last treaties in respect to what was deemed contraband in those treaties. He read an extract also of a letter from Pensionary De Witt, dated 1654, upon the subject of commerce, and the carrying trade, as they were affected by them. After reasoning shortly upon these points, his lordship said, that upon the whole he approved of the convention, and thought it held out enough to bear out the assertion in the latter part of the address; but that he still thought, that further explanations of the articles of the convention were necessary.

Lord Mulgrave said, he approved of the address, but could not agree in the ground his learned friend had taken to defend all the articles of the convention, and to exult over it as the most advantageous convention that this country had ever made. He said, it often happened, in the joy of the moment, on a sudden obtainment of peace, after an expensive and bloody war, that through inadvertency omissions escaped unobserved in a treaty, that led to future altercation and war. Thus he could, he thought, trace the commencement of the armed neutrality of 1780 so far back as a century and a half ago. At the end of the war in the middle of the seventeenth century, in a treaty with Holland, an unguarded relaxation of our maritime right gave the Dutch the power of carrying the goods of belligerent powers under their flag, both coastwise and from the French colonies to France, and that continued for a considerable time. Upon that very point it was that the armed neutrality of 1780 was founded; and he feared that, through not expressly prohibiting the carrying of naval stores, as contraband of war in the present convention, it might hereafter be taken an undue advantage of by neutral powers during some future war. He however regarded the convention as having secured several of our essential maritime rights. It put an end to the principle, that free ships made free goods; it established the right of search, and it ascertained that a cruising fleet destined to blockade a port was a blockade. With regard to the restricting the right of search of ships under convoy of a neutral flag to our ships of war, and not suffering such right of search to be exercised by privateers, he highly approved of that prohibition. Privateers in all former wars, had been in some instances guilty of cruelty, of plunder, and of various abuses of the right of search: whereas, in the last war, he defied any man to state an instance in which the officers of the navy had not acted in the exercise of the right of search with great caution. He said, it was clear that privateers had at an early period abused their powers, since in the middle of the seventeenth century they were compelled to give security for their good conduct in a bond of 1,500*l.* if they carried 300 men, and in a bond of 3,000*l.* if they carried a greater number of hands. He entertained great doubts, whether it would not add to our naval strength, and assist commerce during a war, if privateers were abolished altogether. They took men from the navy, encouraged deserters, raised the price of seamen's wages in the merchants service, and checked the ardour of those who would, but for privateers, have entered voluntarily into the navy. He could not agree with his learned friend that this was the best convention this country had ever entered into; yet, as his learned friend was satisfied that the construction was favourable to the rights claimed under the law of nations by this country, he would vote for the address.

Lord Nelson rose to say a word or two upon the convention, which he highly approved. It had put an end to the principle endeavoured to be enforced by the armed neutrality in 1780, and by the late combination of the northern powers, that free ships made free goods—a proposition so monstrous in itself, so contrary to the law of nations, and so injurious to the maritime rights of this country, that, if it had been persisted in, we ought not to have concluded the war with those powers while a single man, a single shilling, or even a single drop of blood remained in the country. That abominable proposition was now set at rest, and abandoned by Russia. The rashness and violence of the emperor Paul had formed the confederacy against us to support and enforce that proposition; but the good sense, moderation and temper of his successor, the present emperor, had consented to give it up and renounce it. By the convention, military stores had been stated as the only contraband of war stipulated with Russia to be considered as such, and much had been said in the course of the debate about naval stores, which were not stipulated to be deemed contraband, because Russia had neither produce of naval stores, nor shipping enough to have freighted them for France. He almost wished she had possessed both during the latter years of the war; because, in that case, France would have been enabled to send their fleets out of port, which we should have fought, and the war in all probability would have been much sooner at an end. But, certainly, to allow other neutral countries, and those maritime states, to carry naval stores to the ports of the enemy, might prove highly injurious to us, by furnishing those at war with us with the means of strengthening their marine. He approved of the article restricting the right of search of ships under the convoy of a neutral flag ship of war to our navy only during hostilities; and stated what would have been his own conduct if he had met with such convoy, declaring that he should have endeavoured to discharge his duty with all possible civility to the captain of the neutral frigate, should have inspected his papers, and if, from the information of any seaman, he was led to entertain a suspicion that the papers were fraudulent or fabricated, and that the convoy did contain what was contraband or illicit, he should in that case have insisted on a search; and if he found any contraband articles on board, he should have detained such ship or ships.

The Address was then agreed to.

Debate in the Commons on the Convention with Russia.] Nov. 13. On the order of the day being read, for taking into consideration the Convention with Russia, earl Temple wished to know if the accession of the courts of Denmark and Sweden to the treaty had been received? Lord Hawkesbury said, the formal accession of those powers to the treaty had not been received; but that the Danish and Swedish ambassadors had signified the readiness of their respective courts to accede to the convention.

Lord Francis Osborne then rose to move an address to his majesty, and prefaced his motion with a few observations, in which he briefly recapitulated, the different articles of the convention, and remarked, that the stipulations contained in each were calculated to terminate the dispute in a manner perfectly consistent with the honour and the interests of this country. The relations that we had always maintained with neutral powers were re-established by this treaty, and there was no longer any danger of their becoming the subject of dispute. We were placed on the same footing that we had always stood with respect to Russia, Denmark, and Sweden, and our just maritime rights were amply secured. His lordship concluded by moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to return his majesty the thanks of this House for having been graciously pleased to communicate to them the convention entered into by his majesty and the emperor of Russia, to which the kings of Denmark and Sweden have declared their readiness to accede: to express our grateful sense of the happy issue of his majesty's exertions in support of the maritime interests of this kingdom, by which the essential rights for which we have contended are effectually secured, and provision made, that the exercise of them should be attended with as little molestation as possible to the navigation and commerce of the contracting powers."

Mr. Ryder concurred most heartily in the sentiments of the Address. The subject was not new to the House, for it was one with respect to which every member was called upon to make up his mind at the end of the last session. The House then gave a just support to our maritime rights, and to the energy at that time displayed by the House and by government, the country was indebted for the advantageous situation in which we were now placed with regard to the neutral powers. To form a proper opinion of the merits of the present treaty, it was necessary to consider what was the nature of the new questions agitated, and the pretensions set up by the confederacy. It was not necessary for him to remind the House of the alarm which the convention of the northern powers created. A new description of blockade was laid down: it was pretended, that neutral flags should make free goods; and that they should bear freely the property of one belligerent power, without being liable to interruption from another. But that which was the most dangerous feature of the whole was, the principle on which that treaty affected to be founded: by this principle it was boldly assumed, that a few states had the right to legislate for the rest of Europe. This pretension, under which the three northern powers wished to reserve to themselves the right of violating treaties that they had formerly entered into with this country, and of protecting the like violations in others, was completely done away by the present treaty. And here he could not help stating his approbation of the conduct that ministers had followed in the negotiations which had terminated this dispute. They had acted with a firmness and moderation which could not be too highly praised. The victory at Copenhagen, and the abandonment of the confederacy by the emperor of Russia, were sufficient proofs of the energy and diplomatic skill of those in whose hands the affairs of the country were trusted. Of their moderation, the treaty on the table afforded the most ample evidence; and when the House had considered it, he was confident they would not like it the worse, that it was entirely confined to the settling of the pretensions set up in the convention of the confederacy, and did not attempt to decide many points which might have been adverted to, but which that convention did not bring into question. Looking at the treaty, he must observe, that it was not to be considered as forming a new law of nations, but as terminating a dispute, by a return to old and established principles. If it should be found that all our just rights were fully maintained by the present treaty, and that every thing essential was secured to us, the House would doubtless testify their approbation of the measure, by unanimously voting for the address. He was also confident that the House would not be the less satisfied with the treaty, if they should find that it gave up any part of claims which were evidently useless, and tended only to irritate other powers. Such a concession he conceived to be consistent with the dignity and moderation which had always characterized the councils of this country. In order to show the advantages of the present treaty, he should briefly contrast its principal stipulations with those of the convention entered into by the three northern powers. The third article, it would be observed, determined what was to be considered a blockaded port; what articles were contraband of war; and it regulated the trade of neutrals on the coasts of belligerent powers. These were three of the most important articles in dispute. The convention of the northern powers in 1800, in stipulating that neutral bottoms, should make free goods, assumed the right of setting aside all the existing treaties of commerce between this country and those powers. But the present convention with Russia brought things back to their former state, and fixed, as contraband of war, those articles which were so considered by the treaty of commerce concluded between the two crowns in 1797. The second article of the convention of 1800, gives a right to the ships of neutral powers to trade freely to and from the ports of powers at war. The convention on the table, however, made an important alteration in that respect. The ports sailed from are omitted, and permission is only given to neutral ships to the ports upon the coasts of the nations at war. They are therefore deprived of the means of carrying on the trade of the enemy, while every opportunity is given them of fairly conducting their own. The third article of the convention of 1800 stipulated, that the effects of neutral states should be freely navigated, and that the neutral flag should be considered complete evidence of the effects being the property of subjects of those powers. This the House would recollect formed the foundation of the armed neutrality of 1780. But this claim was completely renounced by the present treaty. The next article he should notice was that which related to ports in a state of blockade. According to the convention of 1800, it was requisite, in order to constitute a blockaded port, that there should be a line of ships stationed in the front of the harbour, disposed in a manner somewhat similar to the investment of a fort by troops. This article, which was directed against our naval superiority, was completely disclaimed by the present treaty. A blockaded port was now characterized to be that in which the disposition of the ships of the attacking power produce an evident danger of entering. The treaty on the table, however, stipulated no particular mode of investment, nor determined any number of blockading ships. The last article to which he should call the attention of the House was one of great importance. It would be observed, that this article, in the convention of 1800, was carried to an extent far beyond what was given to it by the treaty of 1780, though that was professed to be the basis of the convention. That article stipulated, that the declaration of the officer commanding a neutral squadron should be considered sufficient evidence that there was no contraband merchandise or enemy's property on board his convoy. On the contrary, the corresponding article in the present treaty rendered such a declaration insufficient, and the right of search was preserved to our ships of war, in all cases where there shall appear a just cause to exert it. As it was the object of the right of search to guard against unfair practices of the subjects of neutral powers, no alteration could be admitted with respect to it, and, accordingly, no modification of the principles appeared in the present treaty. It was, indeed, so regulated, as to render the exercise of the right more practicable; but nothing was granted that could tend to diminish our security, or compromise our honour. He trusted, therefore, that the treaty would not only put an end to the dispute at present, but prevent the tranquillity of Europe from being ever again disturbed by it. He congratulated the House and the country, that the advice given by some gentlemen at the close of the last session had not been followed. It was fortunate that administration had neither listened to those who expressed doubts of our rights, nor those who thought that the question ought to be left undecided, as in 1780. He rejoiced that our temporising conduct at that period had not been followed on the present occasion. It was to that unfortunate disposition that the late pretensions of the neutral powers were to be ascribed. From every view of the subject that he had taken, it appeared to him impossible that there could be any opposition to the address.

Mr. Grey said:—I rejoice, Sir, most sincerely, that the convention has taken place, and I am little disposed to examine its terms critically. The hon. gentleman congratulates the House, that they did not follow the advice of those who expressed doubts of our rights, nor of those who thought they had too much sense to doubt of those rights. Yet thought that the question should not be tried. I am sure, Sir, that on the present occasion I have no reason to regret the opinion I then gave; and if the House compared what might have been lost by the convention, with what has been gained by it, they will not find much reason to rejoice that my advice was not followed. I must, however again state, that I most sincerely rejoice in the present convention; for, had it not been concluded, I am convinced that we should have had no peace with the French republic. I consider it merely in the light of a judicious compromise; for I cannot agree that the dispute is settled. We are called upon to thank his majesty for concluding this treaty with Russia, but there is no absolute certainty that Denmark and Sweden are willing to accede to it. Notwithstanding what has been said, I do not think this convention has done away all possibility of dispute. The noble lord who moved the address, and the hon. gentleman who seconded him, adopted a singular method of proving their assertions in this respect. They went over each article of the treaty; and said, this has left us just as we were; that just places things as they were before.

Now it appears to me rather a singular mode of putting an end to a dispute, to leave it just as it was found. It reminds me of a dying gentleman, who, when making his will, remarked that he was leaving a fine occasion for a law-suit. But it is supposed that no dispute may arise upon the construction of this treaty with Denmark and Sweden. The latter country never considered naval stores to be contraband of war, in consequence of the treaty with this country; and I have no hesitation in stating it as my opinion, that, upon the fair construction of that treaty, naval stores are not contraband. As a proof that the court of Sweden considers that treaty in the same light, they expressly claimed the right of carrying naval stores under it. With respect to the question of free bottoms making free goods, I shall not examine whether more is not lost than gained on that point. The hon. gentleman seems to think that we have gained a great deal by the definition of a blockaded port. I should rather be inclined to believe that we had adopted the definition of the neutral powers, than insisted upon one of our own. This description of a blockade is certainly by no means that which we insisted upon in the course of the war, when the coast of Holland was blockaded by ships lying in Yarmouth roads. I am as little inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman in his opinion respecting the coasting trade. The leaving out the words, "from port to port," is of no great importance. It appears that though neutral ships may not carry the property of the enemy from port to port, they may carry it when it becomes their own by purchase. How is this purchase to be ascertained? With regard to naval stores, the case is not better than before. The French, it is true, cannot bring naval stores from Petersburg; but the subjects of neutral powers may ship them on their own account, and send them to France. As to the right of search, I approve very much of the regulations which the treaty contains with respect to it. It is proper that those causes of irritation, of which neutral powers had so much reason to complain, should be completely done away.

Earl Temple said, it would be in the recollection of the House, that there were five points in dispute with the neutral powers. The first related to the colonial and coasting trade; the second, to the right of search; the third, the blockade of an enemy's port; the fourth, whether free ships made free goods; and the fifth, what constitutes contraband of war. In spite of the ingenious speeches that had been made, he could not consider either of these points to be settled by the present convention. The coasting trade he conceived to be completely given up to the neutral powers—the right of blockade so modified as to be of very little advantage—the right of search by no means secured. He approved, however, of that stipulation which took it from privateers; for he was so much an enemy to that species of warfare, that he was glad to see any measure adopted for discouraging it. The examination of papers could not afford sufficient evidence of the property on board neutral ships. It was very easy for these ships to be provided with papers which might appear perfectly fair and regular; and yet if an officer commanding one of his majesty's squadrons found them so, his hands were tied up, and he could not proceed to search a neutral convoy. The character of a blockaded port, as given in the convention, must render all attempts to blockade an enemy's port completely abortive. If our squadrons were driven off a coast by a squall of wind, though still within sight of it, neutral vessels would be at liberty to enter. The specification of articles contraband of war he regarded as improper, in omitting many naval stores which it had always been the policy of this country to regard as contraband. He was not one of those who had doubts with respect to our maritime rights. He wished the question to be decided, but hoped for a decision of a different nature. His opinion was conformable to that of an hon. gentleman whom he was sorry not to see in his place, and who declared that those rights ought only to be abandoned with our existence. The House would recollect that he had compared them to the national flag, which ought to be nailed to the mast, and with which we ought to sink or swim. Alas! that flag was now struck! Notwithstanding the objections he had to the convention, he should not oppose the address.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that from the turn the debate had taken, he should not find it necessary to trouble the House at any length; he should not do his duty, however, if he did not shortly state the grounds on which he differed from the hon. gentleman and from the noble lord, and on which he considered that the treaty deserved a vote of approbation. The hon. gentleman had thought it irregular not to wait till information had been officially received of the accession of Denmark and Sweden. That they were ready to accede did not rest only upon his (the noble secretary's) authority. This had been expressly declared by his majesty in his speech from the throne. Besides the House was called upon now to consider merely the convention with Russia, and if there should be any thing objectionable in the treaty concluded with Denmark and Sweden, there would still be room for censure and condemnation. After repeating the assertions of the two last speakers, the noble lord denied that this was a compromise, as stated by the hon. gentleman, or that we had given up what we had been contending for, as stated by the noble lord. We had maintained in full force our maritime rights, as far as it was our interest, and even as far as it ought to be our desire. We had gained all we were entitled to demand, and all it was our wish to procure. The treaty was at once just and expedient, equitable and wise. Some asked, what did the treaty give us which we had not before? We had not entered the contest to expect any new advantage, but to preserve our ancient and incontestible rights; if these were preserved, the object of our endeavours had been fully attained. The hon. gentleman, in complaining that we stood exactly where we were before we engaged in the struggle, did not take a just view of the state of the question. The powers of the North had confederated to dictate a new code of maritime law to Europe. We went to war to dissolve this confederacy, and to defeat its purposes. What the House therefore had now to determine was, whether this confederacy had been dissolved, and whether we had asserted our ancient rights. The importance of these rights it was unnecessary for him now to dwell upon. There was not, he believed, a man in the country who would not allow that it could not be over-stated. There was one point of view, however, in which he thought it had not been sufficiently considered. To her maritime greatness this country owed her happy issue from the late awful struggle in which she was engaged, and to the maritime greatness of England the continent of Europe owed whatever it retained of independence. This power had reached its present stupendous pitch from a system of policy begun in the earliest times of our history, and brought to perfection in the time of the commonwealth by the enactment of the navigation laws. The principle then established was, to limit the commerce of Great Britain to her navigation, wherever the two clashed to prefer navigation and to sacrifice commerce. The trade of Britain was thus all confined to British ships, and this regulation was extended even to the time of war, with one single qualification, that a larger proportion of foreign seamen was then allowed. The consequence of those salutary laws was, that, upon the principles laid down by the confederacy, we had nothing to gain, but every thing to lose. We allowed no neutral navigation, and the more it was freed from restrictions, we suffered the more. France, on the other hand, had long found her navigation too small for her commerce. In peace she merely laid a small tonnage upon foreign shipping entering her ports, and in time of war she gave it every possible encouragement. Her system then was, to throw her commerce into the hands of neutrals, that she might add to the strength of her military marine. Thus the principles we contended for were not only abstractedly right, as between all countries, but of the most essential consequence to us in our individual circumstances. Yet, he would fairly allow, that he thought we should make the exercise of these rights as little vexatious as possible. It was wise not to push them too far; by seeming to recede, we might prop them more effectually. He had read almost every thing that had been written in defence of the claims of neutrals, and he had never found any reasoning to show that they had right upon their side. However, one strong argument was drawn from convenience. It was said that our principle, though just, was liable to abuse, and that theirs, though erroneous, might, in practice, be found less inconvenient. With a view to the preservation of our privileges (a thing he considered of the first importance) that foundation on which this argument against them rests should be for ever taken away. His lordship then made some observations, and quoted a passage from the treaty itself to prove that it was by no means meant as a new code of maritime law, but merely as a settlement of certain differences that had arisen between this country and three powers in the north of Europe. He went on to say that, in his view of the subject, there were in dispute four essential points, and one or two collateral: 1st, the right to seize enemy's property in neutral ships; 2nd, the affair of contraband; 3rd, the right to search vessels under convoy; and 4th, the right of blockade. A fifth and sixth might be considered, the colonial and coasting trade, or they might be considered together, and called a fifth. Of these we had gained all that were essential, and our concessions in the others would be attended with no disadvantage. The maxim of "free bottoms free goods," was abandoned in the most unqualified manner, and enemies' property was declared seizable wherever it was to be found. Those who were dissatisfied because there was no new regulation with regard to contraband of war, ought to recollect that it was not our object to annul existing treaties. Even the armed neutrality had only made an enumeration of articles which was to apply to nations between whom no treaty existed. This treaty was not general, and by no means established the point that naval stores should not be reckoned contraband between others than the contracting parties. The advantage of the concession to Russia was as trifling. In the course of a season she did not send twelve ships without the Sound. He declared himself to be of opinion that, by our treaty with Sweden, naval stores were to be considered as contraband. All contraband was expressly excluded, and the list in which naval stores did not appear, was introduced by an ac specialiter. The right of search, he considered the most important of all; without it, the recognition of all the rest was of little value. Here a concession had been made, but he was free to declare that it had been voluntarily offered by the British government, on condition that the northern powers would recede from their inadmissible pretensions. He did not, however, join in the vulgar clamour against privateering, and it would be found that privateers would suffer very little by this abridgment of their rights, as the regulation extended only to ships under convoy. The noble lord who spoke last, in what he said concerning the manner of searching, had fallen into a great error concerning the law of nations. Where there was no ground of suspicion, there was no right to search, and the captain exercised this right always at his own risk. That there was nothing new in the language used in this convention, he proved, from the treaties with Denmark and Sweden, concluded in the middle of the seventeenth century. It was only just ground of suspicion that authorised the searching of single ships, and with regard to ships under convoy, we had always the additional security of knowing when they were assembling, of being able to form conjectures as to their cargo and destination, and of having it in our power to watch them during the whole course of their voyage. It had been asked, who was to be the judge of the suspicion? Ex vi termini, he who feels it. Gentlemen were apt to confound suspicion and proof. The same course would now be pursued with convoys as formerly with single ships. The words had existed above a century and a half, and in their interpretation would not now undergo any change. The present definition of blockade went as far as any esteemed writer on the law of nations had ever extended it. Upon this point, opinions had been in the extreme. While some contended that the power possessing a naval superiority has a right to declare any port whatever in a state of blockade, without sending a ship of war near it; others were of opinion, that a port ceased to be in a state of blockade, as soon as the blockading fleet, from whatever cause, left it open to neutral navigation. This treaty held a due medium between these two opposite doctrines. Considering that the liability of a blockading fleet to be blown off the port by stormy weather, constitutes the only difference between a blockade by sea and a blockade by land, the treaty declared that a port should then be considered in a state of blockade when there was a fleet assigned to blockade it. Thus these four most essential points, which had all been disputed, were all abandoned to us. We have a right to seize enemies' property wherever met with on the seas; we have a right to consider every thing as contraband of war with which our enemies could be supplied to our annoyance; we have a right to search both individual ships and fleets under convoy wherever there is the least ground of suspicion; we have a right to blockade, not only with stationary, but with cruising squadrons, and all these are publicly acknowledged by those powers whose interest it is to dispute them.—The remaining points he considered as collateral, and for this reason, that the four former depend upon the law of nations, but the colonial and coasting trade are not to be considered per se, but to be regulated by particular treaties. If a nation allowed another to trade to its colonies in time of peace, there was no doubt that its colonial trade might be carried on by that nation in time of war. Those who said we had here granted neutrals all they demanded, he referred to the treaty of armed neutrality itself. It was there said, they should be at liberty to sail from port to port on the coast of the belligerent, but in this convention the words were "sail to the ports and on the coast." Was nothing intended by this alteration? He denied that neutrals would be at liberty, under these words, to commence a voyage from the ports of a power at war. The coasting trade was illegal in time of war, only because it was prohibited in time of peace. He was told that Holland laid no restrictions upon this trade whatever; therefore in her case we could not suffer by this article, whatever construction was put upon it. The colony trade he considered to be in no way affected by these regulations, but to remain on its ancient footing. It never entered into the consideration of the armed neutrality; and this treaty merely settled the disputes occasioned by their unwarrantable claims. However, as some doubts had arisen, and as it was most desirable that every ground of future disagreement should be obviated, an explanation upon this point had been requested from the court of Russia. It was not in his power officially to state the result of this explanation, but this he could state, that when produced it would be found highly satisfactory. The colony trade was expressly disallowed, with this trifling qualification, that whatever relaxation had been made during this war, should be continued in future to the contracting powers.—No ship was now to be considered to belong to that power whose flag it bore, unless the captain and one-half of the mariners were natives of the country. Those who knew how neutral colours had been abused in the two last wars, would not consider this regulation of small importance to us. It was said that the treaty was ambiguous; but what treaty was ever framed which did not leave room for the cavelling of the discontented? As to the question, whether more could have been gained, he trusted that ministers would receive credit for having used their utmost endeavours to promote the interests of their country. But in this case, if no more was gained, it was because no more was wished. The treaty did enough; it contained an ample recognition of all that was essential to us as the first maritime power on the globe. He knew there were some who saw no policy but in violence. For his part, if he could obtain what he considered substantial justice, he not only would let off his enemy without blows, but would help him to escape. We had gained by this treaty all that justice, all that policy required; and he did not see where would have been the dignity in pressing severely upon states, because, when compared with us, they were weak and feeble. A petty concession was not to be compared with the rancour and ill-will produced in extorting it. When the northern powers were confederated against us, and threatened to enforce their pretensions with the sword, we showed true magnanimity in using force to chastise their temerity; but we showed equal magnanimity in seizing upon the first symptoms of returning moderation to bring about an amicable arrangement. We thus proved that we would neither recede from our rights, nor push the exercise of them beyond the bounds of reason and justice. On these principles the treaty was founded, and on these principles he asked for it the approbation of the House.

Dr. Laurence said, it was argued, that we had established the right of preventing free ships from making free goods; yet that right had been previously acknowledged, and it was matter of fact, that the northern powers never seriously wished to contend with us for it. They had merely set up a plea against it, with a view of converting their opposition to advantage in other points. They had contended against our right in that instance, with a view of withdrawing their pretensions, in order to induce us to make concessions of importance in other respects. As to the right of search, it had never been disputed, when the circumstances of public affairs rendered the attempts of the northern powers more likely to succeed; when our ships were doubled in number by those of the enemy, and when our fleet was driven up the Channel by a very superior force. Yet, placed as the country was, in that alarming situation, no attempt had been made to deprive us of the right of search. When he considered the article respecting the contraband trade in time of war, it did not appear to him, that any thing of moment had been gained by the convention. Whatever might be the terms in which the act of accession on the part of Denmark and Sweden might be notified, he trusted that the policy of this country would not treat the weak powers with severity. In considering the definition given by the learned gentleman, of the state of the blockade, he could not help observing, that it was rather a dangerous experiment. It had been changed six or seven different times. At one time, to constitute a state of blockade, it was necessary that the ships should be stationary; at another, it was required that they should be sufficiently near to the port to render the approach to it dangerous. Blockades could not be justly defined; for there was no certain standard, no precise rule, no traces of them in the admiralty laws. They had been indeed assimilated to sieges by land. Whenever the declaration of a state of blockade was announced, all vessels which endeavoured to enter the harbour, became from that moment liable to be seized; yet if the blockade was not actually kept up, that circumstance would give rise to strange contradictions in the jurisdiction of the country. He should also remark, that no specific time was settled, with regard to the determination of the blockade. A case in point had fallen within his own knowledge. On the 18th of April, the squadron which kept a port in a state of blockade, sailed from its situation, and on the 19th, after twenty-four hours sail from the place, the vessel to which he alluded was taken, and treated as if the port had been in actual blockade; yet who could undertake to say, that there existed at that moment evident danger in attempting to enter the harbour? No man would venture to assert, that such a case fell within the definition given by the learned gentleman. The right of convoy was consequently a consideration of the highest importance, and should never be enforced but in cases of great necessity. The treaty was, in that respect, drawn up with as much care as could be well expected; yet there might be a discretion in government to go farther. Under every impression of the treaty, he insisted that he would not have built it upon the basis of the armed neutrality; he would not have constructed this vessel upon that keel. Instead of weakening the power and influence of Russia, it tended to increase and strengthen them; for the emperor of Russia was left to negotiate for the two other states. It was full of discord, and liable to much difference of explanation. Having commented upon the policy of giving up to Russia some settlement in the Mediterranean, he concluded with observing, that he could not tamely think of relinquishing all the possessions we had acquired, for a peace which he could not think honourable to this country.

Lord Glenbervie said, there were two points upon which he must say a few words. One was with regard to the goods of Russia, in which a difficulty had been introduced by his learned friend which did not belong to the case. The other was a matter of fact, concerning which his learned friend's understanding was incorrect. Upon the matter of fact his learned friend had stated, that the contracting parties of the armed neutrality of 1800, did not really mean to persist in denying the right of search: this was very extraordinary, since they had an express order upon that subject: This was direct evidence of a fact which was at variance with the understanding of his learned friend upon the subject. A Swedish captain had received express orders from his court not to suffer any examination whatever, but to resist it with force. This was the positive order and matter of fact which he had to oppose to the understanding of his learned friend upon this subject. Afterwards the captain became subject to our search: he thought it wise not to resist that search with force, he was brought into this country, but when he went home he was broke for not having resisted the search by force; a tolerable evidence of the intention of his court seriously to dispute the right of search. A Danish ship actually did use force in resisting the search; another proof that his learned friend's understanding upon that subject was at variance with the fact.

Mr. Sturges considered the treaty, not as a compromise, but as a complete surrender of every object which we could fairly desire. He hoped it would be lasting, and he had well-grounded reasons for entertaining that hope. They were grounded in the glorious manner in which we had asserted our rights, and the moderation with which our victory had been followed. Northern powers had learnt that the Sound was not impassable, and even if it were rendered impassable, the passage of the Belt would be still open; a passage, the discovery of which was reserved for the consummate skill and daring spirit of the British navy.

Mr. Erskine said:—I cannot, Sir, resist the pleasure of expressing the most unqualified approbation of the manner in which this convention has been so happily concluded. I have never been in the House when it was in progress, and only entered it to day when the seconder of the motion was concluding his speech; but though a stranger to your debates upon the subject, I am no stranger to its importance. Not long ago I saw three great nations of the North, one of them powerful indeed, confederated against the most vital interests of our country; yet in so short a time afterwards I now see the same powers pledged to concur with us in their support, by upholding our ancient system of commercial law. The effect of such a successful conspiracy must have been to establish universally, that free bottoms should make free goods; because they who denied the right of search and enforced the refusal, annihilated every regulation against enemies property or contraband of war; since it is only by search that the invasion of the law can be detected. Our situation, nevertheless, as it regarded those confederating nations, was delicate in the extreme; since some of their staple commodities were in times of hostility (unfortunately too frequent) closely connected with the necessities of the state. The merit of this convention is not therefore to be lowered by calling it a judicious compromise. During the American war it was well observed by the late Mr. Burke, whose name the House will always hear with respect that almost every human benefit was founded in compromise and barter, "we give" he said, "and take, choosing rather to be prudent statesmen than subtle disputants."—If we had endeavoured to insist on harsh terms with the powers in question, they would have renewed the contest on the first opportunity that offered; but by our wise moderation the difference has been finally settled; as they have solemnly pledged themselves, in the face of Europe, that no neutral nation shall in time of war protect the property of enemies to belligerent powers, nor furnish them with the materials of war, for this prohibition is sufficiently established by the recognition of the right of search, as the general law of civilized states. We had thus preserved the honour and interest of our own country, by not forgetting that other countries have interests and honour also, which they are equally bound to assert. I know that those who speak from this side of the House must be careful how they express themselves, to guard against the misrepresentations of having spoken against ourselves; but I never can forget the good will which we owe to the whole human race, and the more so from the high station in which the Divine Providence has placed us. I agree to the basis of the convention as expressed by the noble secretary of state, which ought indeed to be the principle to govern every settlement of disputes. Whether a controversy be between individuals, or between contending nations, we should always seek to secure, if possible, the interests and reputation of both; because it is the only mode by which, in the end, they can be amicably satisfied. My professional life has often placed me in the character of a mediator, and I have always endeavoured to obtain this object as the only one which led to lasting reconciliation, and I rejoice to see it as the foundation of the arrangement which has been made. Without it, perhaps, we could not have had a peace so likely to continue, and which I verily believe will be lasting if it be pursued as it was made, in the spirit of peace. I wish France and every other nation to see that our divisions are at an end. We have made many sacrifices in the course of the late contest, and we must make many more to redeem our country from the consequences of a war, the continuance of which might have been fatal to it and to the security of the whole civilized world. I hope, Sir, that ministers will now pursue towards their fellow-subjects the same liberal policy which, upon this occasion, they have shown towards adversaries. This is still wanting—I am now looking forwards and confidently maintain that if the people of Great Britain and Ireland were governed according to the spirit of our laws mildly administered, they would, to use again the language of Mr. Burke, for ever cling and grapple to you, and nothing could tear them from their allegiance. Nothing indeed, can estrange them from our invaluable constitution but shutting them out from its benefits. These are my sentiments, and I speak them from the bottom of my heart. To conclude, Sir, to say that I approve of this convention would be to speak more coldly than I feel because I think that ministers are entitled from it to the thanks of their country.

Sir W. Scott said, that the learned gentleman, had uttered sentiments of which he entirely approved. It was his intention to have gone through the several heads of the subject, had not that task been performed already with such ability by his noble friend. As to the convention, as far as his understanding went, the essential rights of the country were to be supported by it; and it was, at the same time, perfectly adequate to every fair demand of every neutral country. The surrenders we had made also, he thought, were made with perfect propriety. The right of search had been preserved to us. With respect to privateers, a popular clamour seemed to have been raised against them very undeservedly; for there were points in which the utility of that species of warfare was manifest. He approved, however, of the modification with respect to them in the present convention. Upon the right of search, he took occasion to observe, that it was one to which all the rest were subordinate, for it was one without which all the rest were almost useless; it was therefore one of the pillars of our maritime strength. This was preserved in all its essential vigour by this convention. The subordinate points might be subject to critical observation, but the general character of them was perfectly intelligible. Under these circumstances, he gave his entire approbation to the whole of the convention, as a measure brought about by the valour of our arms, and the wisdom of our councils, and which secured the most important, while it invaded none of the rights of this country.

Mr. Tierney said: I rise to express my approbation of the convention. The present ministers, when they came into office, pledged themselves to use their honest endeavours to obtain peace, and to use their power with justice and moderation. They have fulfilled their pledge, and I feel myself bound to give them an honest support. I am sensible of the difficulties under which the country labours, but I see no cause for despair. I think I see a ray of hope, and I trust I shall not be disappointed. I trust that ministers are determined to act upon the only system by which the nation, after its struggles and sacrifices can be restored to its former greatness. With these sentiments, I shall not only give them no opposition, but contribute every exertion of my humble talents to aid them in the work.

The motion was then agreed to.

Debate on Sir W. Pulteney's Motion for a Committee on the Trade between India and Europe.] Nov. 25. Sir W. Pulteney rose to make his promised motion. He began by observing that a variety of documents had last session been laid upon the table with regard to the trade between England and India, and his object was, that these should now be fully considered. The grand question which arose out of them was, whether British merchants were to receive such facilities as to enable them to enter into a competition with foreigners in a vast branch of commerce? The question always appeared to him to be of the first magnitude, and it rose upon him in importance the more he considered it. Many objections had been made to the proposed regulations; these he had carefully weighed, and the effect they had taken upon him was, to impress upon his mind a more lively sense of the necessity of calling for the interference of the legislature. In 1793, when the charter of the company was renewed, various clauses were introduced into the act in favour of private trade. From the manoeuvres of the directors, however, these were productive of no good effect, and the intentions of the legislature were completely frustrated. From the increased difficulties thus experienced by individual traders, many representations were made, and at last a committee was appointed to take the whole subject fully into consideration. A report was by-and-by published, approving, without qualification, of the conduct of the Directors. By a court of proprietors this report was afterwards confirmed. It was for an account of these proceedings that he had moved last session. It was then too late to discuss them, but he had given notice of his intention to bring the subject before the House as soon as parliament should again be assembled. That notice he had renewed, and it was not his fault that he had been so long in fulfilling his promise. He was told that a compromise was likely to take place, and he thought it right to see whether justice could be done without an act of the legislature. He understood that terms had been offered by the court of Directors, but these were so unreasonable, so inadequate to the end proposed, that he could remain silent no longer.—When the East India company was first established, at the end of the seventeenth century, the object of the legislature was two-fold. 1. By the sale of the monopoly to raise a sum of money, the grant of exclusive privileges in trade being in those days an expedient for filling the treasury, often resorted to by the crown. 2. A second consideration was, that a trade so distant could not be carried on by individuals, but only by a joint-stock company. It was therefore thought that the wants of government might at once be supplied, and a benefit conferred on the commerce of the company. In the reign of queen Anne the monopoly was again sold, and a second company was formed. As they did not go on very well separate, a union between them was effected, and for this reason the present company was styled the “United Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies.” The monopoly was long preserved with great rigour. It was scarcely possible for individuals to trade by themselves, but every British subject was prohibited under severe penalties from having any concern with a foreign commercial company trading to the East. For a little while our East India company went on very well, but then they were only merchants. Become soon after victors and sovereigns their affairs went to ruin. In fifteen years after their first territorial acquisition, their profits had not only entirely ceased, but their losses were so great, that for a rupee, worth 2s. they could get no more than 1s. 3d. Indeed, this was not at all matter of surprise. The character of traders and sovereigns was inconsistent, and their union had never failed to prove ruinous to the mercantile concerns of these counting-house kings, and to make their unhappy subjects suffer under all the evils of oppression and misrule. On the ground of the complete incapacity of the court of the directors, a bill was brought into parliament in 1783, to take all power and management out of their hands. I opposed this bill because I considered it dangerous and unconstitutional. It went to establish a board with vast authority and influence, independent of the crown, to erect an imperium in imperio. After it had passed this House, and had been read twice in the Lords, it was happily thrown out. Another corrective was then resorted to, and a board of commissioners was appointed, which in various ways was to check and control the court of directors. No dispatches were allowed to be sent to any of the presidencies till they had first been communicated to the board, and the commissioners received great power over the territorial revenue and the political concerns of the dominions in India. To interfere with matters of trade they received no power, any farther than to see that the mercantile schemes of the directors did not interfere with the well-being of the Indian empire. Things continued in this situation till 1793, when the charter was to be renewed. Before this, it had been perceived, that the revenues must fail if native industry were not more encouraged. Foreigners were therefore allowed to trade on the same terms with the company themselves. The jealousy of British merchants, however, still remained. Those who had made fortunes in India, having thus no means of remitting them to England, took the benefit of the trade allowed to the French, Danes, Swedes, and Americans. Immense profits were thus made by foreigners; and they, from thus being sure of a cargo home, were enabled to export to India with great advantage, and in many instances to undersell the company. In 1793 the bad policy of this system began to be perceived, and many clauses were introduced to give facility to the private trade. Whoever reads the act must perceive the extreme jealousy which the legislature entertained of the designs of the directors. It was well known, that the directors would use their utmost endeavours to obstruct this trade; but sufficient guards, it was thought, were introduced to protect it in its new immunities. The directors, nevertheless, have obstructed it materially, and, in as far as in them lay, frustrated the intentions of parliament. The governors of India uniformly complained of their conduct, and recommended a more liberal system. Sir John Shore, Mr. Hastings, lord Cornwallis; in short, there is not a single exception. To these remonstrances the directors obstinately refused to listen, and still declared war against private trade, unless it was carried on in a way which prevented all competition with foreigners. In 1798, marquis Wellesley found it absolutely necessary to send home the produce of India in India-built ships. The number that arrived was very great, yet it never once was pretended that the smallest injury had ensued. The directors did not hint even at a bad consequence, but sent express orders that this might never be done again. The next year, therefore, the governor-general refused permission for the sailing of any home-built ship; but the year after he again found it necessary to employ a considerable number. A strong letter was in consequence wrote out to his lordship. By way of compliance with his representations, they propose some advantages to the private trade; but these concessions were insidious, and would have left them at liberty to hamper it at pleasure. I think it is now time to expose their evasions, and to bring the question fairly to issue before a competent tribunal.

The trade of the East India company consists of two branches; that to China, where they are mere merchants; and that to India where, they are sovereigns. The first is a profitable, the second a losing trade. The sales are therefore always confounded. In 1800, they amounted together to above seven millions. Of that there was re-exported 4,700,000*l.*, and of the latter sum there was 2,300,000*l.* from private trade, one half of the whole, re-exported. It is allowed, that the foreign trade to India amounts to 1,500,000*l.* I believe it to be a great deal more. Ships, supposed under ballast, have been discovered to be richly laden; and various expedients are used to disguise the amount of it. Of what consequence then, Sir, is the question that we are discussing? To this trade, no bounds can be set: a few years back, Indigo was not known as an article of commerce between the two countries; and, in 1800, we imported Indigo to the value of a million sterling. The importation of cotton and various other commodities has likewise been wonderfully increased; and it is never to be forgotten, that these are raw materials to exercise our own ingenuity and employ our own industry. The advantages to be derived from this trade, are great to a degree, though not yet understood; and shall they all be forfeited from the caprice or illiberality of the directors? We do not seek to deal in one article in which they deal themselves. It is, indeed, strange, that such a question should ever have been stirred. All this art is used to prevent us from coming into competition, not with the company, but with foreigners. They say, you must be under our control, you must employ the ships we send out to you, you must submit to many manifest disadvantages, not for our sake, not for the good of the commonwealth, but lest you should endanger the mercantile gains of France and America.—It is said, however, that the company's sales abroad might be injured. But how can this ever be the case when individual traders never expose the same articles to sale? The company's sales will be injured, to be sure, by thus labouring to enable foreigners to import the same articles with every advantage. But British subjects constitute the only objects of their jealousy. Rather than allow India built ships to come home, they will be at a great expense, and send out ships from England. To pretend that they thus place the private trader on an equally fair footing, is puerile. According to this plan, the cargo must be provided long before; the time of the ship's arrival is uncertain; when she may be allowed to be loaded is uncertain; and it is still more uncertain when she may be dispatched. Every thing is cramped by arbitrary regulations. But India shipping may be had cheaper! Whether cheaper or not appears to me of little consequence—it has so many advantages in other respects. The goods are provided when the ship is ready; they are immediately put on board, and the ship sets sail with them the moment she is fully loaded. Do consider, Sir, what the company propose to do. How can they know what goods are to be sent home? How can they proportion the supply of shipping to the demand? Have they not, to their utmost wish, the power of cramping the speculations of the merchants? Let them consider the danger they run, of losing the trade of India altogether. It is a well known fact, that in 1793 there were sold in L'Orient alone India goods to the value of 1,200,000*l.* sterling. How great is the trade of France alone, then! and how great must be the total of the trade of foreigners, when the extent of the dealings with India are considered of—Lisbon, America, and the states in the north! I am by no means of opinion that foreigners should be excluded. By these means alone the revenues can be kept up. All I ask is, that these advantages should not be granted to foreigners exclusively.

That a proposition so clear should be received like this must indeed confound a stranger. Not only the twenty-four directors who joined in the report were decidedly hostile to the plan proposed: but, upon a change of the direction, they were supported by the six new members who came in, making in all an unanimous body of the thirty persons at the head of affairs. The proprietors approved of the report by a large majority, and a ballot served only to show more unequivocally the ascendancy of the directors. Although there was no secret history in all this, it could by no means be decisive. I have authority to quote against authority. On my side of the question, besides all the governors general for the last twenty years, I have the late president of the board of control. Have these illustrious characters had no opportunity to inquire into the affairs of India? or have they laid down a resolution to overset the company, and to dissolve our empire in the East? I dare say the directors think they are in the right; but I will now show how they come to think themselves in the right. When the company was first established, like the Bank of England, and other joint-stock companies, the directors were chosen by those who held a small sum of stock, and the election was annual. The qualification to vote was then only 500*l.* It was thought that the proprietors interfered too much, and the sum was raised to 1,000*l.* A bill was then brought in to change the annual elections, and it was enacted that six should go out in rotation yearly; so that, when once elected, a member remained in office for four years, and had great facilities given him in naming his successor. The indiscreet interference of the proprietors was prevented, to be sure; but it often happens that, in attempting to mend one evil, you occasion others of equal consequence. It is clear, that ever since the directors have been self-created, there is but one solitary instance of a gentleman being brought into the direction who was not on the house-list. They are now a permanent fixed body, and never talk but of going out or coming in by rotation. The constitution is completely altered; there is now a very powerful, and dangerous aristocracy. How is it supported? I do not blame these gentlemen. The love of power is natural, and no one who has tasted its sweets will willingly descend into a private station. The blame lies with those who allow them to gratify this thirst for domination; and that they are allowed, is indeed much to be regretted. Of all governments, aristocracy is the most tyrannical, oppressive, and odious.

I abhor it still more than democracy. I asked how these men kept themselves in power? They have the management of an immense revenue, they have an immense patronage, and ought to have it. I opposed bestowing it on a board of commissioners, and I think it could not be possessed safely by the crown. But this is not all. They have the buying of an immense quantity of goods for India: they have the hiring of vessels to transport them; so that their influence is considerable over the manufacturing, and unbounded over the shipping interest. All who furnish ships' stores they can favour. When a man's ship is taken up, they tell him, you will take your ropes from such a person, your sails from another whom we point out, and your anchors from a third. As a proof of all this, I ask, whether many who hear me have not heard it said, "Oh, he is a great man; he is sure to do well; he has a vote at the India House." The directors do tell the truth when they say that, by the encouragement of private trade, the present constitution of the company would be overturned; and when they state this, they state the true and the sole ground of their opposition. The private traders would get rich, their influence would increase, the dependance of the proprietors on the directors would be greatly diminished, and the aristocracy would tumble to the ground. Here is a very good ground for the opposition of the court of directors; but here is nothing which in any degree affects the question itself.

I have stated the reason which actuates the breasts of the directors; I shall now state the reasons which they assign to others. I shall refer to the report, which was drawn up by a very honourable and upright man. I never did read a paper drawn up with more address, or that showed a greater talent at making the worst appear the better reason. While one reads, all appears right, and we unequivocally approve the conduct of the directors; but the moment we lay down the book, and ask ourselves what arguments have been urged against allowing us the full benefit of our Indian possessions, we are obliged to confess, None, but that you would thus endanger the power of the court of directors: 1. The first ostensible argument is, that if these privileges were granted, British capital would leave the country. But the company themselves are about to raise two millions, and if there is any danger from that sum being exported, it is fully as great when it is exported by the company. Sir, I deny that any danger exists. When capital leaves the country and is lost, it is a bad thing; but if it return with a profit, this is the best way it could be employed. The money sent to India will not be given in presents to the Hindoos. It will be employed in buying raw materials to be brought to England, and will thus encourage industry at home and abroad, and add to the strength of the empire. These gentlemen tell us, this capital might have been employed more profitably. So they think they can judge better of this matter than the owners of this capital. They are to be thanked for their friendly solicitude; but they will probably find that their own affairs will demand all their attention. 2. We have next set before us the terrors of colonization. Upon this point they dwell at great length and with great complacency. But in telling us that the ruin of the country would be the inevitable consequence of any relaxation, they surely forget the nature of the Indian government. At present no one can go to India without the consent of the aristocracy; and when he is there, the aristocracy can put him on board a ship and send him home as soon as they have a mind. Without leave of the government, no one can go beyond a few miles from Calcutta. By a fundamental law, no European is capable of holding lands in any part of the company's possessions. Between India and America no analogy can be drawn, although the separation of that country had been necessary, instead of occasioned by mismanagement. In America the climate resembled that of England, and the constitution of government was almost exactly the same. Above all, America was uninhabited, and boundless tracks of fertile land were presented to the industry of the planter. India is one of the most populous countries on the globe, and every inch of ground is appropriated. The climate is so fatal, that it is almost impossible for a European to remain in it alive a few years; the form of government must be arbitrary, and may be tyrannical. And this is the spot, which, after having become a flourishing colony by draining the mother country of men and money, will at length break off all connexion with us, and become a formidable rival! 3. But great numbers of Lascars would be brought to London, and, being here corrupted, would on their return corrupt their countrymen. They would thus carry a bad report of us to Hindostan, the English character would be degraded, and the English empire in the East shaken to its foundations. All this is really urged with gravity. Would it not be possible to prevent the Lascars from ever entering London; we trade to China, but our men are not allowed an unrestrained intercourse with the Chinese. It would be an easy matter, at a small expense, to superintend the Lascars when on shore; and, though the expense should be considerable, the profits of the trade would be amply able to bear it. It is a curious fact, Sir, that the company are daily in the practice of bringing home Lascars; and if I am rightly informed, those whom they do bring home are allowed to wander about the streets and to die for want, while those brought home by the private traders live on shore in a kind of barracks prepared for them, and are watched over with the greatest care. 4. The shipping interest would suffer. Sir, if I am rightly informed, the shipping interest are by no means adverse to the plan. The price of timber in this country is now so enormous, that there is scarcely any profit to be made by building ships, while there is a great deal to be made by repairing them. If trade increases, and the number of ships entering our ports is increased, they therefore justly think they would ultimately be gainers. 5. An argument still more formidable is, that the British sailors would be injured. In all cases where they are to be found, the merchants are willing to employ British sailors in preference. It is their interest to do so. Seven British sailors are supposed to be equal to twelve lascars; and, though some give a different proportion, all agree in making the difference prodigious. Thus the loss of tonnage, when Lascars are employed, more than counterbalances the cheapness of their wages. The merchants are willing that a clause should be introduced, enacting that, when they are to be found, a part, or the whole of the crew shall be English; and that certificates of the impossibility of finding them shall be given by the court of directors, or the council at the presidencies in India. If this trade is placed under proper regulations, it will afford encouragement to a prodigious number of our mariners, it will greatly increase their number; and, in case of a new war, will add materially to our maritime strength. Upon the commencement of hostilities, Lascars can be employed as substitutes; and, without any interruption to our commerce, an immense number of hands can be given to the navy. This is an advantage not to be derived from the trade to the West Indies, or any other colonial trade on the globe.

The admission of India-built ships cannot be objected to, if it were for no other reason than the present scarcity in this country of timber for the navy. The deficiency begins to be felt to a most alarming degree. But the wood of which these ships are built is preferable to the best oak, and it can be imported for all purposes, free of expense, in the form of a ship. In the opinion of the court of directors, a grand national object like this is to be sacrificed, because it would interfere with selfish views! During the war the trade of foreigners to India has had to struggle with considerable difficulties. Now that peace has arrived, we shall have not only our former rivals, but France and Holland; and there will be few obstacles to their being assisted by British capital, if, through the unhappy influence of a few merchants in Leadenhall-street, it is not allowed to be employed at home. France has all her colonies restored to her. There is no clause in the treaty to say that she shall not trade in the Indian seas. There could be none; and the only way in which we can prevent our commerce being wrested from us, is to free it from every unreasonable restraint. If foreigners are once allowed to get possession of it, we may discover our error only in time to find it irretrievable. Now we may secure to ourselves this inexhaustible fund of wealth; but if we unprecedentedly allow it to slip from us, it is gone for ever. Whenever our commerce is ruined, we shall have no other consolation than that we have preserved the sacred band of thirty directors. It likewise ought never to be forgotten that all that leaves our scale, falls into the scale of France, so that the loss acts doubly against us. I think I have said enough to prove the propriety of my motion. I do not wish the House to come to a decision now. Let the whole business be submitted to a committee, and sifted to the bottom. It will then be seen whether we are not unnecessarily weakening ourselves and aggrandising our enemies; whether we are not doing every thing to discourage manufactures and to cramp trade; whether we are not wantonly shutting up sources of revenue and maritime strength; and whether, if these manœuvres prevail, the sales in Leadenhall-street themselves will not soon be unattended? Sir, I am sure that this subject will force itself on parliament; and that though this motion be rejected, it will not determine the fate of the measure. Sir William concluded by moving, "That a Committee be appointed to take into consideration the Papers laid before this House in the last session of parliament relating to the proceedings of the East India Company, respecting the Trade between India and Europe, referred to in the said Papers, and to report the same, as it shall appear to them, to the House."

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that no member could possibly attach greater importance than he did to the subject now under discussion. He was ready, too, to admit, that the hon. baronet was actuated by the purest and most disinterested sense of duty, while he allowed with pleasure that he had conducted the discussion of a subject so extremely interesting with that candour and good sense which could not fail to have excited universal approbation. The hon. baronet had traced with great accuracy the history of the East India company, from the earliest period of its establishment, down to the present moment. He should first advert to the provisions adopted in 1793, when the House renewed the charter. The private trade had not been publicly acknowledged previous to that period; and it was in 1793, for the first time, that it was formally recognized, and special provisions made for giving new facilities to its extension. At this time, the company were bound to furnish 3,000 tons for the importation of the articles embarked in that trade into this country. This allowance had happily been found to be far from being equal to the purpose in view; but those who had framed this act, foreseeing that such an allowance would be inadequate, had lodged in the hands of commissioners the power of enlarging it to that amount which circumstances should require. The framers of this bill had, in the provisions they adopted, endeavoured to give this private trade all those facilities which might at once be perfectly consistent with the interests of the company, while they afforded every reasonable degree of encouragement to the efforts of private speculation. If the court of directors had not given this trade all the facilities which parliament had intended, a fair ground of parliamentary interference would be opened. Agreeing most cordially with the hon. baronet in the expediency of giving every possible facility to the private trade, he trusted that if, from what had been stated, he should be enabled to draw an opposite conclusion, the House would be disposed to come to a corresponding decision. The hon. gentleman had said, that every governor in India, without exception, was in favour of the private trade conducted on the principles which he had laid down; but whence he had been able to collect this, he was unable to discover. Unquestionably it was true, that his noble friend, marquis Wellesley, had, by the exercise of his discretionary power, and by using extraordinary exertions, employed several ships in 1798 for bringing to Europe the articles connected with the private trade. An order from the court of directors was sent out by the next fleet, prohibiting the importation of any more goods in this way, and, in 1799, the practice was discontinued. Since that time it was renewed; and he had the satisfaction of stating that the court of directors had agreed to shipping for the purposes of the ensuing season. They had even consented, that the shipping employed in the Red Sea should be appropriated to the conveyance of the private trade for 1803. Thus they had not only agreed to confirm the determination of marquis Wellesley, but had expressed their willingness to employ a large proportion of shipping exclusively for the benefit of the private trade, and were even engaged to furnish additional shipping, if the trade of 1803 should require a larger proportion than that which they had assigned. From this statement, therefore, the House would perceive, that the private trader would experience no inconvenience, no loss, no disadvantage whatever, till 1804, even if no new regulations were to be adopted: while sufficient time was allowed to form every regulation which might seem to be demanded by an impartial contemplation of the whole of the circumstances connected with so interesting a subject. The first question was, Whether the court of directors had given those facilities which, by the decision of parliament, they were required to extend to the private trade? He had already stated that they had given the facilities required. The next was, Whether or not there existed a just expectation that these facilities would be extended in future? In directing the attention of the House to these points, he wished that the nature of the trade in question might be fully understood. The capital employed in the trade, it would be recollected, was not drawn from this country, but was a capital composed of the surplus of the salaries enjoyed by the different servants of the company in India. This surplus was either vested in the Treasury of the company, and bills to the amount drawn on England, or it was vested in goods which constituted the trade which the House was at present considering. The amount of the surplus had gradually increased, and the investments in the private trade had experienced a proportional increase. In carrying on this trade, the hon. gentleman had contended, that British subjects were not allowed those advantages which were given to the foreign trader. On examination, however, this assertion would be found to be groundless. To ascertain this, it was only necessary to attend a little to the manner in which the trade was conducted. No persons were, allowed to engage in it who were not licensed by the company's servants; and they were prevented from buying goods formed of the choicest materials, and manufactured in the richest manner. Saltpetre, too, found an exception to the articles which they were permitted in the first instance to purchase. But this exclusion with regard to fine goods referred only to the period prior, to the supply of the ships of the company with these articles. After this supply was obtained, the market was open to the private traders, and the previous exclusion ceased to operate. They might then purchase, not merely the rough part of the goods, but the richest materials, and the most costly manufacture. With the exceptions he had specified, every other branch of manufactures, and every other article of produce, were within the range of their purchase. Such was the situation in which the private traders were placed; and he knew no difference with respect to foreigners, except that it was not necessary for them to be licensed previous to their engaging in the private trade. They enjoyed no other privilege which was not participated by British subjects; and therefore he was at a loss to conceive what those advantages were which the hon. baronet had described to be in the possession of foreigners. But here the hon. baronet had stated an object to be gained by the private trade, and a most important national object it was: an object no less than that of facilitating, by means of ships built in India, the supply of timber for the commercial and royal navy of this country. The hon. baronet had dwelt strongly on this point, and had been extremely anxious to show that there was no other means of so effectually promoting this great object. It was his duty in answer to this, to state, that the court of directors had expressed, in the strongest terms, their anxiety to give every possible facility to any measure calculated for the advantage of the royal navy: they were even willing to engage to use every effort to cheapen the price of timber, by loading particular ships with goods for their own use, so as to reduce the freight to a more moderate rate. The price of ship timber within a few years had increased in a most extraordinary manner, and every plan for effecting a reduction was deserving of serious attention. With respect to the use of ships built in India, for the private trade, this was one of the cases in which the opinions on the subject proceeded to extremes. It was the opinion of his noble friend, the governor-general of India, and of a right hon. gentleman, that ships built in India should only be employed in the trade; and this was the point in which he had the misfortune to differ from them, while the court of directors up to that day, had as strenuously maintained, that the trade should be exclusively confined to British ships. He had now, however, a high degree of pleasure in being enabled to state that the directors had agreed that either British ships, or those built in India, if attended with equal convenience, should be employed; their only objection being with regard to the price. In calculating the comparative expense of British and India built ships, the hon. gentleman had founded his calculations on a state of war; but was it fair to assume, that during a period of peace this expense would not be diminished? It certainly was not; and this was another reason for opposing the motion that time might be allowed to try the experiment for three years. By recommending delay, he trusted that he should not be thought indifferent to the importance of the question. The trade was unquestionably of very high consequence. While it opened a channel for the importation of the branches of Indian manufactures, and the articles of Indian produce, which the company had not the means of introducing on their own account; and while it enabled those of the company's servants, who had a certain portion of capital to dispose of, to dispose of in an advantageous manner; it, on the other hand, presented new openings for the commerce, and new encouragements to the manufactures, of the mother country. It was a trade not only attended with great advantages, but accompanied with little risk. It took little capital from the country, yet in its consequences was calculated to make London the emporium of the trade of India. What was said on the consequences which would flow from the employment of Lascars in the navigation of ships coming from India, appeared in his mind extremely inconclusive. That foreign seamen might, without the smallest impropriety, occasionally come in aid of British sailors, could not be denied; but that there was any reasonable fear of the foreigners supplanting the British subjects, was a proposition to which he could not accede. It was impossible to imagine, that, known as the superior skill and intrepidity of British seamen were, their services would be refused for the services of another description of men, whose qualifications were confessedly inferior. On the subject of colonization he was not prepared to agree with the hon. gentleman. He thought it an object of high importance, to prevent an increase of settlements in India, and to discourage every plan which was designed to increase or consolidate such settlements. He admitted, that the cases of America and our settlements in India were not parallel; but at the same time he thought that our experience in America ought at least to have the effect of teaching us caution. On the contemplation of the whole question, he did not think that the hon. gentleman had made out such a case as could be considered by the House as a full and fair ground for instituting an inquiry. He therefore felt it his duty to move the previous question.

Mr. Johnstone said, that if there ever had been discovered any disposition on the part of the court of directors to agree to an amicable arrangement of the dispute with the private merchants, the present motion would have been unnecessary. Its object was, merely to put to fair trial the plan which the marquis Wellesley had sanctioned and acted upon. If this plan was to be fairly put to the test for two years, the private merchants would be perfectly satisfied. Was, however, any such disposition apparent on the face of the papers on the table? Certainly not; and hence had originated the necessity for the motion. The right hon. gentleman, when mentioning the subject of the concession offered by the court of directors, did not seem to understand the nature of the concession to be granted. He had thought that the ships in the Red Sea would be amply sufficient for every purpose of the private trade in 1803; but for his part, he could not help being of a different opinion. The House would recollect, that 40,000 ton of shipping had been originally employed in conveying the division of the Indian army up the Red Sea. Of these, 20,000 tons had already returned to different ports in India, and of the other half, a number of ships were disabled, while others were discharged, and would come home in the ensuing season. So that he was afraid, that out of the 20,000 tons, appropriated for the use of the private trade, there would not be a sufficient number of disposeable ships to bring home the property vested in the private trade. There seemed to be a wish among the enemies of the private trade, to represent the plan as altogether new; whereas it was not new, but had been pursued in the several seasons since 1798, when the governor general of India had acted upon it by sending home private property in ships built in the country. After the trial it had undergone, he defied any one to point out a single inconvenience that had arisen from it. It had received the support of every one of the company's servants in India, who had acknowledged the beneficial effects that it was calculated to produce. The right hon. gentleman seemed to think, that the private trade was solely a trade of remittance, and that the capital was made up of the saving of the salaries of the different servants of the company in India. This was, however, an exceedingly erroneous idea of the nature and extent of this important branch of trade. He believed the whole amount of these savings to be a million and a half yearly. Now it was known, that the company had bills drawn on Europe to this amount, and thus the whole of the sum which was to form the capital of the private trade was completely absorbed. The truth was, that the facilities of navigation had opened a variety of new channels; and the East Indies would have to receive, at no remote period, a balance in specie. The private trade, independent of all the concerns of the company, could not now be estimated at less than an annual sum of from four millions and a half to five millions sterling. It had been asked, what were the advantages which foreigners possessed in carrying on this trade, above British subjects? Undoubtedly, if the plan of marquis Wellesley was to be acted upon, and if the private property of British traders was to be sent home in ships of the country, instead of ships sent out by the company, foreigners would possess no advantage. But, on the other hand, if the plan was given up, if the company were to send out ships to bring home private property, and if they were to be allowed to assort and manage the cargoes as heretofore, these checks went certainly to put the British merchant in a far worse situation than that in which the foreigner was placed. On the subject of colonization, he had no hesitation in saying, that he was decidedly hostile to any system which would attempt to colonize our eastern possessions. He would not say how long we could expect to retain our dominions in India; but he was a sanguine man, indeed, who could expect our empire there to continue for 200 years. It appeared to him to be an empire of opinion, chiefly inspired by the awe of our first conquest; and it was our interest not to pursue a plan that might lead the natives to reflect upon their own strength: for which reason, he thought there was no sound policy in having a great many Europeans settled there; but rather that the plan of European settlers should be discouraged, because this must have the effect of teaching the natives, in time, the force of their own natural strength.

Mr. Wallace said, that the proposition of the hon. baronet was evidently calculated, through the medium of a committee, purporting to examine merely the claims of private traders, to introduce a discussion relative to every part of our Indian affairs; which should be guarded against at this time, when speculations were indulged respecting the India company, which struck at the root of that establishment. The principle upon which he should vote, in opposition to the proposal, was, that he held it to be a direct attack upon the charter of the India company, without any plea of justice or necessity. The opinion of Mr. Dundas was confidently quoted in this discussion; but, in his judgment, that opinion went to an extent which no reason could be advanced to warrant. He, for one, was not prepared to go so far. From the papers on the table he drew his principal argument against the motion; for it appeared, that the India company could not be found to allow the private trading at all beyond the amount of that settled by the act of 1793, unless it was intended glaringly to entrap their charter. However the motion might be disguised, it would tend to put the spirit of the act of 1793 in opposition to its express letter, and to introduce a question between public faith and public expediency. The principles upon which that act was founded, he stated to be, to procure to the merchandise and manufactures of the British empire exclusively the market of India; and to maintain the influence and power of the company, as interwoven with the power of the country, by securing to them alone the communication between India and Europe. At that time a private trade did exist, under the patronage of the company, but in a crippled state. It was enlarged, and wisely, for many reasons. Among others, from the state of timber in India, and the demand here, it was desirable that India-built ships might be allowed to import it into Great Britain. It was also desirable to prevent the effects of foreign intrigue, and the aggrandisement of foreign power in India. That was the policy which saved India from the machinations of France. Now that, by the treaty of peace, the French establishments were restored, it was more necessary than ever to persevere in that system; for, by giving facility to the trade of India with this country, we should make the foreign factories scarcely worth maintaining. With respect to the danger apprehended from colonization in India, it was the most chimerical that could be imagined. Was it reasonable to entertain any such apprehensions, in a country under the direction of a government so powerful, and supported by an immense army? He showed that the extension of the private trade would be for the advantage of the company, by stating, that in 1798, the percentage profit to the company, on goods belonging to private merchants, was 2*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*; whereas, in 1800, it amounted to 35*l.* As to the notion, that the report which the Lascars might give in India of their British connexions in Wapping, tending to subvert the British dominions in India, or to reduce the British character, it was too ridiculous to deserve a serious answer. He was not inclined to join with those who supposed that these Lascars would ever be preferred to British seamen, for they were not so cheap. He applauded the disposition manifested by the company to adjust the dispute with the private traders, and hoped the plan proposed for the two ensuing years would serve as the basis of some future arrangement. With these views of the subject, he would give his decided opposition to any proposal endangering the establishment of the company; convinced that its existence, through the medium of a well-regulated monopoly, was essential to the security of the state; and that the transfer of the authority which it possessed to the government, would give it a degree of over-awing power, that would render the existence of the constitution itself extremely precarious.

Sir F. Baring said, that the hon. baronet who introduced this question, had called it a commercial one, materially involving the trading rights of this country; but he would beg leave to term it a question in support of the claims of an illegitimate description of traders, against the interest and chartered rights of a legal and legitimate body, whose interests and whose objects must of necessity participate in those of the empire; for, in fact, under the former description only, could he estimate those men in India from whom originated this question: they were children rising against their parents—servants labouring to subvert the interests of their masters—creatures who owed every thing that they possessed to the patronage, protection, and support of that very company whose legal authority and legitimate interest they now sought to subvert, under the pretence of vindicating the commercial rights of British subjects; but in reality with a view to convert this country into a colony, and India into a mother country, and to lay the foundation of future subversion to the institution of the India company, which the legislature of this country had so long cherished and supported, on the fullest conviction of its importance to the prosperity of the British empire. For who, he would ask, were those “reputable” authorities from whom the hon. baronet derived his information on this subject, but the servants of the company in India, and their correspondents in this country, conniving with them to wrest, if possible, all the advantage of India commerce out of the hands of its legal possessors. The hon. baronet had termed the court of directors a court of aristocracy, whose authority was as dangerous to the true interests of the company, as it was to those of this country, in relation to the possession of India. But he begged leave to vindicate the directors from such a charge. Upon the introduction of the act of 1793, for renewing the charter of the company, a principal object avowed by parliament was, the promotion of interest to the manufacturers of Great Britain and Ireland; and on the part of the company, it was earnestly desired that the parties interested would come forward and state what they wished, in order that every reasonable claim might be complied with. The consequence of which was, that a stipulation was brought forward by the right hon. gentleman who introduced that bill, which required that 3,000 tons of shipping should be uptaken by the company for the purpose of carrying the private trade to India, and bringing back produce in return. To this the directors agreed, and even declared their own indifference as to the nation of which such ships should be, whether Irish or English. But if any description of ships was to be proposed, subversive of the principle which was to make the river Thames the medium of reception, or on board of which British seamen were not to be the navigators, the directors were prepared decidedly to reject it. Any departure from this principle would have been injurious to the interests of the British navy. But if this stipulation was not made, the persons in India, from whom the present question originated, would have decidedly rejected British ships, and have preferred their own teak vessels; and instead of confining their commerce to the Thames for promoting the interests of British manufactures, would have made use of them to carry on a trade with all the ports in Europe. Such was the conduct of the servants of the company in India, who have made their fortunes under the protection of the company. But what was the pretence of those persons for employing

India-built vessels instead of British? That they could supply Europe with the produce of India upon terms considerably cheaper. But what was the proof on the contrary? Why, that M. Pellier, a French agent, had offered the government in India to pay a price for their commodities on the spot adequate to 10 per cent over and above the investment price, and to convey them to Europe in French bottoms. How, then, could any individual in the private trade pretend that he could supply France with India commodities cheaper than the India company?—With respect to the nature of the homeward India trade, it was, he said, divided under three distinct heads, viz.—1. The foreign trade. 2. The private trade to the river Thames. 3. The company's own trade. By the last returns at the India house, it appeared, that the private trade had increased within the last two years, 300,000*l.*; the foreign in a still greater proportion; but it was uniformly found, that the trade of the company decreased, as that of the private traders advanced; and consequently, their commercial interests were injured, not by foreigners, but by their own servants. The foreign trade, in fact, had increased of late years more than ever; but with this difference, that not a single article of foreign manufacture was consumed in our India settlements, silver only being the article in exchange for the commodities of the country, while British manufactures were the only articles of European consumption, and taken in exchange for the produce brought home to England.—With respect to shipping, he would state the reason why the growth of ship timber in this country was not greater; it was, because there was not a competition sufficient for its encouragement. The navy board held out no adequate inducement for country gentlemen to grow their timber to an extraordinary size; and therefore they cut it down only at that size when, by competition between the navy and the private ship-builders, they were sure of a good price; but he was convinced that the proposed importation of large ships from India, to supply our navy, was to place the English country gentleman in a still worse state than before, with regard to the growth of timber.—With respect to the employment of Lascars in preference to British seamen, such an idea he believed was too ridiculous to require refutation; but with respect to that description of seamen brought to this country by the homeward bound ships from India, the difference was this—the India company alone had provided for them an establishment affording them maintenance and protection, and insured them return to their native country; whereas, it was the interest, and seemingly the object of the private trader, to induce them to desert, and then abandon them to their fate. The directors of the India company acted on the whole of this business, not from any impulse of private interest, but from a sense of public duty: on that ground, they bowed to no man, however high his rank or station, and therefore he could not admit the charge imputed to them by the hon. baronet, of having acted from principles of self interest upon self-elected authority. But the persons from whom the representation of the hon. baronet originated—though they were viewed by the discernment of lord Cornwallis in a just point of view, as individuals, whose private interests were opposed to those of the company, to whom they owed every thing, and as such kept at a distance by that noble lord, were, on the contrary, taken to the arms of marquis Wellesley, favoured by his confidence, and by him supported, in direct opposition to the interests of the company. And what was the conduct of those very men in the last year? Why, that, acting as private traders, their investments being on board private ships, which sailed singly, they reached India long before the company's fleet, which was obliged to await the completion of all their cargoes, and sail in company with convoy; by which means the private ships had not only forestalled the markets there before their arrival, but bought up new freights of country goods for remittance to England, to forestall them there also. Furnished with such privileges as these, the private traders enjoyed greater advantages and indulgence than the company under their charter; for they, in fact, enjoyed all the advantages of trade, without paying any thing for the political expenses of maintaining it. But, not contented with a participation even on such terms, they now made a demand, which, if acceded to, nothing more was left to grant, and a foundation would be thereby laid for the speedy subversion of the company. But, however specious the pretences of those men, with respect to the cheapness of freights on board of India-built ships were, they would be rendered completely nugatory by the events of peace. The project was taken up in a period of war, and in the full contemplation of its continuance; and it was consequently followed up for the present. But it would be found, that the consequent abatements in the rate of freightage on board British vessels, the cessation of all risks from war, and the expence of convoy, would so reduce the expences of freight in British bottoms, and still more in other vessels of Europe, as completely to do away every claim of preference to India-built vessels. But, even suppose a preference was still due on account of cheapness to India-built vessels, he begged to know why the India company should be precluded from the advantage, under a charter for which it so dearly paid?—or why a preference should be given to their servants—or, if the spirit of the British Navigation act was to be rigidly maintained in respect to the former, upon what ground of justice or expediency was it to be relaxed in favour of the latter?

Mr. Metcalf said, he should confine his observations principally to two points. the first was, the source from which the motion originated. It was from a combination, long, insidiously, and clandestinely carried on by persons in India, who had been the servants of the company, and who owed the means they possessed solely to the protection of that company. These men, aided by accomplices in England, men of no inconsiderable property, and amongst whom were men of no mean talents, had for a long time set up an interest, and for many years past carried on a trade, directly opposed to the interests of their masters; but, not content with availing themselves of the privilege of tonnage, they availed themselves of the flags of foreign nations, and supplied all the countries of Europe with the produce of India, to the great injury of the company; and to such a pitch was this clandestine trade carried, that at one time they actually had 50,000 tons of shipping at Calcutta, under foreign flags, ready to carry their commodities to every port in Europe, and their settlements elsewhere; but the spirited conduct of the governor of St. Helena soon checked their progress, by seizing several of those ships, and sending them for the investigation of a court of admiralty, many of which were condemned as lawful prizes. Having thus lost their interest in the conveyance by neutral bottoms, they now came forward with a proposition, of carrying on their trade with England in their own teak ships, and they had found means to interest in their cause, several men of respectability. The object of the hon. baronet was, to convey home from India the surplus produce purchased by the fortunes of the company's servants; but the mode he proposed aimed at nothing less than the opening of the privileges of the charter to those private traders who were the objects of his advocacy; the consequence of which which would be, that memorials would come from every community of traders in Great Britain and Ireland to participate in the privilege. The legislature had pledged its faith to the company and to the country; and he trusted that that faith would not now be violated, without the fullest proof of its justice and necessity. If the charters of the India company were to be violated, where was the security for those of the Bank of England, of the city of London, or the many other great charters with which the liberty, prosperity, and security of the nation were so materially connected?

Mr. W. Dundas was unwilling to violate the chartered rights of the company, but when that company had avowed their willingness to concede in favour of private trade, he felt it his duty to close with them. An hon. baronet had said, that 3,000 tons of shipping was sufficient for the conveyance of the private trade between England and India; but he would ask how this could possibly answer for a trade so very much increased since the settlement of this regulation? The hon. baronet had also asserted, that such was the state of opposition between the private traders and the company's interest, or the home trade with India, that, in proportion as the former increased, the latter always decreased. Unfortunately for this assertion, in 1794-5 the sales of the India company amounted to 5,521,000*l.*; the private sales to 1,053,000*l.* From this period they continued in progressive increase till the year 1801-2, when the company's sales were, 7,600,000*l.*; the private sales 2,382,000*l.*, a proof this, of the rapid increase in both.

Mr. Jones denied that the motion, if granted, would sacrifice the foreign trade of India, or, that it might be used as an engine for the destruction of the company's charter. In his opinion, the directors had not given due encouragement to the private traders, under the act of 1793. He entertained no fears with respect to the adoption of the proposition, nor did he think that by it we should lose the sovereignty of the seas. The application was not for an attack upon the charter, but only for an inquiry into a grievance, the existence of which was acknowledged. The object of the motion was fair and laudable; and its adoption would tend to the salvation of the India company, and the general prosperity of the nation.

Mr. Tierney said, that the first ground on which he should oppose the motion was, the charter of the India company, which vested in the court of directors, the sole control in this affair; and, without violating that charter, and with it the faith of the nation on which it stood supported, it was impossible to comply with the motion. If he conceived there was any thing in that charter contrary to the public welfare, or that the motion before the House was calculated to remove any such principle in the privileges of the India company, there was no man in the House less disposed than he was to be deterred by such cant as the phrase of "chartered rights," from acceding to the inquiry proposed. But neither proof nor argument had been adduced to convince him that any necessity for such inquiry existed. The bill for renewing the charter of the India company had been drawn by an able hand; and by this bill a line was drawn, by which the limits of private and public trade with India were amicably adjusted. A regulation was in reality exacted from the company in favour of private traders, by which 3,000 ton of shipping was exclusively appointed for the convenience of the private trade; and discretionary powers vested in the court of directors to extend that quantity, if occasion should require. But now an attempt was made for opening that bill again to consideration, in his mind impolitic and unnecessary. Not one single proof was adduced, of any injury to any party. How, then, were the assertions of the hon. baronet supported? Not by the public voice, for in all England there did not appear to be 500 persons in support of his opinions. A board of control had been appointed under the act, and the rates of freight settled, at 15*l.* per ton outwards, and 5*l.* home, subject to further revision as occasion might require. But did it ever enter into the contemplation of any man, that

India-built shipping was intended by the act? He remembered a proposition of the sort being brought forward by the company some years ago, and he well recollected the general alarm it created on both sides the river. What was the claim set up by the men who now demanded such a privilege? Why, no pretence of right, but a pretty plain menace, that if you refused them the privilege, they were ready to employ the ships of rival nations: a menace, which, in his mind, did not go to entitle them to much indulgence from that House. The worthy baronet had sanctioned his proposal under the name and example of the marquis Wellesley. To that nobleman, high in character and learning, no man was more ready to pay respectful deference than he was; and, had the question been one of classical research, no man would have more cheerfully bowed to the judgment of the noble lord. But, upon the subject of policy and regulation for the government of India, he was not quite so ready to surrender his own judgment. The House had been told by the right hon. gentleman who introduced the East India charter, that this country would very shortly derive an aid of half a million a year from the company. He should have no objection to see the money brought forward; but, unfortunately for the prophet, his prediction was yet unfulfilled.—He expressed his sincere regret that this question had been brought forward; for if in India, an idea once went forth that the servants of the company were able to triumph over their masters in an appeal to parliament, there was no calculating the mischiefs that might ensue. If the use of India shipping was such a tower of strength to the servants of the company, why was it not equally advantageous to the company themselves? But, if once granted to the servants, he had the most serious fears for the extent of colonization in India. For, allowing that the agents were to obtain what they wished, would their claims end there? Would such claimants be content with what they now pretended was the full measure of their desires? If the charter of the company was once attacked and laid open, what security would there remain for any exclusive privilege or regulation which now existed? If cheapness in the conduct of the trade was the grand argument of the agents, consider to what it might go:—it might be found out, that the trade was not carried on most advantageously to the port of London; it might be said that greater facilities, that cheaper warehouses, &c. could be obtained at Liverpool, at Glasgow, or any other port of Great Britain or Ireland. New applications would be made, memorials and complaints would pour in on every side against the obstacles raised by the company, and demanding new facilities, till the whole system of the India company, and the present connexion of this country with India, was destroyed. Those claimants would have the popular side of the question; they would hold out the captivating language of bringing all the trade of India to the port of London: it would be said, that we might easily exclude foreigners from participating in our advantages; London, they would say, would be rendered the emporium of the world; and there would not be wanting those who would be charmed with those brilliant prospects. But, in fact, it was doubtful whether, if practicable, it was advantageous that foreigners should be deprived of their share in the trade. He saw no advantage in producing that envy and disgust among other nations which would render peace insecure. Nor, in fact, was it possible to exclude foreigners. It was proved, that though the private trade had increased, the trade of foreign nations with British India had increased likewise. Complaints had been made that the act of 1793 had not succeeded in its objects, and that now it was necessary to carry its spirit into effect. This, indeed, appeared a strange conclusion. For his part, on the face of it there appeared to be ground to think that it had succeeded, and that in the very point of the private trade. It appeared that, in the year previous to the passing of that act, the private trade had amounted in value to about 800,000*l.*, and now it had advanced to 2,300,000*l.* The danger of colonization, the increase of trade had an obvious tendency to render greater; the company would naturally, therefore, be more careful in granting licences for residence in their territories. But, would it not be required that, with the increase of trade, a greater number of merchants should be in India to carry it on? What bounds then could be set to the increase of resident merchants in India? It was true, that the circumstances of India and America were very unlike. In America, every thing was wild and uncultivated. In India every thing was made. Besides other establishments there was an army; and, though the fidelity and merit of that army were indisputable, such were the habits of the company's servants, that the military, among others, expected to profit by any new facilities of trade. Houses would be established, and become hereditary in India, with immense wealth. It was said that capital would find its way to England. He did not doubt that it would seek the mother country; but in a new state of things, and new hereditary commercial establishments, it was not so easy to determine which was the mother country. The real mother country was that where a man resided, that where he enjoyed his advantages; and surely this view of the case would be most natural to those who professed to be guided merely by views of cheapness and superior gain. But was it nothing that English ship-building was to be transferred to India? It was pretended, that the ship-builders in the Thames would be equally benefited by the repair of India-built ships coming to the river. This, however, was not well founded. He found, that out of 200,000*l.* expended one year on ships of this description, not 20,000*l.* was expended in articles that really belonged to ship-building. It was a very serious matter that the work of the ship-builders at home should be transferred to any other quarter. He could not consent that India-built vessels should be set up in rivalry with our own. After the services of our dock-yards at home, those concerned in them, might have reason to complain, if advantages against them were given to India-built ships; and it ought to be remembered how useful, on many occasions, the dock-yards appropriated chiefly to East India shipping had been. But with respect even to the cheapness of India-built ships, he was not convinced. In the price of the timber alone could that cheapness consist, as most of the articles of outfit were sent out from this country. Upon the whole, when he considered the offers made by the company, he thought the directors did rather too much than too little. Every thing in India depended upon the opinion entertained of the company's vigour and firmness. Their servants, he feared, would consider this already as a victory over them. The court of directors were accused of throwing difficulties in the way of the free trade; but he rather thought that their readiness to grant facilities produced unreasonable demands. On the whole, he was decidedly against the motion.

After some farther conversation the previous question was put and carried.

Copy of the Treaty of Alliance between Great Britain and the Sublime Porte.]
Nov. 24. Lord Hawkesbury presented the following

TRANSLATION OF TREATY OF ALLIANCE between his Majesty and the Ottoman Porte; signed at Constantinople, January 5th, 1799.

In the Name of Almighty God!—The constant and uninterrupted good understanding which has ever subsisted between the august court of London and the sublime Ottoman Porte, as well as the circumstances and situation of the war in which the two sovereigns of the British and Ottoman empires are engaged, in consequence of the perfidious and numerous aggressions of the French, have inspired those sovereigns with a mutual desire to draw still closer their ancient bond of friendship: And a definitive alliance having already been concluded between the Sublime Porte and his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, the friend and ally of his Britannic majesty, by which alliance, founded on the basis of a mutual guarantee of their empires, of the re-establishment and consolidation of general tranquillity, and of the preservation of the other powers, it is agreed that his Britannic majesty shall be invited to accede to it: Their said majesties, namely, his majesty George 3rd, king of Great Britain, &c. &c. &c. and his imperial majesty sultan Selim 3rd, the most mighty Ottoman emperor, equally desirous of contributing to the safety and to the interests of their respective subjects, and to the re-establishment of the general tranquillity of Europe, have, for these purposes, named for their plenipotentiaries; viz. the king of Great Britain, on his part, sir William Sidney Smith, knight, commander, grand cross of the royal military order of the Sword, and commodore of his squadron actually in the seas of the Levant, and John Spencer Smith, esquire, his minister plenipotentiary actually residing at the sublime Ottoman Porte; and his imperial majesty, on his part, the most excellent and most honourable Esseid Ibrahim Ismael Bey, distinguished by the title of Cazi Asker of Romilio, and formerly cadi of Constantinople, and Ahmed Aatif Reis Effendi, who, after having reciprocally communicated their full powers in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ART. 1.—His Britannic majesty, connected already with his majesty the emperor of Russia by the ties of the strictest alliance, accedes

by the present treaty, to the defensive alliance which has just been concluded between his majesty the Ottoman emperor and the emperor of Russia, as far as the stipulations thereof are applicable to the local circumstances of his empire, and of that of the sublime porte: And his majesty the Ottoman emperor enters reciprocally by this treaty into the same engagements towards his Britannic majesty, so that there shall exist for ever between the three empires, by virtue of the present defensive treaty, and of the alliances and treaties which already subsist, peace, good understanding, and perfect friendship, as well by sea as land, so that for the future the friends of one of the parties shall be the friends of the two others; and the enemies of one shall, in like manner, be considered as such by the others. On this account the two high contracting parties promise and engage to come to a frank and mutual understanding in all affairs in which their reciprocal safety and tranquillity may be interested, and to adopt, by common consent, the necessary measures to oppose every project hostile towards themselves, and to effectuate general tranquillity.

2. In order to give to this alliance a full and entire effect, the two high contracting parties mutually guarantee to each other their possessions; His Britannic majesty guarantees all the possessions of the Ottoman empire, without exception, such as they stood immediately before the invasion of the French in Egypt: And his majesty the Ottoman emperor guarantees all the possessions of Great Britain, without any exception whatever.

3. Notwithstanding the two contracting parties reserve to themselves the full right of entering into negotiation with other powers, and to conclude with them whatever treaties their interests may require, yet they mutually bind themselves in the strongest manner, that such treaties shall not contain any condition which can ever produce the least detriment, injury, or prejudice, to either of them, or affect the integrity of their dominions; on the contrary, they promise to regard and preserve, to their utmost, their reciprocal honour, safety, and advantage.

4. In every case of an hostile attack upon the dominions of one of the contracting parties, the succours which the other is to furnish shall be regulated by the principles of good faith, and in conformity with the close friendship subsisting between the two empires, according to the nature of the case.

5. Whenever the two contracting parties make common cause either with all their forces, or with the succours furnished by virtue of this alliance, neither party shall make either peace, or a durable truce, without comprising the other in it, and without stipulating for its safety; and in case of an attack against one of the two parties in hatred of the stipulations of this treaty, or of their faithful execution, the other party shall come to its assistance in the manner the most useful and the most conformable to the common interest, according to the exigency of the case.

6. The two high contracting parties have agreed and resolved, that when their fleets, squadrons, ships, and other vessels of war, shall meet, they shall salute each other, attention being paid on both sides, in order to begin the salute, to the superiority of rank of the commanders, manifested by the flag of command; and in case of an equality of rank no salute shall be made. The salute shall be answered by the same number of guns as were fired by the party first saluting. Boats shall be reciprocally sent upon these occasions for the purpose of concerting the mode of salute, in order to avoid all misunderstanding.

7. The trophies, and all the plunder taken from the enemy, shall be the property of the troops making such capture.

8. The two high contracting parties being actually engaged in war with the common enemy, have agreed to make common cause, and not to conclude any peace or truce but by common consent, as it has been stipulated in the fifth article; so that on the one side the Sublime Porte, notwithstanding the cessation of the actual attack directed against her dominions, shall be bound to continue the war, and to remain attached to the cause of her august allies, until the conclusion of a peace just and honourable, as well for them as for herself; and, on the other side, his Britannic majesty, shall be equally bound not to make peace with the common enemy without providing for the interests, the honour, and the safety of the Ottoman empire.

9. The two allies, making thus common cause, promise to communicate to each other their intentions relative to the duration of the war, and to the conditions of peace, governing themselves by just and equitable principles, and having an understanding with each other in this respect.

10. In order to render more efficacious the succour to be furnished on both sides during the war, according to the spirit of the present treaty of alliance, the two high contracting parties will concert together upon the operations most suitable to be made in order to render abortive the pernicious designs of the enemy in general, and especially in Egypt, and to destroy their commerce in the seas of the Levant, and in the Mediterranean; and for this purpose his majesty the Ottoman emperor engages not only to shut all his ports, without exception, against the commerce of the enemy, but likewise to employ against them in his dominions (and in order to prevent the execution of their ambitious projects) an army, consisting at least of 100,000 men, and even to augment it, in case of need, to the extent of his whole forces; he shall also put his naval forces in a state of preparation to act in concert with those of his allies in the seas above-mentioned;—and his Britanic majesty, on his part, reciprocally engages himself to employ in the same seas, a naval force always equal to that of the enemy, to annoy them; and to act in concert with the fleets of his allies, in order to impede the execution of their plans, and especially to prevent any attack upon the dominions or provinces of the Ottoman empire.

11. In as much as the presence of the British forces in the seas of the Levant has for its principal object the defence of the Ottoman coasts, and that desertion by weakening the means, must unavoidably hurt the cause, the two high contracting powers promise not to tolerate it under any pretext or motive.

12. Notwithstanding the two high contracting parties desire to maintain these engagements in force as long as possible, nevertheless, as circumstances might in time require some change, it is agreed to fix the term of eight years for this definitive treaty of defensive alliance, to be computed from the day of the ratifications being exchanged. At the expiration of this term, the two parties, shall enter into amicable explanations for the renewal of it, conforming themselves to the then situation of affairs.

13. The present treaty of defensive alliance shall be ratified by his majesty the king of Great Britain, and his majesty the emperor of the Ottomans; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Constantinople in three months, or sooner, if possible.

In Witness whereof, we, the undersigned ministers plenipotentiary aforesaid, have signed the present treaty of alliance; and have affixed to it the seal of our arms, together with that of his Britannic majesty's legation at the Sublime Ottoman Port. Done at Constantinople the fifth of January 1799.

On the 15th of December, both Houses adjourned for a week, and which mode was continued until the 19th of January, 1802, without any business of importance being agitated. On that day, the earl of Carlisle, in the Lords, pressed upon the attention of that House, the very great uneasiness which these short and repeated intermissions of the meetings of parliament had upon the people at large. He insisted, that it was the duty of ministers to assign their motives for adjourning that House so often. He wished to be informed, whether ministers had known of the intention of France to send a vast armament from that country to the West Indies before the signing of the definitive treaty of peace? Whether that was done in consequence of an agreement between the two countries? and, whether his majesty's ministers had taken the necessary precautions to guard against the consequences that might follow from the French having such a force in the West Indies? But it was not alone the great accession of force to France in that quarter of the world which was to be dreaded, the power of Spain would be vastly augmented; five Spanish ships of the line sailed from Brest with the French fleet, and under the protection of its flag; which, added to nine, the Spanish force at the Havannah, would render that power truly formidable. And all this was done before it was known whether Great Britain had made peace with Spain or not; because, his lordship added, for any thing we knew to the contrary, we were still at war with that power. He could find no document by which he was to conclude that we were at peace with her; and that, therefore, he wished his majesty's ministers would satisfy the public upon that head. He wished then to ask ministers, whether we were at peace with Spain or not? To that part of the preliminary treaty by which the island of Trinidad was ceded to this country, it did not appear that the consent of Spain had either been asked or obtained. No negotiation was carried on, nor treaty entered into between any Spanish and British minister. Was it not necessary then to know how we actually stood with respect to that country?—Lord Pelham, in reply, informed the House, that it was in consequence of a previous understanding between Great Britain and France, that the armament lately sailed from Brest; that that fleet had a particular destination and a specific object in view, and that it could not be contrary to the interests of Great Britain if it succeeded in its object.—Mr. Elliot, in the House of Commons, on the same day, and upon the same grounds with lord Carlisle, attacked the ministry. He took a view of the consequences which the sailing of the Brest fleet was likely to produce on the progress and conduct of the pending negotiation. Should war recommence, he said, the French might strike an immediate and dangerous blow in some of our most important colonial possessions. They had now the means of doing so, though it was probable they would delay the execution of their hostile designs. They would probably postpone the accomplishment of their ulterior objects of aggrandisement, until they had secured the vast cessions which the preliminary treaty had proposed that we should make them. Until then, France might allow us to enjoy peace, while we should be obliged to keep up an expensive establishment in the West Indies, to guard against her machinations. “Such was the peace we were to enjoy; a peace delusive and insecure; a peace which would operate to put France in possession of that which she had so long sought, a naval force, which he much feared would enable her to accomplish that in which all her hopes and wishes centered; that which all her exertions, intrigues, and state papers for years back have been contrived and calculated to produce; namely, what she called the liberty of the seas; but which would be, in fact, the annihilation of the commerce and consequence of Great Britain.” Mr. Chancellor Addington and lord Hawkesbury reduced the defence of the measures of administration, on the point alluded to, to two heads; first, that the sailing of the French fleet manifested no hostile purpose, and that previously to its having sailed, that there had been a communication with the British government upon the subject; and, secondly, that ministers had not neglected to take every precautionary measure to guard against any prejudicial effects that might be apprehended. For the fact of both these assertions, they claimed the confidence of the House, as at present it was too delicate a matter upon which to enter into a full explanation.—Repeated adjournments of the sitting of parliament still continued to fill up the anxious interval which occurred until the signature of the definitive treaty. The death of the earl of Clare, lord high chancellor of Ireland, caused a vacancy in the chair of the House of Commons, his majesty having been pleased to appoint sir John Mitford, the Speaker, to fill up that high office.

Mr. Speaker Mitford resigns.] Feb. 9, 1802. Mr. Ley, the clerk at the table, acquainted the House, that he had, this morning, received a letter from Mr. Speaker; which he read to the House as follows:

“Sir; His majesty having been graciously pleased to signify his intention of appointing me chancellor of Ireland, it has become my duty to resign the chair of the House of Commons; which I request you to communicate to the House, at their meeting this day. I must entreat you at the same time to express to them, in the strongest terms, the regret with which I quit the high situation to which their favour had raised me; and my gratitude for their constant and kind assistance and support, in my humble attempts to discharge the arduous duties of that important office. I have the honour to be, &c.

"John Ley, esq. JOHN MITFORD."

&c. &c. &c."

After which, and before any member spoke, the mace was brought into the House by the serjeant, and laid under the table. Then Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the House, that his majesty, under the circumstances referred to in Mr. Speaker's Letter, gives leave to this House to proceed to the choice of a new Speaker; and that it is his majesty's pleasure that this House should present their Speaker on Thursday next, in the House of Peers, for his royal approbation.

Mr. Abbot Chosen Speaker.] Feb. 10. The Serjeant having brought the Mace, and laid it under the table,

The Master of the Rolls (sir W. Grant) rose and said:—Mr. Ley; the event which was yesterday announced to the House renders it necessary for us to supply the vacancy, in the office of Speaker, which that event has occasioned. It is impossible not to regret that we should so soon be deprived of the services of one, who, in the short time that he has filled the Chair, has so amply justified the choice that placed him in it. Indeed, with knowledge so various and so profound, with information at once so accurate and so extensive, as he possessed, he could not fail to do credit to that situation, even difficult as his predecessor had made it for any man to appear in it to advantage. It is some consolation, that, if he be lost to our immediate service, a great and valuable portion of the empire is about to enjoy the benefit of his talents in its first place of judicial magistracy. How he will fill that place, can be no doubt with those who know, that in the whole compass of legal science, there is nothing which his capacious mind has not embraced, from the minutest rules of forensic practice, to the most enlarged principles of general jurisprudence. Fortunately for the country the talents it produces are adequate to the various services which it requires. The House abounds with knowledge and ability of every description. Yet I believe that, on such occasions as the present, gentlemen naturally turn their thoughts towards a few, as more peculiarly qualified, by their studies, and pursuits, for the discharge of the duties of the Chair. Among those to whom our attention is thus directed, it may not be easy to find decisive motives of preference; but by our choice, it is eminent, not exclusive fitness that is implied. From our selection of one, it is not to be inferred, that there are not others who would honourably and ably discharge the same trust if they were invested with it. If a knowledge of the laws and constitution of our country—if a thorough acquaintance with our parliamentary history, and with those records in which are treasured up, as well the rules and usages that govern our proceedings, as the principles and practices which have gradually developed themselves in the admirable constitution we now enjoy—if a constant endeavour to direct the attention of the House to measures of great national utility, and an active and persevering industry in carrying those measures into effect when adopted by the House—if a firmness and an integrity that ensure upright conduct and impartial decision—if these be qualifications for the high station which is now vacant, I am convinced that the gentleman whom I mean to propose for the consideration of the House possesses eminent fitness for that station—for that these qualifications do belong to him will, I hope, be admitted, when I say that Mr. Abbot is the gentleman to whom I allude. All who have sat in the House with that right hon. gentleman, have witnessed the extent and the value of his labours. They have seen that his parliamentary life has been one continued series of useful exertion. To that exertion the public is already indebted for several beneficial arrangements. In collecting the materials, and laying the foundation of many others, he has been mainly instrumental. If such have been the spontaneous efforts of his zeal as a private member of parliament, what may we not expect from that zeal, when directed to the performance of high official duties, and stimulated by the animating influence of illustrious examples? I move, Sir, "That the right hon. Charles Abbot do take the Chair as Speaker."

Mr. Baker took great pleasure in seconding the motion. He had witnessed in the right hon. gentleman proposed to fill the chair, the most careful investigation of subjects the most intricate and laborious, and the frequent exertion of qualities the most essential to the discharge of the high duty which he was now proposed to fill. He came most happily recommended by the temper, moderation, and steadiness with which he had not only made the arrangements he had engaged in, but with which he had met the difficulties and the objections which he had to encounter in their prosecution. There was another circumstance which should also recommend him to the choice of the House; Mr. Abbot was at a time of life which permitted the House to look for his continuing long in the office; a circumstance which should not to be overlooked, as frequent changes were apt to obstruct the progress of public business.

Mr. Sheridan said:—When the right hon. gentleman, now appointed to a very high office, was named as a proper person to fill the chair of this House, I had the misfortune to differ from those by whom he was proposed, and I proposed another. I will not mention the removal of that person without joining in the commendations bestowed on him, or without declaring that I think his present appointment a public benefit. Having, been of a different opinion from those by whom that gentleman was proposed, I should act wrong if I did not now hold a similar conduct; for the same motives remain. In pursuing this conduct, I disclaim all personal opposition. I join most warmly in the praises bestowed on the right hon. gentleman already proposed; but I cannot help condemning the practice of looking only to the law for persons to fill our chair. It was anciently the custom to look to individuals not holding offices dependent on the pleasure of the crown. It is the undoubted right of the crown to dispose of all offices dependent on the crown; but it is the right of the House to appoint its Speaker, and the House ought to be jealous of the disposal of an appointment peculiarly its own. If the House concurs always in appointing persons holding offices under government, it seems to me to be in some degree deferring to the crown. I believe the right hon. gentleman now proposed holds a place under the crown; but possibly he has resigned it. I have at one time said, that such resignations were not quite so decorous. It seems to be presuming too much on the certainty of being appointed to hold a nomination equivalent to an election. It is not so honourable in the House to seem to accept their Speaker from the nomination of a minister. I wish that we should stand free from the suspicion, and choose for ourselves; and I have no doubt that we can find persons fully qualified to fill the chair, without looking to that legal knowledge which is by no means requisite in order to fill it with dignity and impartiality. I have no doubt that we can find persons so qualified, independent of the crown, and free from party connexion. As to age, that indeed would be a material recommendation of the right hon. gentleman, if death alone were to remove him from the chair; but we have now had sufficient experience of the gentlemen of the law, to know that, though they call this the height of their ambition, yet, if any thing higher should be offered to them, they leave us to lament the loss of their experience and abilities. It is under these impressions, that I propose Mr. Charles Dundas; at the same time assuring the right hon. gentleman proposed on the other side, that if he shall be elected, as, from the quarter from whence he is proposed I have no doubt he will be, his exertions in the chair shall have my cordial support.

Lord George Cavendish seconded the motion. He acknowledged that Mr. Abbot possessed all the qualifications that had been ascribed to him, but he objected to his election, because he had so recently held an office under the crown. The same objection could not be urged against his hon. friend, whose other virtues and qualifications were so well known, that it was unnecessary for him to detain the House by enumerating them.

Mr. Courtenay was glad to see the motion seconded by the noble lord, and fully concurred in the eulogium bestowed on the late Speaker, whose conduct in the chair had acquired him the unanimous approbation of the House. Neither did he doubt but that the learned gentleman who was proposed to succeed him, would exert similar abilities, when once placed in office. His occult qualities might then burst forth in all their lustre, though no person before had suspected their existence. Yet, with all these qualities to recommend him, he could not help thinking that there was another gentleman in the House (Mr. Addington) who possessed still more appropriate talents for the office, and whom the House would no doubt rejoice to see again in the chair. But it might be objected, that that gentleman already filled a very high political situation, from which he could not be removed without imminent danger to the public service. This objection was, however, easily to be got over, for the gentleman now proposed for the chair would, with perhaps equal ability, fill that high ministerial office; for great offices had a wonderful power in bringing out latent talents, which even the possessors did not dream that they possessed, until thus placed in an eminent station. There was a certain friction connected with a great place, that elicited a blaze of abilities equal, if not superior, to the office itself. Besides, the office of Speaker disentangled the mind from all the shackles of partiality; the practice of that impartiality begot a principle which made a man stifle even his private wishes; and if he afterwards passed into a greater situation, he carried that principle of impartiality along with him. This the House must have seen realized very recently; for this habit of the chair so prevailed of late with a right hon. gentleman (whom he wished to see again in that office) that after several hours contest, it was impossible to say whether that right hon. gentleman, on the occasion alluded to, was more disposed to support his old friends or his new allies. Perhaps, however, there might be some parliamentary impediment in the way of his re-election to the place of Speaker: if so, Mr. Ley would explain. All that he had in view was to see every man in the station for which he was best fitted.

Mr. Abbot said:—In offering myself to the notice of the House upon the present occasion, it is impossible that I should not feel the strongest emotions of respect to the House, and gratitude to my friends. But I cannot persuade myself that the partiality and kindness of my hon. friends, who have stood forward to-day, can be accepted by the House as proofs of my fitness for the high and honourable office which is now vacant. To reflect upon the learning, the talents, and the virtues which have for so many centuries successively dignified that Chair, must fill any man with a just apprehension of his own insufficiency to execute its various duties with the dignity and ability which so important a trust demands. If, indeed, an ardent zeal for the constitution, a rooted attachment to the privileges of this House, and a sincere admiration of its invaluable forms of proceeding, may be considered as sufficient qualities for such a choice,—I believe they belong in common to every member of this House:—and so far unquestionably, if the House shall think fit to grant its indulgent support to any of its members in that high office, he may accomplish much; although if that support be withheld, or withdrawn, his best endeavours will be ineffectual. I have only to add, that my humble services are at the disposal of the House; and whether they shall be pleased to accept, or reject them, no event can diminish my respect for its determinations.

Mr. Charles Dundas frankly confessed that, in point of abilities, he could not come in competition with the learned gentleman who spoke last. His habits of life precluded him from such pretensions. They were the habits of a country gentleman, who aimed at nothing more than honestly doing the business of his constituents in parliament. The eminent talents which distinguished the two hon. gentlemen who had lately filled the chair, had given him a full idea of the great qualities necessary to the discharge of such an arduous duty, and made him sensible that he was incapable of the same exertion. He hoped, therefore, he should be permitted to decline an office which he was not qualified adequately to fill, and that the hon. gentleman who made the motion in his favour would withdraw it.

Mr. Ormsby said, it was highly gratifying to Irishmen, that his majesty had been pleased to reward, with a high situation in Ireland, a right hon. gentleman who had been so eminent for his political services in this country; and at the same time he must observe, that by the vote of that day, the sister kingdom would lose as useful and persevering a friend, as ever had the management of her affairs. The right hon. gentleman now proposed to fill that chair, had shown as much zeal to promote the best interests of Ireland as ever any man had done; the whole island was unanimous in his praise.

The question being put by the clerk, "That the right hon. Charles Abbot do take the Chair of this House, as Speaker," was agreed to. Whereupon Mr. Abbot was conducted to the chair by the master of the Rolls and Mr. Baker; where, standing upon the upper step of the chair, he again addressed himself to the House, and made his respectful acknowledgments to the House, for the high honour conferred upon him; and assured the House that it should be his constant endeavour to merit their good opinion, by a diligent and impartial discharge of his duty. And then he sat down in the chair; and the mace (which before lay under the table) was laid, by the serjeant, upon the table. And Mr. Secretary at War congratulated Mr. Speaker elect. After which the House adjourned. On the following day, Mr. Abbot was presented in the House of Peers, for the royal approbation, and approved of by the king.

"GEORGE R.

"His Majesty feels great concern in acquainting the House of Commons, that the provision made by parliament for defraying the expenses of his household and civil government has been found inadequate to their support.—A considerable debt has in consequence been unavoidably incurred, an account of which he has ordered to be laid before this House.—His Majesty relies with confidence on the zeal and affection of his faithful Commons, that they will take the same into their early consideration, and adopt such measures as the circumstances may appear to them to require. G. R."

The Message was ordered to be referred to a Committee of Supply; and on the following day, the chancellor of the exchequer, by command of his majesty, presented the accounts respecting the civil list.

Debate in the Commons on appointing a Committee to consider the Civil List Accounts.] Feb. 17. Mr. Chancellor Addington rose and said:—Sir; I rise in pursuance of notice, to move that the several accounts relative to the expenditure of the civil list, be referred to a committee. If I were to follow the practice usually adopted upon these occasions, I should merely move, that the said accounts be referred to a committee of supply. But it appears to me to be due to the House, to the public, and to his majesty himself, that the circumstances which have occasioned such an accumulation of debts as appears upon these accounts should be fully investigated, as I am thoroughly convinced, if it should be the pleasure of the House to appoint the committee, that the result will convince every member that the causes which have occasioned this accumulation were, in a great degree, unavoidable. It will be recollected, that sixteen years have now elapsed since the arrangements and schedules were made, with reference to the various branches of the civil list to be provided for by parliament. Let the House recollect what has been the operation of the numerous articles of expenditure of which that civil list is composed. Let gentlemen advert to their own domestic concerns, and they will not be at a loss to account for a very large portion of that debt, the particulars of which are submitted to the House in these accounts. Sir, it would be inconsistent with the purpose for which the committee is to be appointed, if I were to enter into an enumeration of the receipts or expenditure of the civil list. All I wish is, that the House should go to the inquiry without any preconceived opinion, with respect to the nature of the debt, or the circumstances which have led to its accumulation. If the committee should be appointed, when the report shall have been made, I should wish the discussion should be as minute and ample as the importance of the subject undoubtedly requires. At present I shall move, "That a committee be appointed, to take into consideration the several accounts which were yesterday presented to the House by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his majesty's command, relating to his majesty's civil list; and that they do examine the said accounts, and report the same, as they shall appear to them, together with their observations thereupon, to the House."

Mr. Manners Sutton (Solicitor General to the Prince of Wales) said:—I hope, Sir, it will not be deemed improper in me to state to the House a circumstance relative to the affairs of his royal highness the prince of Wales, which appears to me necessary to be mentioned. It is well known, that the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall are a part of the revenues of the crown, till the birth of the eldest son of the king; and that on the birth of such eldest son the title becomes immediately vested in him as proprietor of the duchy, with all the rights, immunities, and privileges belonging to the same. Of course, these revenues are a fund to be secured during the minority of the prince of Wales, for his benefit. In the present instance, these funds were not so applied, but were applied in aid of the civil list, which must have been increased from other sources if these funds had not existed. Therefore, in taking the account, though it may be said to be a question between his majesty and the prince of Wales, yet in reality, the question arises between the prince of Wales and the public. The public have received that revenue which was the property of the prince of Wales. If that could be a question between his majesty and the prince of Wales, I know his royal highness would readily consent to forego much of his right—he would sacrifice any thing to the feelings of his majesty on such a subject. The House may rest assured, that what I have stated are the genuine sentiments of the prince of Wales; but, Sir, this is certainly not a question between his majesty and his royal highness it is a claim he has on the public, for that which the public have received and not accounted for. When I state that the prince of Wales has an undoubted right to the dukedom of Cornwall, I state it not on my own opinion, but I speak from the concurrent testimony of many of the most eminent men in the profession of the law; and particularly of one of the most experienced and learned men at the bar, I mean Mr. Mansfield, who in concurrence with another gentleman of equal celebrity, has given the most decided opinion in favour of the right. I am aware, that some years ago, when this question was likely to be agitated, two very high and distinguished persons expressed doubts as to the right; but if the same state of facts had been laid before the learned gentleman to whom I have alluded, and my learned friend on my left hand, they would not, I am persuaded, have expressed any doubt as to the right of the prince of Wales to the revenue of his own property. The amount of this revenue, from the year 1762, the period of the birth of the prince of Wales, to the year 1783, when his royal highness came of age, is little short of 400,000*l*. Calculating this fund, with the rate of interest, it would have amounted, upon a fair estimation, to 900,000*l*. I do not mean to say, that some deduction should not be made on account of the expenses of the prince of Wales during his minority—for this I deduct 12,000*l*. a-year, granted out of the civil list, and 6,000*l*. more provided out of his majesty's privy purse. Whether the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall were applicable to the prince of Wales as an establishment for him till the year 1781, or not, yet, giving credit for the deduction and the allowance by his majesty, there would still remain, due to his highness, for the residue of the revenue of his duchy a sum of at least between 6 and 700,000*l*. Now, Sir, in the several provisions made for the establishment of the prince of Wales, as heir apparent to the crown, this was never taken into consideration; and I am convinced, it never could have been considered that any of the supplies voted by the House to his royal highness were intended as a satisfaction, in lieu of the revenue of the duchy of Cornwall. If I am not in an error, the account will stand thus: In 1781, there was a sum of 60,000*l*. voted to defray those expenses which occur to every one in the outset of life, and naturally to be expected with regard to the heir apparent. In 1787, there was a further sum of 160,000*l*. and 20,000*l*. for completing Carlton-house. In 1795, there was a sum of 20,000*l*. granted for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the marriage of his royal highness with the princess Caroline. The whole of this amounts to 260,000*l*.; and with respect to those items which relate to Carlton-house, the money ought not to be considered as spent by the prince of Wales, as it was laid out in the completion of a building in which the public has an interest. This will reduce the sum received by his royal highness to about 240,000*l*. a sum very short of what he is entitled to. I have certainly not taken into this calculation the annual income voted by parliament to the prince of Wales. It would be very unreasonable, indeed, that the income of his royal highness should be diminished, because he happens to be a creditor of the public. If we compare the income granted to the present heir apparent, with that which was allotted by parliament to his predecessor, the father of his majesty, it will be found that, with reference to the different periods, the amount is nearly the same. In 1742, the sum of 100,000*l*. a-year was granted to his royal highness Frederick prince of Wales. He was then only twenty-four years of age; and it was stated, that an income to such an extent was not entirely necessary to defray his expenses, but to enable him to support his rank and dignity. The income to the present prince of Wales was, in 1783, 50,000*l.* In 1787 it was increased to 60,000*l.*, and in 1795 to 120,000*l.*, of which 70,000*l.* a-year was appropriated, by act of parliament, to the liquidation of his debts. Every one knows how much his royal highness has reduced every expense in his establishment. I think, when I state what has been, and is, the income of the present prince of Wales, and compare it with what was the income of his grandfather, prince Frederick,—when I state, that in 1742, 100,000*l.* was not thought too much for those necessities and luxuries which a prince has a right to expect, it will not be conceived, by any one, that the income of his royal highness has been increased on account of any debt supposed to be due to his royal highness from the public. I hope, Sir, in making this statement, I have not said any thing that for a moment may excite an idea, that his royal highness has authorised me to express, on his part, any disappointment or dissatisfaction, or that he means to make the least complaint of the proceedings of parliament with regard to him: on the contrary, I know his royal highness feels impressed with gratitude for the obligations he owes to this House. I am persuaded he is satisfied, that, whenever his interest has been the subject of deliberation, the House has discharged its duty to the public and to himself. I have been anxious to state thus much, that the House and the public should be in full possession of the fact. It is important to the prince of Wales, that the public should know, that great as are the expenses imposed on him by his high rank and illustrious situation, they have not fallen heavy on the people of the country, or added to the distress and difficulty of the times. Looking, Sir, to the accounts, and considering them in the point of view in which I have submitted them to the House, I am convinced it will be found, that his royal highness has not received more than he is entitled to, but that a considerable balance is due to him, and that he is the creditor, and not the debtor, of the public. I have been desirous of removing any wrong impression which might have been entertained with respect to that illustrious personage, in whose honour and welfare every well-affected man in the kingdom is so deeply interested. I hope I have said nothing that has the remotest tendency either to embarrass the present government, or to reflect upon the conduct of the former. As to the rights of the prince of Wales to the revenues of the dukedom of Cornwall, though they unquestionably exist, yet I admit it is not the business of the chancellor of the exchequer to assert them. If the House shall think proper, at any time, further to investigate this matter, it will be my duty to afford every assistance in my power; but the House will forgive me for observing, that I think a motion upon such a subject would come with more propriety from some gentleman who is better known to the House than I have the honour to be.

Mr. Fox said:—Sir, I feel myself called upon to say a few words. The House, I am sure, is much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his very clear and able statement of the claims of the prince of Wales to the arrears of the duchy of Cornwall. I agree almost in every thing he has said, and sincerely hope that the matter will be seriously taken up by the House. I not only agree with the positions of the hon. gentleman, but I highly approve of the way in which he has unfolded them. If I do not agree with him when he says that no blame is to be attached to the present or former administration, I must admire his prudence in making the concession. But I must beg leave to set him right, when he says that his royal highness's claims have never been asserted. That they have never been effectually asserted, I allow. I myself have had the honour to state them several times, and to urge that they should be satisfied. If I do not now make any motion in support of them, it is not that my opinions are changed, but because I judge, from past experience, that there are others by whom they may be asserted with greater effect. In my opinion, his royal highness's claims are just; at any rate, they are well entitled to a candid discussion. The hon. gentleman says, he will press no motion, but will leave the subject to be taken up by others. In this I must differ from him. I think his royal highness could not have been better advised than to make this application to the House. I am clearly of opinion, that the sums voted to pay his royal highness's debts ought to be deducted, whatever may be said of the 60,000*l.* granted him on coming of age. But it is the duty of the House, either immediately to allow him the remainder, or to declare that his demands are groundless. He has laboured under hardships, and suffered vexation which, to an individual of any rank, must be almost insupportable. All his private affairs have been disclosed; his debts have been stated and commented upon; when, if he had received what was due to him, he never would have had occasion to apply for assistance. You have conferred upon him as a favour, what perhaps you would have been unjust in withholding from him; and perhaps he had a right to more than he has ever obtained.—The learned gentleman said, his royal highness has never complained of the restrictions under which he has been laid. If he were dissatisfied, I am the person whom he ought chiefly to blame: the measure of appropriating 70,000*l.* a year to the liquidation of his debts was of my proposal. His royal highness knows that, besides the respect I owe to him as heir apparent to the crown, he has ever had my best wishes for his honour, prosperity, and happiness. I therefore found it painful to propose such a step, but I considered it as my duty. I thought 120,000*l.* by no means too large an income to be granted to his royal highness. If Frederick prince of Wales, in 1742, was allowed 100,000*l.*, 125,000*l.* was by no means an increased allowance. There is another mode in which its amount may be estimated: let it be compared with the civil list, and particularly with the sums appropriated to those parts of it which correspond with the establishment of the prince. It will then be seen, that it was liberal, but by no means extravagant. Why, then, did I suggest and support a scheme which reduced it to 50,000*l.*? His allowance was at first too small, and the debts incurred, through this ill-judged parsimony, I thought the House bound to discharge. But when a settlement had been made, and his royal highness, though imprudently, had professed himself satisfied, I did not think it consistent with his honour to accept of money from the public to pay the debts which he had subsequently incurred.—If this reasoning was just, and if this plan was judicious, they will apply equally well to the civil list; and I should think most meanly of myself indeed, if I should not act in the same manner to his majesty himself. This will be a most material consideration, when the report of the committee shall come to be discussed. I believe there was nothing wrong in showing the usual respect to his majesty by referring his speech to a committee of supply; and as it is very necessary that an investigation should take place previous to this committee being gone into, I readily support the motion. But I should be extremely sorry if this vote should be construed into an acquiescence in the prayer of the message. On a future occasion I shall deliver my sentiments more at large; at present I shall content myself with laying down one general principle:—It is a material feature in our history, that, ever since the Revolution, immediately upon the accession of the prince to the throne, a grant has been made of the civil list for life. Upon this point, considerable contrariety of opinion prevailed, and some imagined that the grant should only be from year to year. Strong arguments in support of this opinion may be advanced, but it is not necessary here to adduce them. I shall merely say, that I have long considered the question with all the attention of which I am capable, and that, after the most mature deliberation, I am persuaded that our ancestors were wise in granting the civil list for life. When the question is revived, if my advice be taken, their example will be imitated. But, though an ample provision is made, it ought to be limited; a contrary system combines the disadvantages of both the others. If the civil list is frequently brought into parliament for aid, the provision is without limits. To say that expense has been increased by unforeseen circumstances, is nugatory; every period is subject to a variation of circumstances; and to pretend that, on this account, the allowance should be varied, is directly to abet the system of granting the civil list from year to year. If you cannot judge what will be a sufficient allowance for a series of years, a grant for life is absurd. Why will you vote 800,000*l.* a-year, when you are not sure but 1,000,000*l.* or 1,200,000*l.* will be required? The public in this way must be losers. The allowance cannot be diminished, whatever happy change of circumstances should occur; and whenever there is a pretended occasion for increased expense their burthens are augmented. I am friendly to a grant for life; but it is of the essence of such a provision that it should be strictly limited. I would have his majesty's ministers suit the expenses to the provision, not the provision to the expenses. These applications are founded upon quite a different principle, and suppose that the limitation of a particular sum by parliament is a mere form, and that every expense, however unnecessary or profuse, is to be supplied without reluctance. In every point of view the practice is mischievous. I shall suppose circumstances which it will be seen never existed in this reign. If politics were, as in the reigns of king William and queen Anne, perhaps I might say of George 1st and George 2nd, the most serious consequences might be felt from this practice. If the prince wanted money, not for purposes adverse to the interests of the country, but for purposes in which the country is not concerned, might he not go between Tories and Whigs to see who would give most? And might not political men barter the public money for royal favour? If the debts of the prince are to be paid, the case is the same. He readily allows his affairs to be involved, in the prospect of parliamentary assistance; and a minister is selected, not from his capacity, not from his esteem with the public, not even from personal favour; the only criterion of merit is compliance and profusion. As this is injurious to the constitution, so is it injurious to the prince himself. The crown becomes dependent upon parliament. No one will suspect me of a wish to make the crown independent; but this sort of dependance is highly unworthy of it. The prince is tempted into expense, and, to extricate himself, may be forced to practices unbecoming his station.—On the first view of the subject, I am against discharging these debts with the public money. That it may not appear proper to put them in a course of liquidation, like those of the prince of Wales, I by no means affirm. This will be better discussed upon the report. If you should at once clear them off, you would do the greatest injustice to the prince of Wales. There is no reason why there should be one rule for the son, and another for the father. His majesty expressed the most perfect satisfaction with the provision that had been made for him; and if, through the negligence of his servants, his expenses have exceeded it, the same plan should be adopted which met with the approbation of the House on a similar occasion.—I hope, then, the hon. member who has mentioned the subject of the prince's claims, will take an early opportunity of bringing it forward. I take shame to myself, that, in 1783, when I was a member of the administration, I did not bring it forward. From the day his royal highness attained his twenty-first year, to the present hour, the subject has lain dormant. Surely, then, his royal highness has waited sufficiently long the justice of the House; and, it is to be hoped it will now be speedily and finally settled. I should not be prone to encourage claims of this nature, if they were not justly founded; but I am perfectly convinced, that every shilling of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall due to the prince of Wales (as having been applied either to the uses of the public, or of the king's civil list), ought to be paid him by the nation.

Mr. Pitt said:—After the claim advanced on the part of his royal highness, and stated with so much propriety and ability by the hon. gentleman, I do think it becomes the justice of the House to put the subject in the way of inquiry, in order that the point may be finally ascertained. I should be guilty of drawing the House into a premature discussion, if I were now to state my opinion upon the subject. I also acquiesce in the present motion; but, until the House has had an opportunity of ascertaining the cause of the deficiency of the civil list, it would be premature to enter into the merits of the question. While I agree with the hon. gentleman, that the grant for life of the civil list, is comparatively the best, I cannot agree in his conclusion, that parliament, by providing at the beginning of every reign a civil list for life, thereby precludes itself from granting such further sums as a change of circumstances may require.

Mr. Nicholls thought, that all the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall ought to have been accumulated during the minority of the prince, and paid over to him when he came of age. In an act passed in the 8th year of his present majesty, intituled, "An Act to enable his Majesty to make grants of Lands Parcel of the Duchy of Cornwall," the prince is stated to be the proprietor of the duchy of Cornwall. It was necessary that leases and grants should be made of the possessions of the duchy, and the king is enabled by the act to make grants of the lands; there was no clause in the act giving to the king the money arising from those sales; there was not even an estate vested in the king for the purposes of the trust, but a bare naked power unaccompanied with an interest. What colour, then, could there be for considering the money arising from these grants, as money belonging to the king? It certainly belonged to him whose lands were granted; yet the ministers for the time being had seized this money as belonging to the king. The argument, that the prince's revenues, during his minority, were applicable to his maintenance, could by no possibility be of force in this case. If the revenues annually arising from the prince's lands were applicable to his maintenance, it could not be thought reasonable that the lands themselves should be sold, and the money arising from those sales applied to his maintenance. Even if the money arising from those grants, during his minority, had been accumulated and paid to the prince on his coming of age, it would be but a poor compensation for the loss he had sustained from the grants which had been made under this act. The lands of the duchy of Cornwall were in general leased only for thirty-one years. If no leases had been made during the minority of the prince, many of the leases would have been expired when he attained the age of twenty-one. No lease could possibly have had more than ten years to run. The prince, by the grant of new leases, might perhaps have raised a sum exceeding that which had been named by the learned gentleman. The money received for these leases, even had it been accumulated and paid to the prince, was a poor compensation. But, in fact, none of it had ever reached the prince; it had been seized by the ministers, and applied to the purposes of the civil list. Parliament was bound to see that this money was forthcoming for the use of the prince. It was not quite correct to say that no claim had ever been made by the prince. A petition of right had been presented by the prince to the late chancellor; that petition of right had not been sent to any court of justice to be examined; and this was an additional reason why the claim should be inquired into by parliament. Former parliaments had protected the property of the prince of Wales. In the fifth of Hen. 4th the Commons petitioned the king, that measures might be taken to revoke certain grants made by Richard 2nd of lands parcel of the duchy of Cornwall, which grants had been confirmed by Henry 4th. In consequence of this application from the House, a writ of scire facias was brought in chancery, in the king's name, and the grants revoked. In the present case, parliament, which, by passing the act enabling the king to make grants of the lands, had deprived the prince of his right, was more strongly called on to see that the money which had been received on the sale of these lands should be paid over to the prince.

The motion was then agreed to, and a committee appointed.

Feb. 22. Mr. Manners Sutton said, that having called the attention of the House on a former occasion to the claims of the prince of Wales, to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, he wished now to inform them, that while it was the desire of the prince that the subject should be thoroughly investigated, he was authorised by his royal highness to intimate to the House, that he should defer bringing forward the subject, until after the question relative to his majesty's civil list should be determined. He hoped therefore that gentlemen would abstain, in the course of the discussion of that question, from making any allusion to the claims of his royal highness.

Debate in the Commons on the Army Estimates.] March 3. The House having resolved itself into a committee of supply, to which the army estimates were referred, The Secretary at War said, that the estimates were for sixty-one days, and related to some of the most pressing and important, but not to all the services. They were calculated exactly on the same scale with the estimates of last year. He then moved, "That a number of land forces, including 7,175 invalids, not exceeding 61,176 men, be employed in Great Britain, the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, &c. from the 25th of March to the 24th of May next."

Mr. Elliot said, he could not consider the motion as a mere matter of course, as he should do if the country was actually in a state of war; and therefore, though he strongly approved of the principle of keeping up a large force, yet he could not assent to the motion, without stating the motives which influenced his conduct. It had always been the custom for this country, when she was regulating the degree of force which it was proper for her to keep on foot, to pay a due regard to the situation and disposition of the continental powers, and to proportion her preparations to the state of other nations. It was on this principle that he felt the strongest conviction of the necessity of keeping up the large force which had been proposed. He was the more confirmed in this opinion, when he took into his consideration that strange and alarming succession of events which had occurred since the signature of the preliminaries of peace. Before he proceeded further, however, he would anticipate some of the arguments which he foresaw would be used against him, and endeavour to take off a kind of proscription which existed against him, because he had the misfortune to differ from the majority of the House, and from his majesty's ministers, on the subject of the preliminary treaty. While, however, he submitted to the collective wisdom of the House, he had no hesitation in declaring, that his sentiments with regard to that treaty remained unaltered, and that every day's experience had more and more confirmed him in the opinion which he had originally formed. He thought then, and he thought now, that when the noble lord (Hawkesbury) put his signature to the preliminaries, he put his hand to an instrument fraught with danger and humiliation to this country—to an instrument from which posterity would date the decline of this country. Parliament, however, had thought otherwise; and, as he had before stated, he submitted to their judgment. But although the House had given its sanction to those preliminary articles, it was not bound to adhere to the opinion it had expressed, if all the circumstances upon which that opinion was given had been since that time completely changed. One of the circumstances to which he alluded was, the extraordinary scene which had lately been played in Italy. Many persons were induced to approve of the preliminaries, from a hope that the government of France would in future act with moderation, and endeavour to consolidate the power which she had acquired. They thought, that although the Cisalpine republic was in a considerable degree under the influence of France, she might by degrees acquire a sort of independence, and form a sort of barrier between France and Italy. But subsequent events had completely undeceived those who entertained such hopes, and had shown them, that they were ignorant of that furious lust of power which actuated the government of France. If that government had stopped in her career for a moment, it was only to take breath, that she might renew it with redoubled vigour. We had seen an immense force sail from the ports of France, Spain, and Holland, without, as he believed, any communication of the specific object of that expedition. We had seen the chief consul of France go to Lyons, and, without any communication to any of the powers of Europe, declare that there was not one person in all the states which compose the Cisalpine republic, fit to be intrusted with the government of that country, and that, therefore, he would take it upon himself. He was, he confessed, seriously alarmed at this mode of reasoning which the chief consul had adopted; because, if we submitted to this incroachment, it was impossible to say that he might not, at a future period, apply it to this country, and graciously condescend to take us under his protection. The chief consul then returned to Paris, after having made himself president of the Italian republic, annexed all that rich country to France, and converted it into cantonments for French troops. But this was not all, he had also acquired the whole of the island of Elba: that island was, by the treaty of Luneville, to be annexed to the duchy of Tuscany; and immediately after he stipulated for the possession of Porto Ferrajo. Another point to which he must call the attention of the House was, that France had, by another treaty, acquired a very considerable territory on the banks of the Mississippi, and the means of supplying her West India islands independent of this country. He did not mean now, to ask in what situation we stood with relation to the president of the Italian republic, whether it was peace or war; but he could not help entering his protest against that act of fraud, ambition, and insolence. But he did hope the noble lord would explain to the committee, how it happened, that when we were discussing the preliminaries of peace, we thought we were giving Porto Ferrajo to Tuscany, when, in fact, we were giving it to France; and how it happened, that when we were giving back to France her West India possessions, we did not know that she had acquired possessions in that quarter which would render her colonies much more advantageous to her? He did, however, believe that ministers were, at that time, themselves ignorant of these circumstances. If, however, instead of treating with France in the name of her allies, we had treated with those allies conjointly with her, it was impossible but we must have known the relation in which she stood to other countries. If ministers had not taken the necessary means to inform themselves upon this subject, they had been guilty of negligence; if they did ask the question, and obtained no satisfactory answer, they were wrong in suffering the country to be treated with such indignity.—He must now allude to another circumstance, which formed a lamentable supplement to what he had already stated; which was, that since the signing of the preliminaries, a very large portion of the French, Spanish, and Dutch navies had sailed from their ports. It was true, we had also sent a large force to the West Indies; but it was difficult to guess what fleet the French thought they could have to contend against, in which such a force would be necessary, unless it was against the fleet of this country. It was undoubtedly true, that France, as well as every other state, had a right to dispose of her force as she pleased; but we had an equal right to make representations upon the subject, and even to resist an expedition, if it was dangerous to us. In 1773, when there was a war between the Russians and Turks, and when the former had obtained some considerable advantages in the Mediterranean, France fitted out from Toulon a squadron of observation on the Russian fleet. Upon that occasion we remonstrated with the court of France, and said, that if they persisted, we would send out a fleet of observation on the French fleet, and send out ship for ship with them: the consequence of this was, that France relinquished her design. On the present occasion we ought to have made a similar representation; and France would either have listened to it, or, by refusing to do so, would have shown her real disposition. It might be said, that France had no transports, and was always in the habit of sending out her troops in ships of the line; but if she had no transports, surely she had interest enough with Spain and Holland to procure them; indeed, it would have even been more satisfactory if we had furnished her with transports ourselves, provided we were convinced of the propriety of the expedition. These were shortly his reasons for voting for a continuance of our large establishments. The effect of this conduct on the part of France was, to make us keep up a very large force; in the mean time, trade was suspended, and we were left in a situation, in which we could neither obtain the advantages of war, nor enjoy the blessings of peace.

Lord Hawkesbury said, he was ready to admit, that the inconveniencies which attended a protracted negotiation were very serious; but if any gentleman would consider the great variety of interests that were to be discussed in the present negotiation, and the great number of points that must necessarily come under consideration, he would not think this negotiation had continued to an extraordinary length. In 1783, when there were comparatively but few points to discuss, the preliminaries were signed in January, and the definitive treaty was not signed till September. No means had been, nor would be omitted, to bring the negotiation to a successful termination as soon as possible. Having stated thus much, the committee would not expect him to enter into a discussion upon all the points of the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. gentleman had thought proper to make a personal allusion to him, with respect to his having signed the preliminaries of peace. Upon that subject, he could state, with the greatest sincerity, that, whatever the result might be, he should never regret the share he had had in that transaction, which he should always contend was creditable to this country, and gave to Europe the only chance for a long continuance of peace. Gentlemen might talk of the bad consequences of a peace; but he begged that they would also consider, what might be the bad consequences of a war; and that they would balance the inconveniencies of both together. The experiment of peace was, at least, as wise as the experiment of continuing the war. He was not aware that there were any other parts of the hon. gentleman's speech that called for explanation, which he could, with any propriety, at present give. At the proper opportunity neither he nor any of his colleagues would, he was sure, shrink from the discussion.

Mr. James Cornwallis observed, that the French expedition to the West Indies might have a fair and legitimate object; but, supposing the intentions of the French government should be hostile, and the negotiations terminated unfavourably, this country had nothing to apprehend. We had a force in the West Indies more than sufficient for the protection of our islands. We should have the opportunity of fighting and taking the French ships at sea, instead of counting them in their harbours.

Ministers, therefore, merited applause for having suffered them to sail. He saw no ground of alarm. There was no reason to question either the vigilance of our government, or the pacific disposition of the first consul. Did not every popular declaration on the part of France anticipate the blessings of peace? What, then, was our duty? Not to encourage suspicion, proclaim jealousies, and sound alarm throughout the country. Whatever might be the result of the negotiation, Great Britain would be prepared to meet the French at sea in any quarter of the world. The public had no cause for anxiety in consequence of the delay in the present negotiations.

Mr. Windham said:—Sir; when my hon. friend comes forward, and asks for that information which he conceives necessary to satisfy the public mind, I do not think I am going too far in saying, that the promised explanation of the noble lord will come rather too late. It will, I fear, prove little consolation for the country to learn the motives by which ministers may have been actuated, when it shall have felt the dangerous effects resulting from those motives. In admitting the responsibility of ministers, I also feel that a great responsibility is weighing on my own mind, from the silence which I have held so long; and I find much difficulty in excusing myself for having so long remained silent on a question in which the dearest interests of the country are involved. I indulged myself in the hope that ministers would have been the first to have brought forward the topics on which my hon. friend has touched; and their not doing it, tends to confirm any distrust which I may have entertained. If I take the language held out in the debates on the signing of the preliminaries of peace, and compare it with what has been since effected, I shall find no satisfactory grounds for me to banish my apprehensions. It would, indeed, appear that little has been done since that period. I feel, in common with others, the great evils resulting from suspense. Yet even these evils, and this state of suspense, are not sufficient to justify gentlemen in calling for explanations from his majesty's ministers. Reasons, however, of a more powerful nature are not wanting. Has nothing happened since the signing of the preliminaries to sanction inquiry? Every thing has happened which must be accounted sufficient to set aside the engagement entered into, and to invalidate the preliminaries. Every thing has happened which, politically and truly speaking, should destroy the contract. Every thing has so happened, that none who voted for the preliminaries in this House are bound to support them. The foundation on which they then gave their suffrages is actually destroyed; and the credit which they gave to the enemy for good faith and sincerity is no longer to be found. There are, Sir, three descriptions of events which must be seriously considered, in order to feel the force of this observation. First, events that have totally changed the basis and nature of the preliminaries: secondly, events that have changed the respective condition and state of the two countries; and thirdly, those which in fact belong to both, and which show the nature of the disposition and temper of the opposite party. The noble lord distinctly stated three considerations in which the preliminaries might be taken—the time, the terms, and the tone or the temper in which they were concluded. As to the time and the terms, they are gone by; and as to the tone, allow me to say a few words—I agree that it is a matter of the highest moment; for as the spirit at all times is better than the letter, particularly in political transactions, the temper of the enemy becomes a question of the greatest importance. But if he unexpectedly assumes new power, and acquires new dominion beyond all reason and probability, it must be evident that no confidence can be placed in his professions. But we are told, the more reliance we have upon his tone, the safer and the more secure we shall be; and, taking this as a rule of argument, we may go on to witness the aggrandizement and consolidation of his empire, because these are no proofs of the want of sincerity. When we see instances every day of his redoubled vigour, of his over-straining ambition, shall we subscribe to this doctrine, and give our assent to his moderation? If ministers will raise their heads from their dispatches, and read the great dispatch of the enemy, plain and legible as it is in every part of the globe, they will see undoubted proofs of his rooted determination to turn all events to his advantage against the interests of this country. If any thing like a correct idea of a preliminary treaty can be formed, I should say, that it is that state in which both parties should have stood still. It presents to the mind the situation of a town besieged, when the mere cessation of hostilities takes place. No molestation is offered to those within, but no stores or provisions are allowed to enter from without. The besiegers carry on no new works; nor do the besieged repair their fortifications. In ascertaining the tone or temper of the opposite party, two things are to be considered—events that have subsequently happened, and events that have subsequently become known. The distinction is clear; and with those of the latter description, ministers should have been made acquainted. If, being intended by the enemy to be actually carried into effect, they were not communicated to his majesty's ministers, the party who concealed them was guilty of fraud. Some of these events are so plain, that it is impossible to mistake them. They may be found in an island, in a sum of money, in a district. Such was the violation of the integrity of Portugal, secured as it appeared to be by the preliminaries; but the treaty which destroyed that integrity was kept secret, and thus constituted that fraud of which I complain. Is it not, then, right in my hon. friend to call the attention of the House to the state of the country? or rather is it not the crying duty of every man who considers the situation in which we are placed? Although we are at present considering what may be called a small point in the general state of affairs, we are still justified in having the whole situation of the country before us. What appears to me above all other things the most dreadful consideration is, the unaccountable apathy of the moment. I know not exactly by what name to call it; but I should be inclined to compare this apathy to the blindness spoken of by the prophet—"Eyes have they, yet they see not; ears also have they, but hear not." To trace it to its cause, would be a task, I fear, too difficult for any man. What is the present state of Europe? What are the powers still left which are exempt from servitude or dependence? Take them all after ourselves, and we shall find Austria and Russia only which can be said to exist. But when we see the increasing power, and the self-acknowledged ambition of France, what security have we for our own power or independence? The head of the government of France plainly tells us, that he has got augmented influence, augmented territory, augmented dominion; and that he means to employ them to the destruction of our commerce, and our naval pre-eminence. The subject, Sir, is so dreadful, the prospect so dreary, that it appals me with its magnitude.

Mr. Baker said, that the country must still be considered as in a state of war; and if it should become necessary to resume hostilities in vindication of our rights, he trusted the House and the country would be prompt and unanimous in uniting all their strength and energy against the common enemy. With respect to the length of time occupied in the discussion of the definitive treaty, he thought it a matter of very little importance, compared with other events which had taken place in Europe since the commencement of that discussion. If it was our duty to adhere to the terms of the preliminary treaty, it was surely the duty of France to adhere to it on theirs. The noble lord had said that ministers would be responsible for the terms of the treaty when concluded; but he begged to remind them, that an acquiescence in points so materially different from the preliminary articles would very much increase their responsibility.

Lord Castlereagh said, he did not look on the preliminaries of peace in the same view as his hon. friend, nor could he see the policy of exciting despondency in the people. As for those events in our West India colonies, for which so much alarm had been expressed, he hoped they would not happen. Even if the French had any hostile views against our possessions in that quarter of the globe, they would find us amply prepared to defeat their purposes. There were, however, urgent reasons for the mission of a strong French force to the West Indies, without exciting alarm on the part of Great Britain. The situation of the French colonies in that quarter was extremely critical; and if France was to look to her colonies as to the legitimate means of her future aggrandisement, she would have ample means to divert her attention from projects of hostility towards this country. The black population of Domingo before the revolution was estimated at 250,000, with a very small proportion, indeed, of whites. That of Guadaloupe was estimated at 80,000 blacks, with very few whites comparatively: and if the present state of those colonies be considered, it must be allowed, that, even supposing Toussaint disposed to receive the French force sent out as friends, and that they were actually landed in the colonies without any resistance from him, there would still be ample employment for the 30,000 French troops sent out, to restore order and man the different garrisons on those islands. Whether or not ministers exercised a sound discretion in suffering the French force to sail, France was at the time most critically situated with respect to her colonies; and it was not improbable that ministers might have seen the safety of our own colonies intimately connected with the proceeding. For other reasons, too, it was politic, on the part of the British government, not to interfere. Should the views of France prove hostile, it was desirable to have their fleet in a situation where we could meet them to advantage, instead of their being locked up in their harbours.

Dr Laurence asked, whether when the supplies which were on the point of expiring were applied for, there was not a conviction in the mind of ministers, that the definitive treaty would be signed before the period for which they were granted should have elapsed? Such must have been the ground upon which the supplies were only asked at that moment for two months. What, then, was the conduct of ministers now but a repetition of the same policy? With the delay he found no fault. He liked delay, because it evinced attention to the points of interest at issue, and furnished a proof of sincerity. In all former preliminaries there were compacts and modifications embracing prior engagements; but, in the present, there was no basis of that kind, no revision of treaties, no stipulation for the revival of pre-existing contracts. Had there been a stipulation in the present preliminaries reviving former treaties, this country would be established in the freedom of the navigation of the Mississippi, because the treaty of 1661, by which she possessed it, would be revived. There was, however, no such clause in the present preliminaries; and in consequence of that omission, the mouth of the Mississippi was now in the hands of our adversary (if so he might be allowed to call France) and without a specific and new stipulation, we should lose the benefit of our exterior establishments, and also our commerce with America within that river. The construction, therefore, put upon the argument of his hon. friend, as complaining of delay, was a fallacy. His hon. friend meant no such thing. He only wished to raise the spirit of the country, to excite its energy, and maintain that state of force and preparation which became it, pending the uncertain issue of a treaty, of which we know so little. The noble lord who spoke last, seemed to think the situation of the country so advantageous that explanation must be good at any time, because it would reveal nothing that was not matter of triumph. That noble lord was a political optimist: he saw nothing in the French expedition to the West Indies but arguments of consolation, and argued that a great military force was absolutely necessary to France in that quarter. It was, indeed, a melancholy truth, that the freedom introduced into that part of the world was of that species that required a great military force to restrain it. This, however, was no advantage to us. It could be no advantage to us that a country, our rival in commerce, in arts, and in arms, should possess, in a quarter in which that rivalry might prove most dangerous, not only the means of annoyance which that freedom afforded, but also the additional means of a great military force. From political situation and nature our rival she must be; and the only question was, whether that rivalry would be carried on generously, or by the insidious means by which it had been hitherto pursued. Admitting, however, a military force to be necessary, was there a necessity for such a formidable fleet? The fleet certainly was not necessary to the avowed objects of the expedition. It was originally said, that Toussaint would oppose a naval force to the landing of the French in St. Domingo; but no such opposition was pretended now. Another consolation to the noble lord was, that, in case of a renewal of the war, this country would stand in a better situation than if no such expedition had been sent out. At the time of the evacuation of Holland, it was said, that it would be good policy in ministers to give up the 8000 sailors whom France demanded, as it might be the means of inducing her fleet to come out and fight. But would that policy, admitting it to be such, apply to the present case? In case of a renewal of hostilities, the French fleet might do incalculable mischief where it was gone, before an English fleet could prevent it. Or, were we to maintain a force in the West Indies to blockade it from year to year? At the time a naval truce was proposed, and France asked leave to send only a small expedition to St. Domingo, ministers refused, and were applauded for their refusal; yet we were now to be told, that the immense expedition sent to that quarter was an advantage to this country. Another consolation of the noble lord was, that, even in the event of peace, we might compel the French fleet to return sooner than if it should not have sailed until the definitive treaty; that, the sooner gone, the sooner back. He did not know how that mode of reasoning could be reconciled with the principle, that peace was better than war; for supposing the French fleet should refuse to come back at the time we thought it should return, was there any man in that House who would push such refusal to extremities, and advise a renewal of the war for that reason alone? He was convinced that no man would consider it as an adequate cause of war; and therefore, he thought, that ministers should now endeavour to secure, by the influence they possessed, those advantages which they could not enforce after peace without risking more than they were worth. There were other arguments used by his hon. friend, relating to Europe and the West Indies, which had received no answer. If there was fraud in one party, it became a nullity. The question, therefore, was, Whether fraud had been practised or not in the present case? Now, facts and dates clearly showed, that Louisiana had been ceded to France by a treaty anterior to the preliminaries with England; and that such cession was not made known to this country until after their ratification. For the consequence of that cession, see what the state of France now was in that part of the world. Look at that Colossus, with one foot upon the mouth of the Mississippi, and the other upon the mouth of the river of the Amazons, controlling and directing all the commercial relations and advantages between these two points! Behold it, then, stretching out a hand to strike our West India possessions, with all the facilities afforded it by the cession of the Spanish part of St. Domingo, and its other acquisitions in that quarter! Was there nothing in all this to excite our vigilance? Look at the island of Elba. Was it supposed, when we surrendered a part of it to Tuscany, that it was not to remain to that duchy, and that it was previously agreed to deliver it to France? Such, however, had proved to be the fact; and this fact, he contended, made the preliminaries totally void. With such fraudulent conduct, manifestly committed on the part of our adversary, he would not be content with being told that we must have confidence in ministers. There was no House that knew its own dignity, that would not claim its right to say, that it could not be bound by that to which it had not given its assent; that it had, therefore, a right to inquire into a subject which a change of circumstances had rendered in some respects entirely new, and particularly in the case of a fraudulent cession studiously kept back from its view. The Cisalpine republic formed another objection, to which no answer had been given. It was a question at the time of the preliminaries, in what situation we were to stand with respect to that, ignorant as we then were of its precise state. New preliminaries must have consequently been since entered into; for, if not, there were none that included that country. He did not put this case with a view to an answer. He only stated it to show that, with the same person, as first consul of France, and president of the Cisalpine republic, and with a treaty offensive and defensive now existing between them, it would be in the power of the Cisalpine republic, in the event of a peace with France, to involve her in a new war with us, in which she should come in either as a principal or an ally. He admitted, that, in the subsequent conduct of France to the Cisalpine republic, there was no fallacy. It was then as much in the hands and power of France as it was now. Still, however, a fallacious hope remained, that it might be suffered to possess a sort of independence, and that it would become a barrier between France and the neighbouring continental powers. That hope was fled; and were we now to acknowledge a barrier against the other governments of Europe, instead of a barrier for their protection. The newly-assumed name "Italian," too, was a circumstance not unworthy of notice. It obviously glanced down upon Italy to the very foot. This suspicion was confirmed by a late proclamation of the Italian republic, in which it reminds its citizens of the glory of their ancestors, addresses them as if they were beginning a new career, and directs their views to new objects of ambition. There were many other corroborating points on which he should not dilate; such as the letters sent to Switzerland, the gaining of the Valais, the formation of a new road for the purpose of opening a passage into Italy, and the changes now operating in Holland. Under these circumstances, he thought it right for us to use great caution. The crisis in which the country stood was unexampled. The period of its history that came nearest in resemblance to the present, was that of the treaty of Westphalia; and yet that was but a molehill to a mountain. Europe was now all broken down, and its proportions destroyed. Our situation required superhuman abilities, superhuman resolutions, superhuman energy and vigilance. It required superior talents beyond the most perilous of former times. It was that sort of situation which made it the interest of ministers rather to seek the advice and counsel of that House, and to avail themselves of the collected sense of a deliberative assembly, than to rely upon their own individual opinion, however great their judgment and sagacity. With this view of what our essential interest required, he thought the supplies should be taken for a longer time. This might be done by way of a vote of credit, by which the power would be granted, though it might not be necessary to put it in practice.

The Attorney General said:—It does indeed seem to me, that the manner in which this debate has been conducted leads to no useful conclusion; nor has it been held up by gentlemen on the other side to any sound parliamentary purpose. They say, that ministers have detected fraud on the part of the persons with whom they are negotiating, and that such conduct on the other side puts an end to the engagement on our part. That may be the sense these gentlemen entertain of the transactions; but if it be, they have a manly duty to discharge, namely, to move an address to his majesty, to recall from Amiens the minister who has so humiliated his country, as by this negotiation he thinks it has been humiliated. I think this mode of taking up the important subject by piece-meal, may be attended with serious inconveniences. Why these irregular discontents in this House, these loud complaints, without propositions to remove them, these exhortations, instead of clear expressions of discontent? Why not come forward in a manly manner, and afford the House an opportunity of manifesting its patriotic feeling upon the subject, by rejecting the motion, as I apprehend it would, and setting the matter at rest? Indeed, I do hope that this vicious practice of speaking, without intending to propose a practical conclusion, upon a subject so delicate as that of a pending negotiation, will be discontinued: it may increase to an enormous size of inconvenience by indulgence. It has been said, that we are now rejoicing that the fleet of France has got out of port, and that this is very inconsistent with our triumph at having kept them in their ports, as it were hermetically sealed up. I own I see none of the inconsistency which is imputed to us for feeling triumph at both these events. We are not now in the same situation that we were in when the fleet of France was blockaded in their ports. I do not mean to say that the sailing of that fleet to the West Indies may not be accompanied with some evils; but I say they are there to be met, if necessary; that the French fleet, should it attempt any thing hostile to our interests, is in a part of the world where we have nothing to fear. The House has no reason to believe that ministers will put up with any national indignity. If, in the course of this negotiation, we should be disappointed, it will be met with and resisted by a proper spirit. I look to ministers for no superhuman power. But whatever can be accomplished by integrity, by political knowledge, by zeal for the public welfare, I look for, and confidently trust to see effected by his majesty's ministers.

The several resolutions were then agreed to.

March 4. The report of the committee of supply, to whom the army estimates were referred, being brought up,

Mr. Robson proceeded to point out various heads of expenditure, which he said were highly improper, such as the barracks, the expenses of corn and hay for the horses of the cavalry, the coals and candles for the men, the expense of which he contended to be enormous. The sum charged for beer to the troops at the isle of Wight, he said was also beyond his comprehension. He maintained that this mode of voting expenditure by months was dangerous; the sums coming thus by dribblets, did not strike the imagination in the same manner as they would do if the whole service of the year came before the public at once, and and that the more particularly, as money was raised by exchequer bills, to be hereafter provided for, instead of bringing out at once the budget of taxes for the year. He alleged that those things were most alarming, and the country was beginning to feel the effects of them. Gentlemen might fence themselves round with majorities; but the time would come when there must be an account given of the public money. The finances of the country were in so desperate a situation, that government was unable to discharge its bills; for a fact had come within his knowledge, of a bill accepted by government having been dishonoured—[A general exclamation of Hear! hear!].

Mr. Dent rose to call the hon. member to order. He thought he was extremely irregular in making an observation which tended to discredit the government.

The Speaker said, he would deliver his opinion on the subject, which the House would support and confirm, if right; if wrong, of course it would be discountenanced. His opinion was, that if a member of that House cast any reproach on the existing government of the country, under the general charge of insolvency, or otherwise to excite disesteem towards it, he was disorderly.

Mr. Alexander hoped the hon. member would, upon reflection, retract the injurious assertion he had just made.

Mr. Robson said, he was ready to go into evidence in his place to-morrow on this assertion. He thought it was a thing which had better not be investigated—it was an expression which came out in the warmth of speech. It was a thing better not inquired into; but surely he had a right to make use of a fact in support of his argument.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, if it was a thing which it were better not to inquire into, it was a thing which had better not have been said. The hon. gentleman had said it; he was bound to prove it, or to retract it. The House ought to expect of the hon. gentleman to state the precise fact to which he had alluded; to name a day on which he would bring it forward, and prove it; if he did not, the next step would be for the House to proceed to censure him for the use of such expression; for no man ought to make a heavy charge against government any more than individuals, and allege a fact for the basis of such charge, without being prepared to bring proof of such fact.

Mr. Robson said, that what he had uttered was in the warmth of argument. In adverting to the expenses of government, he illustrated that by stating, that one of the public offices had not paid its acceptances. Now, if any gentleman would move that a day be appointed for him to produce proof of the truth of his assertion, he would do it; but he would again repeat, that, in his opinion, the less was said the better.

The Secretary at War said, that as far as this declaration related to the hon. member, he believed the less was said about it the better; but that would not now do for the House. He should explain what the fact was of which he had spoken.

Mr. Robson said, he never asserted in that House that which he did not conceive to be true. It was true that a banker, a member of that House, did take an acceptance to a public office—the sum was small. The answer at that public office was, “that they had not money to pay it.”

Mr. Chancellor Addington.—I am sure the House must feel, that it is important for the hon. gentleman to proceed and state the whole of what he knows on the subject he alludes to. It is due to the House; it is due to government. The credit of the country requires that this matter should be fully explained. I understand the hon. gentleman to allege, that government acceptances have been refused payment at a public office. I call on him to name the office at which the acceptance was tendered, and payment was refused.

Dr. Laurence thought it important that charges of this kind should be fully explained, retracted if false, or proved if true; but with regard to the proceeding of the House against the hon. member, in case he should eventually be found to have uttered that which was unfounded, as the words of the hon. member were not taken down at the time, and as what he had said came before the House incidentally, he doubted whether there could, consistently with order, be any proceeding in the House upon the matter; nor perhaps was there any necessity for it.

Mr. Chancellor Addington.—The hon. gentleman has created the necessity. He does not state it now as an inadvertency of speech—an assertion hastily made; but one which, upon repeated application to him, he has adopted. He said he could prove it. We should be making a miserable use of the forms of the House, if we decided that they precluded us from calling on him to produce his proof.

Mr. Robson declared, he could prove what he had said. Having asserted the fact, he would support it: he maintained then, he maintained still, that an acceptance of a public office, was presented for payment, and refused—[Here there was a loud call of Name! name!"] Mr. Robson said, the Sick and Hurt office.

Mr. Vansittart desired the hon. gentleman to name the person who brought the acceptance.

Mr. Dent said, that the regular way would be to have the words taken down, for the purpose of affording to the House an opportunity of considering what proceeding it might adopt upon this business.

Mr. Martin said, that an acceptance of that office, in his hands, had been presented, and had met the fate described by the hon. member.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that the interposition of the speeches of other members, between the time of uttering the words and the proposition for recording them, had rendered the taking of them down now irregular, if not impracticable; but the sentence might be repeated, and the hon. gentleman might adopt it if he pleased. I understand, (said Mr. Addington), the hon. gentleman to say and abide by these words, "that government acceptances have been refused payment; that is to say, that a government acceptance, in the hands of a banker, a member of this House, was carried to the Sick and Hurt office, and that there payment was refused."

Mr. Robson said, that that was the substance of what he meant.

The resolutions were agreed to. After which,

Mr. Chancellor Addington called the attention of the House to the subject of the non-payment of the bill at the Sick and Hurt office. He said: I have not had an opportunity of inquiring, with minuteness, into the charge brought forward by the hon. gentleman; but I have received information with respect to the particular instance which he referred to, and which I think it material to state before the House separates. The House will recollect, that the hon. gentleman said, that government acceptances had been refused payment, and that under circumstances so general, as to mark the degraded state of government, and to prove its insolvency. I find that the amount of the bill accepted by government, and the non-payment of which was to denote the insolvency of government is 19*l.* 7*s.*! Whether or not the bill was paid, remains to be proved; but my information comes from the same source as the hon. member derives his accusation. At all events the instance of the hon. member of the insolvency of government is a bill of 19*l.* 7*s.*!

Mr. Robson said, that was so much the worse; as the bill was in the hands of a poor man who wanted the money.

March 8. Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he hoped he might be allowed to advert to what had passed on Thursday evening. It would be in the recollection of the House, that an hon. gentleman had stated, that the government was insolvent, and that government acceptances had been refused payment at the public offices. This general assertion, however, and these plural terms, were only applied to one office, and to one bill, for the sum of 19*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* He was therefore entitled to say, that the hon. gentleman had no ground for the assertion that he made, except in that single instance. He was ready to admit, that the bill alluded to was presented, and was not paid; but such a circumstance was not peculiar to the present time, or such as the oldest in the public offices had never known before. He could assert, however, that there never was a single instance, in which the Treasury (and there the credit of government resided) had been applied to for money, or where money was wanted for the payment of a bill of exchange, that the application was disappointed. It had of late been the policy of government to prevent the inferior public offices from becoming banking shops, and accumulating large sums of money at any one time; but, in no one instance could it be stated, that money, being likely to be wanted for satisfying bills of exchange, had not been constantly ready.

Mr. Robson said, he had proofs of the fact he had asserted, to the amount of many thousands, and it was his intention to move to-morrow for papers relative to the subject.

March 9. Mr. Robson accordingly moved for an account of all bills drawn upon the Sick and Hurt office, with dates, when due, and when paid, from the 1st of September 1801. Upon this, the chancellor of the exchequer moved the order of the day; which, after some conversation, was agreed to.

Debate in the Commons on the American Treaty Bill.] March 5. On the order of the day, for the second reading of the bill to empower his majesty, for a time to be limited, to cause certain countervailing duties, granted by an act of the 37th of his majesty, intituled, "An Act for carrying into Execution the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, concluded between his Majesty and the United States of America," to cease, or be suspended, under certain circumstances.

General Gascoyne said, that one of the greatest objections which he had to this bill was, that it would infringe upon the Navigation act, which, next to the great charter of our liberties, ought to be kept inviolate. It was to that act that we were indebted for the great navy which we possessed, and for our trade. But even if it were right to pass this bill, he thought that we ought to wait till after the definitive treaty, because then we should have to make commercial treaties with other powers; and it would be wise to wait till we knew the terms of the other treaties before we bound ourselves in this manner to America. It appeared to him, that, by taking off the countervailing duties with America, we should injure one great branch of our trade, he meant the carrying trade, in which America was our rival. This measure originated in America, for there was a bill brought in there to take off these duties; and if he had no other reason, that alone would induce him to doubt very much before he gave his assent to the measure. It was rather singular, that before a great commercial measure like the present was proposed to the House, it had not been proposed to the Board of Trade, or that a committee of the House had not been appointed to examine the subject. He was sure there was no man at all acquainted with the commercial interests of this country, who could view the trade which was carried on between America and our West India islands, without being convinced that it was highly injurious to this country, because it enabled the Americans to meet us upon the continent with the produce of our own colonies. In 1791, the number of vessels that cleared out from Great Britain for America were 245 British, and 218 foreign; but that in 1801, there were only 62 British ships cleared out, while the number of foreign vessels amounted to 507—so much had our carrying trade been decreased! This decrease must be attributed, in a great degree, to the war; but not altogether. There was one subject which appeared to him to deserve the serious attention of the House, and that was the trade in the article of salt. When salt was shipped in this country it was necessary to give bonds, which were not cancelled until a certificate was procured that the cargo was delivered at the port for which the vessel was cleared out; in America, no such difficulties were imposed. But he wished to know, if we repealed these countervailing duties, how we were sure that America would do the same? He was informed that a treaty had been concluded between France and America, by which the former agreed to let American ships enter her ports with the same advantages and privileges that French ships enjoyed; and when, in addition to this, he took into consideration the prohibition in Spain and Holland against British goods, it certainly was sufficient to excite considerable jealousy on our part, and to induce us to take care not to give any nation advantages which would enable her to enter into a competition with us. If we did give those advantages, we ought to be sure that the nation to whom we gave those advantages deserved such favour from us.

Mr. Vansittart said, that the hon. gentleman seemed to suppose, that by passing this bill, we were giving exclusive advantages to America; but that was not the case, for it would only put the navigation with America on the same footing with that of other nations. This was no infringement of the Navigation act. The hon. gentleman had stated, that we were on the point of entering into commercial treaties with other powers, and therefore we ought to wait till those treaties were before the House; but as the countervailing duties only related to America, he could not conceive what connexion it could have with our treaties with other powers. It had been said, that in consequence of a treaty between France and America, the vessels of the latter were to be admitted into the ports of the former, upon as favourable terms as French vessels; but the treaty to which the hon. gentleman alluded had not been published in any authentic shape, therefore it was impossible to state, with correctness, what the terms of that treaty were. The hon. gentleman then stated, that America would, in consequence of this bill, have an advantage over us in the article of salt, on account of the bonds which it was necessary to give in this country; but the reason why these bonds were required was, that the vessels in which it was in general shipped were coasting vessels; and, if it were not for these bonds, the salt might be reloaded and the revenue defrauded. The next subject upon which the hon. gentleman had commented was, the great increase of American shipping. This was a consideration that had nothing to do with the present bill; but if it had, it ought rather to induce the House to pass the bill, because it showed that the measures we had hitherto adopted, were inefficacious. It certainly appeared that the number of English vessels employed in the trade with America had decreased. In 1791, the number of British ships employed were 312, and of foreign 246; in 1792, there were 247 British, and 318 foreign; in 1793, there were 197 British, and 313 foreign. This decrease, taking place before the war, could not of course be attributed to it; but, after the war did take place, the decrease of British shipping was certainly more rapid. In 1798, the value of the British manufactures exported to America was 5,300,000*l.*; in 1799, it was 6,700,000*l.*, and in 1800, it was nearly the same. Now it should be recollected, that our exports to America were mostly British manufactures, and were for the consumption of America. The cheaper they could get these articles, the more they would consume of them; and, consequently, by taking off these duties, we were doing great service to our manufactures. On the other hand, our imports from America were not the manufactures of that country, nor were they in general for the consumption of this, but principally for re-exportation; therefore the effect of continuing these countervailing duties would be to force the Americans to take their produce at once to the other countries of Europe, instead of sending them first to England, and consequently our re-export trade would be ruined. But, he defended this bill on the grounds of national good faith and general policy. Soon after the conclusion of the American war, America endeavoured to crush the trade of England, and, in many instances, the duties upon English merchandize were three or four times greater than the duties upon the merchandize of France and other countries. But she soon found the inconvenience of this system; and one of the first steps of her legislature, after her constitution was formed, was to repeal these duties, and to impose others, which were equal upon all countries. It was true, that this bill had not been submitted to the Board of Trade; but he could say, that it had the approbation of those who, from their situation, were best able to judge upon the subject.

Dr. Laurence admitted, that, whatever might be the expediency or in expediency of the measure, we must adopt it, if we were bound to do so by good faith. It had been said, in defence of this measure, that we were bound by treaty to take off these duties, if they were taken off in America. The stipulations of a treaty must undoubtedly be adhered to; but this was not the proper mode of taking off these duties. The bill stated that it was necessary, for certain circumstances, to take off these duties; but it did not particularize any one of these circumstances. If, however, this measure was necessary, he thought it would be better to bring it forward upon its own grounds, and that a bill of a very different nature should be proposed. It certainly was a most serious consideration, that the shipping of America had increased so much. During the American war, her shipping was nearly annihilated, and it was now as great as the shipping of Great Britain was at the conclusion of that war. All the effects of our Navigation act, and all the care we had taken during a period of above a century, had only made our shipping equal to that which America had created in a few years. It had been stated, that the taking off these duties would make this country a dépôt for the merchandize of America; but he deprecated this plan of making a distinction between our mercantile interest and our Navigation act. There was one point which called for the attention of parliament, and that was the great increase of the American trade with the East Indies. There had been a decision in the courts of this country which certainly tended to encourage this trade; he meant the case of Wilson and Marriot; and there were now above 300 American ships employed in trading to the East Indies. It was a notorious fact, that it was the plan of the French government, when the war of arms was over, to carry on a war of Custom-house duties with us, and, if possible, to ruin our trade. This certainly called for the most serious attention of the government. This appeared from a pamphlet published by a person of considerable consequence in the French government, for he was under secretary of state to M. Talleyrand. This book completely developed the plan of the French government to ruin our commerce. The principles laid down in this book were such as France had uniformly acted upon. All these circumstances ought to make us extremely watchful. He hoped that some plan of commercial intercourse between this country and France would be established before the definitive treaty was signed; because he was sure that after that treaty, we should not succeed in establishing one.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that no man was more disposed than himself to give the highest praise to the Navigation act: he considered it as the foundation of the commercial prosperity of this country; but how did the bill trench upon the provisions of that act? What was the simple state of the case? The Americans had thought fit to impose a duty upon the tonnage of British ships, and upon the cargoes of all vessels coming into their ports, which were not American, for the purpose of benefiting their own navigation. When the commercial treaty was negotiated between the two countries, it was expressly stipulated that no fresh duties should be imposed; but, as the United States refused to give up the old duties, this country could not suffer those duties to remain without imposing countervailing duties. He should have thought it a matter of course, without any treaty between the two countries, if the United States withdrew their duties, that we should also discontinue ours. He submitted, therefore, whether it was not just and expedient to pass an act, the object of which was merely to give his majesty power, under certain circumstances, to suspend the countervailing duties? Such a measure was required by good faith, as the communication of the American duties being taken off might arrive when parliament was not sitting; while, at the same time, the continuance of the countervailing duties, after such a communication, would be a breach of the treaty. Taking it, however, upon the ground of expediency alone, was it not equally advantageous, that the duties on both sides should cease? It was always better that two countries should be in a simple state of communication with each other, than under the influence of a complicated system of duties. There was also another consideration of policy: great part of the produce of America was deposited in this country, from whence it was exported to other parts of the world; if countervailing duties were suffered to exist here, we gave an advantage to Holland and to other countries, where no such duties existed, and where, consequently, much of the produce of America would be deposited in preference to this country. The learned gentleman had said, that it was the policy of France to destroy the effect of our Navigation act. This might be very true. It was somewhat singular, however, that the learned gentleman should now so freely recommend such bold and determined measures in support of that act, who had not long since endeavoured to induce the House to abandon the principles of that very act. But if there was a war against our commerce, it was no reason why we should not pass a bill founded upon a principle of liberal conciliation, or why we should not, in a liberal, fair, and open manner, conciliate any great and powerful state for the benefit of our commerce, where that conciliation was attended by no humiliation on our part. It might be the policy of other states to destroy the commerce of Great Britain; but how were they to do it? Our manufactures, during the late war, had found their way into all the ports of Europe, in spite of every prohibition; and the exports of British manufactures were, during that period, nearly doubled. America, after the war between her and this country, imposed prohibitory duties on British goods; but British manufactures were exported thither in a greater proportion than before the war, in spite of every prohibition. When a commercial treaty took place between France and Russia, at the period of the armed neutrality, impediments were thrown in the way of the commerce of this country; but, in spite of these, France was compelled to purchase Russian produce in the markets of this country. This showed that all prohibitions upon our commerce were completely nugatory. Our commerce was founded upon the firm basis of capital and confidence. In capital, Great Britain was rivalled by no country; but still more important was the confidence to which the honour and punctuality of her merchants entitled her. The only country which had been enabled to rival us was Holland, who founded her commerce upon a similar honesty and punctuality. What was the reason that France had never been able to rival us in our commerce? Because, from the very nature of the French character, there was not that system of honesty, of punctuality, and justice in her dealings, which could entitle her to the confidence of other countries. To the honesty and punctuality of our dealings was to be added the liberality by which our commercial transactions were characterized, and by which we had been enabled to outstrip the only country which had in any degree rivalled us. Let Britons trust to themselves, and they had nothing to fear.

Mr. Windham said, he had no doubt that they ought to take off these counter-vailing duties; the only question was as to the time, and whether it was proper to pass an act to take them off before it was known that the duties in America had been abolished. His learned friend had mentioned a design on the part of France, to destroy our commerce during a period of peace; the noble lord refused to give any credit to a prophecy of the destruction of our commerce during peace, because it had been prophesied that war would destroy our commerce, and that prophecy had proved erroneous. That might be an argument against believing any prophecy, or it might be urged against giving credit to the same set of men, who, upon the same principle, prophesied the destruction of our commerce equally by war and by peace; but surely to contend, because one set of men prophesied the destruction of our commerce by war, and were mistaken, that therefore another set of men, who, upon a different principle, prophesied the destruction of our commerce by peace, were entitled to no credit, was not very logical. The noble lord had said, that our commerce had found its way into all the ports of Europe, in spite of every prohibition; but this assertion might only extend to a certain degree; it did not follow, that, because our goods found their way into these ports, or were even landed, they might not be stopped by some inland prohibition. That France showed a disposition to destroy the commerce of this country, was so evident, that it was a kind of comic extravagance to doubt it. They told us they would do it, and showed us how they would do it; but yet we said we could not believe it—it must be a joke. We had now to contend against a power which had not been seen since the time of Charlemagne. It did not appear to him that capital and confidence were sufficient to enable us to contend against this enormous power; to them must be added the great maritime strength of the country; to them must be added, the proud independence and manly spirit of the country; to them must be added, that high sense of honour which was not prone to submit to degradation or to insult. He would agree as to the value of capital and confidence, of honesty and punctuality; but he must also be allowed to set a value upon the arms of the country. Before this country possessed capital or commerce, she made a figure in arms; but now it seemed to be an opinion with many, that when our navy was up, we might go to bed. He hoped that a sense of the danger which threatened us would rouse the people to those exertions which were necessary to guard them against designs by which we were to be destroyed. When his noble friend talked of capital and wealth, he begged gentlemen to consider what capital and wealth had done, or what it would do. We could not judge in this case from anterior events, we were in a situation wholly dissimilar to any former situation in which we had been placed, and to which no principle drawn from former events would apply. Our present situation must be judged of from its own circumstances, and could not be considered in any point of view derived from former experience.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that every part of the public service repudiated and falsified the supposition, that a commercial and a wealthy country could not preserve its advantages over other states by uniting military excellence with its superior wealth. This country was happily a splendid instance of both. His right hon. friend had dwelt on a topic which no lover of his country could contemplate without apprehension—he meant the power of France. This was a power which he had never endeavoured to under-rate; but he trusted there was nothing to be dreaded from that power, when compared with our own. He did not seek for a counterpoise to the power of France merely in the wealth of Great Britain, but in the animus of the people; and under all exigencies, that spirit would be the true conservator of its power, and protector of its dominion. Were it not for that spirit, he should indeed look upon France as a Colossus; independent of such a spirit, we should be miserable indeed; but with it, we had nothing to fear. His right hon. friend seemed chiefly to object to the time of bringing this subject forward. He stated it as partaking rather too much of that conciliatory spirit which might be injurious if carried to too great an extent. He seemed to suppose it a gratuitous measure on our part to adopt the principle of the bill. This was a misapprehension of the fact. The principle of the bill originated with the American government. It was in consequence of an application made on the part of the government of that country, that the measure now before the House was brought forward. It had been stated also, that the principle of this bill was hostile to the navigation laws of this country, which it certainly was not. It had been asked also, what benefit would be derived from the measure? To which he answered, it was a benefit to the export trade, and it was a benefit also to us, in preserving the advantages and profits of the trade, arising from consignments and deposits. But independent of this, there was the obligation of the treaty of 1795 which left us no alternative: besides, without such a measure as this, the real understanding between this country and America could never be carried into effect; for the system of countervailing duties could never operate as an equivalent. It had been said by his right hon. friend, that we calculated precipitately on the probability of our continuing to preserve the same advantages in commerce during peace, as we possessed in war; and he had said, that the commerce of Great Britain would be excluded, if possible, from the greater part of Europe. That such, indeed, might be the disposition, he could easily conceive; but it was not a disposition which was peculiar to a state of peace; every exertion had been made to give it effect, all over Europe, during the whole war. We had been excluded, as far as the power of the enemy could go, and yet notwithstanding all the ravages of war, which must have diminished considerably the demands for many of our articles of trade, British commerce had found its way every where: and was now in extent very little short of what it was at the commencement of hostilities. But there was another point in which to view this subject, and that was, the commerce which we must, at all events, have from our East India possessions, and, by this measure, from America. What, then, was there in peace that was likely to abridge these two great sources of commerce and revenue? But, supposing the spirit of exclusion greater in peace than in war, he did not therefore see any reason for not adopting the measure now before the House; on the contrary, it rather increased the obligation to adopt it, as being the means of increasing our commerce and revenues, and giving us radical advantages which it would not be in the power of France to interrupt.

Mr. Nicholls applauded the wisdom of ministers in coming to parliament with a measure, the effect of which would be to draw into a closer connection this country and America; a policy of the soundest kind.

Debate in the Commons on the State of the Corn Trade between Great Britain and Ireland.] March 16. Mr. Chancellor Addington rose to move for a committee to inquire into the state of the corn trade between Great Britain and Ireland. In making regulations upon this subject, it appeared to him that there ought to be a free intercourse between the two countries; that they should have the means of administering to each other's wants; that the deficiency existing in some parts might be supplied by the abundance which existed in others; and that if it were necessary to impose any restrictions, they ought to be of a general, and not of a partial nature. In regulating the concerns of England and Wales, when the latter country was annexed to England, the great object of our ancestors was, to identify the two countries. The same policy was adopted at the period of the union between England and Scotland; and it must be the wish of every man, that the same policy should prevail between Great Britain and Ireland. The fact was, that in the article of corn, there was a prodigious difference between the two countries. There were many instances in which the price of grain in Ireland had been nearly double the price of the same sort of grain in Great Britain; and this had arisen from the operation of laws which had been thought wise and expedient when they were adopted. They were enacted at a time when Ireland was a separate kingdom, and when it was of great importance for the legislature of that country to give every facility to cultivation. By these laws, the export price of wheat was fixed at 45s. a quarter; of rice and barley, 23s. a quarter; and oats, 15s. 9d. a quarter. But he contended, that, even if Ireland were now a separate kingdom, these prices ought not to continue. They were fixed under very different circumstances, and when the prices of grain were much lower than they now were; and therefore, even if the union had not taken place, some alteration ought to be made in them. He knew how difficult it was, upon such a subject as this, to make a great change, by the immediate adoption of a new principle, however incontestable the wisdom of it might be. Upon general principles, it would be wise to get rid of all distinctions respecting corn between Great Britain and Ireland, as had been done in the case of Scotland; and that no more distinction ought to subsist between them than between any two counties of Great Britain. There were, however, independent of the prejudices which must prevail upon such a subject, some circumstances peculiar to Ireland, which are entitled to consideration. It might be apprehended, that, in the event of a pressure from a scarcity, the capital of England would draw a great proportion of the grain from Ireland. There was also another circumstance that deserved to be considered; which was, that the means provided in this country for the relief of the poor did not subsist in Ireland, there being no poor-rate there; therefore it would be necessary to move cautiously upon a subject which might be supposed, in some instances, to prevent the poor of Ireland from getting their food at reasonable prices. There being no poor-rate in Ireland, the labourer had nothing to depend upon but his own earnings, and the liberality and benevolence of his neighbours. At the same time, he could not help saying, that there must have been a degree of prejudice in entertaining the idea that the facility of exportation of corn from Ireland into this country would be injurious to the people of Ireland, because no consequence of the act of union operated as a restraint on the exportation of spirits from Ireland to this country; and therefore, if corn was brought here in the shape of spirits, to any amount, the effect was the same, at least as to the quantity of grain used in such amount, as if it came in kind. Under this impression of the subject, what he wished was, to raise the export price, so as to enable the owner in Ireland to send, and this part of the united kingdom to receive from thence grain, in like manner as from any part of the continent. The lowest price at which, at present, corn could be received into this country was, wheat 54s. barley 28s. and oats 28s. per quarter. He should hope the House would be of opinion, that it would be an encouragement to cultivation in Ireland, to enable one part of the empire to obtain from the other, the means of subsistence with more facility; for this purpose, he thought the better course would be to raise the price at which it should be allowable to export from Ireland to England grain of all denominations. The principle on which he proposed this, had already been carried into effect for the benefit of the distillers. The trade of the West India merchants called for the adoption of this measure; but, above all, it was matter of the highest importance to enable Great Britain to traffic with herself in the article of corn (for to traffic with Ireland now, was to traffic with herself), instead of resorting to the continent. He should now move, "That a Committee be appointed to consider of the State of the Corn Trade between Great Britain and Ireland; and report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the House."

Mr. Foster declared his approbation of the measure. It was the true interest of the empire at large, to bring the two parts of the kingdom into one, and to make them as if they were only two counties, in regard to the trade in corn at least. He believed it was the sincere wish in Ireland, that every obstacle to the plan of making the two parts of the kingdom one in respect of this trade, should be removed; that it should be made as it were a mere coasting trade. However, while he said this, he could not help observing, that the laws of Ireland, upon this subject, had continued uniform from the year 1784. By the bill which then passed upon this subject, Ireland was bound to allow the exportation of its corn into this country, leaving it to this country to fix the price at which that exportation should take place. The British parliament had the power of fixing the price, and Ireland was bound to allow the exportation accordingly. That law had been continued in force for seventeen years, and had always been approved of. He therefore believed that the proposed measure would meet with general concurrence in Ireland. Having said this, he thought it might not be improper to submit, whether it might not be better to instruct the committee to take into consideration the corn laws at large. The corn laws of Ireland had the advantage of those of this country, and under those laws the agriculture of Ireland had greatly thriven. He was sorry to say, that, in this country, the laws in this respect had been inferior in policy to those of Ireland; for, ever since the year 1767, the laws of Great Britain had been an endeavour sometimes to regulate the trade of the corn-factor, at others to regulate capriciously the trade of exportation, at others importation; the whole of it making up a discouraging uncertainty; and therefore it was no wonder that the agriculture of the country had declined under the impression of it. There was one point which he could not pass over unnoticed: in Ireland, the regulation was made to operate uniformly on the whole of the country. In England, we had sixteen districts, and distinct regulations to each; so that we might be exporting corn at one part of the kingdom, while we were importing it at another; the evils of which were many. There should be a free participation between the two countries; we should make one standard for both. Ireland should be taught that she would be safe in opening her trade to this country; and we should be secured here against any apprehension of inconvenience from that species of encouragement to Ireland. When this system was well digested and put in practice, this country would never want grain, while Ireland had any to send.

Sir W. Pulteney said, that there had been a continual variation in the law on this subject; a thing much to be lamented. From the time of king William, there was no change in the corn laws until the year 1757, when there was an alarm of scarcity, and those laws were thrown open. This had introduced a practice of endeavouring, from time to time, to make provisions according to some temporary exigency, which had introduced into the law an uncertainty that had a grievous effect; for the farmer never knew exactly what to look forward to as the law to guide him. He was very glad the country had been called upon to observe the contrast between the laws of England and of Ireland in this particular.

Lord Hawkesbury said, he was ready to admit, that the general law of the empire upon this subject required revision; that there ought to be a general plan for the purpose of preventing occasional acts of parliament upon some temporary, or perhaps local, inconvenience; for such interferences of the legislature had been proved to be injurious. A right hon. gentleman had observed, that under the laws of Ireland the agriculture of Ireland had improved; while under the laws of England, the agriculture of England had declined. But, he appealed to the House, whether, notwithstanding the inconveniences, arising from the fluctuation of the law upon this subject, whether the agriculture of this country, so far from declining, had not within the last ten years, improved more than it ever had done in the same time? It was impossible to look at facts, without coming to that conclusion. It might be matter of curiosity to inquire why, if the agriculture of the country had so increased, England had, for the last thirty years, been an importing country with respect to corn, when it was known that, for the preceding part of the century, she was an exporting country. That might be ascribed to the influx of population and of wealth, and their attendant, luxury; by which wheat had come into common consumption in England, over every part of it, or nearly so. On the comparison between Great Britain and Ireland, it should be observed, that wheat was not the common food of man in Ireland. In his opinion, the two countries should be put, with all speed possible, on the same footing in agriculture. He was persuaded that, until that could be done, the entire advantages of the union could not be enjoyed.

The motion was then agreed to.

Mr. Fox's Motion for a New Writ for Tavistock—Character of the Duke of Bedford.] March 16. Mr. Fox rose and spoke nearly as follows:—If the sad event which has recently occurred were only a private misfortune, however heavy, I should feel the impropriety of obtruding upon the House the feelings of private friendship, and would have sought some other opportunity of expressing those sentiments of gratitude and affection, which must be ever due from me to the memory of the excellent person, whose loss gives occasion to the sort of motion of course which I am about to make to the House. It is because I consider the death of the duke of Bedford as a great public calamity, because the public itself seems to consider it; because, not in this town only, but in every part of the kingdom, the impression made by it seems to be the strongest, and most universal, that ever appeared upon the loss of a subject; it is for these reasons that I presume to hope for the indulgence of the House, if I deviate, in some degree, from the common course, and introduce my motion in a manner which I must confess to be unusual on similar occasions.

At the same time, I trust, Sir, that I shall not be suspected of any intention to abuse the indulgence which I ask, by dwelling, with the fondness of friendship, upon the various excellencies of the character to which I have alluded, much less by entering into a history of the several events of his life which might serve to illustrate it. There was something in that character so peculiar and striking, and the just admiration which his virtues commanded was such, that to expatiate upon them in any detail is as unnecessary as, upon this occasion, it would be improper. That he has been much lamented and generally, cannot be wondered at, for surely there never was a more just occasion of public sorrow. To lose such a man!—at such a time!—so unexpectedly!—The particular stage of his life too in which we lost him, must add to every feeling of regret, and make the disappointment more severe and poignant to all thinking minds. Had he fallen at an earlier period, the public, to whom he could then (comparatively speaking at least) be but little known, would rather have compassionated and condoled with the feelings of his friends and relations, than have been themselves very severely afflicted by the loss. It would have been suggested, and even we who were the most partial must have admitted, that the expectations raised by the dawn are not always realized in the meridian of life. If the fatal event had been postponed, the calamity might have been alleviated by the consideration, that mankind could not have looked forward for any length of time to the exercises of his virtues and talents. But he was snatched away at a moment when society might have been expected to be long benefited by his benevolence, his energy, and his wisdom; when we had obtained a full certainty that the progress of his life would be more than answerable to the brightest hopes conceived from its outset; and when it might have been reasonably hoped, that, after having accomplished all the good of which it was capable, he would have descended not immaturally into the tomb. He had, on the one hand, lived long enough to have his character fully confirmed and established, while, on the other, what remained of life seemed, according to all human expectations, to afford ample space and scope for the exercise of the virtues of which that character was composed. The tree was old enough to enable us to ascertain the quality of the fruit which it would bear, and, at the same time, young enough to promise many years of produce.

The high rank and splendid fortune of the great man of whom I am speaking, though not circumstances which in themselves either can or ought to conciliate the regard and esteem of rational minds, are yet in so far considerable as an elevated situation, by making him who is so placed in it more powerful and conspicuous, causes his virtues or vices to be more useful or injurious to society. In this case, the rank and wealth of the person are to be attended to in another and a very different point of view. To appreciate his merits justly, we must consider not only the advantages, but the disadvantages, connected with such circumstances. The dangers attending prosperity in general, and high situations in particular, the corrupting influence of flattery, to which men in such situations are more peculiarly exposed, have been the theme of moralists in all ages, and in all nations; but how are these dangers increased with respect to him who succeeds in his childhood to the first rank and fortune in a kingdom, such as this, and who, having lost his parents, is never approached by any being who is not represented to him as in some degree his inferior! Unless blessed with a heart uncommonly susceptible and disposed to virtue, how should he, who had scarce ever seen an equal have a common feeling and a just sympathy for the rest of mankind, who seem to have been formed rather for him, and as instruments of his gratification, than together with him for the general purposes of nature? Justly has the Roman satirist remarked,

This was precisely the case of the duke of Bedford, nor do I know that his education was perfectly exempt from the defects usually belonging to such situations; but virtue found her own way, and on the very side where the danger was the greatest, was her triumph most complete. From the blame of selfishness no man was ever so eminently free. No man put his own gratification so low, that of others so high, in his estimation. To contribute to the welfare of his fellow-citizens was the constant pursuit of his life, by his example and his beneficence to render them better, wiser, and happier. He truly loved the public; but not only the public, according to the usual acceptation of the word; not merely the body corporate (if I may so express myself), which bears that name, but man in his individual capacity; all who came within his notice and deserved his protection, were objects of his generous concern. From his station, the sphere of his acquaintance was larger than that of most other men; yet in this extended circle, few, very few, could be counted to whom he had not found some occasion to be serviceable. To be useful, whether to the public at large, whether to his relations and nearer friends, or even to an individual of his species, was the ruling passion of his life.

He died, it is true, in a state of celibacy; but if they may be called a man's children whose concerns are as dear to him as his own—to protect whom from evil is the daily object of his care—to promote whose welfare he exerts every faculty of which he is possessed; if such, I say, are to be esteemed our children, no man had ever a more numerous family than the duke of Bedford.

Private friendships are not, I own, a fit topic for this House, or any public assembly; but it is difficult for any one who had the honour and happiness to be his friend, not to advert (when speaking of such a man) to his conduct and behaviour in that interesting character. In his friendship, not only was he disinterested and sincere, but in him were to be found united all the characteristic excellencies which have ever distinguished the men most renowned for that most amiable of all virtues. Some are warm, but volatile and inconstant; he was warm too, but steady and unchangeable. Never once was he known to violate any of the duties of that sacred relation. Where his attachment was placed, there it remained, or rather there it grew; for it may be more truly said of this man than of any other that ever existed, that if he loved you at the beginning of the year, and you did nothing to forfeit his esteem, he would love you still more at the end of it. Such was the uniformly progressive state of his affections, no less than of his virtue and wisdom.

It has happened to many, and he was certainly one of the number, to grow wiser as they advanced in years. Some have even improved in virtue; but it has generally been in that class of virtues only which consists in resisting the allurements of vice; and too often have these advantages been counterbalanced by the loss, or at least the diminution, of that openness of heart, that warmth of feeling, that readiness of sympathy, that generosity of spirit, which have been reckoned among the characteristic attributes of youth. In his case it was far otherwise; endued by nature with an unexampled firmness of character, he could bring his mind to a more complete state of discipline than any man I ever knew. But he had at the same time, such a comprehensive and just view of all moral questions, that he well knew to distinguish between those inclinations which, if indulged, must be pernicious, and the feelings which, if cultivated, might prove beneficial to mankind. All bad propensities, therefore, if any such he had, he completely conquered and suppressed, while, on the other hand, no man ever studied the trade by which he was to get his bread—the profession by which he hoped to rise to wealth and honour—nor even the higher arts of poetry or eloquence, in pursuit of a fancied immortality, with more zeal and ardour than this excellent person cultivated the noble art of doing good to his fellow creatures. In this pursuit, above all others, diligence is sure of success, and accordingly it would be difficult to find an example of any other man to whom so many individuals are indebted for happiness or comfort, or to whom the public at large owe more essential obligation.

So far was he from slackening or growing cold in these generous pursuits, that the only danger was, lest, notwithstanding his admirable good sense, and that remarkable soberness of character which distinguished him, his munificence might, if he had lived, have engaged him in expenses to which even his princely fortune would have been found inadequate. Thus, the only circumstance like a failing in this great character was, that, while indulging his darling passion for making himself useful to others, he might be too regardless of future consequences to himself and to his family. The love of utility was indeed his darling, his ruling passion. Even in his recreations (and he was by no means naturally averse to such as were suitable to his station in life), no less than in his graver hours, he so much loved to keep this grand object in view, that he seemed, by degrees, to grow weary of every amusement which was not in some degree connected with it. Agriculture he judged rightly to be the most useful of all sciences, and, more particularly in the present state of affairs, he conceived it to be the department in which his services to his country might be most beneficial. To agriculture, therefore, he principally applied himself; nor can it be doubted, but, with his great capacity, activity, and energy, he must have attained his object, and made himself eminently useful in that most important branch of political economy. Of the particular degree of his merit in this respect, how much the public is already indebted to him—how much benefit it may still expect to derive from the effects of his unwearied diligence and splendid example, many members of this House can form a much more accurate judgment than I can pretend to. But of his motive to these exertions I am competent to judge, and can affirm, without a doubt, that it was the same which actuated him throughout—an ardent desire to employ his faculties in the way, whatever it might be, in which he could most contribute to the good of his country, and the general interests of mankind.

With regard to his politics, I feel a great unwillingness to be wholly silent on the subject; and at the same time much difficulty in treating it with propriety, when I consider to whom I am addressing myself. I am sensible that those principles upon which, in any other place, I should not hesitate to pronounce an unqualified eulogium, may be thought by some, perhaps by the majority of this House, rather to stand in need of apology and exculpation, than to form a proper subject for panegyric. But, even in this view, I may be allowed to offer a few words in favour of my departed friend. I believe few, if any of us, are so infatuated with the extreme notions of philosophy as not to feel a partial veneration for the principles, some leaning even to the prejudices of the ancestors, especially if they were of any note, from whom we are respectively descended. Such biasses are always, as I suspect, favourable to the cause of patriotism and public virtue. I am sure, at least, that in Athens and Rome they were so considered. No man had ever less of family pride, in the bad sense, than the duke of Bedford; but he had a great and just respect for his ancestors. Now if, upon the principle to which I have alluded, it was in Rome thought excusable in one of the Claudii to have, in conformity with the general manners of their race, something too much of an aristocratical pride and haughtiness, surely in this country it is not unpardonable in a Russell to be zealously attached to the rights of the subject, and peculiarly tenacious of the popular parts of the constitution. It is excusable, at least, in one who numbers among his ancestors the great earl of Bedford, the patron of Pym, and the friend of Hampden, to be an enthusiastic lover of liberty; nor is it to be wondered at if a descendant of lord Russell should feel more than common horror for arbitrary power, and a quick, perhaps even a jealous discernment of any approach or tendency in the system of government to that dreaded evil. But whatever may be our differences in regard to principles, I trust there is no member of this House who is not liberal enough to do justice to upright conduct, even in a political adversary. Whatever, therefore, may be thought of those principles to which I have alluded, the political conduct of my much lamented friend must be allowed by all to have been manly, consistent, and sincere.

It now remains for me to touch upon the last melancholy scene in which this excellent man was to be exhibited; and to all those who admire his character, let it be some consolation that his death was in every respect conformable to his life. I have already noticed, that prosperity could not corrupt him. He had now to undergo a trial of an opposite nature. But in every instance he was alike true to his character; and in moments of extreme bodily pain and approaching dissolution, when it might be expected that a man's every feeling would be concentrated in his personal sufferings—his every thought occupied by the awful event impending—even in these moments, he put by all selfish considerations; kindness to his friends was the sentiment still uppermost in his mind; and he employed himself, to the last hour of his life, in making the most considerate arrangements for the happiness and comfort of those who were to survive him. While in the enjoyment of prosperity, he had learned and practised all those milder virtues which adversity alone is supposed capable of teaching; and, in the hour of pain and approaching death, he had that calmness and serenity which are thought to belong exclusively to health of body, and a mind at ease.

If I have taken an unusual, and possibly an irregular course upon this extraordinary occasion, I am confident the House will pardon me. They will forgive something, no doubt, to the warmth of private friendship—to sentiments of gratitude, which I must feel, and whenever I have an opportunity, must express to the latest hour of my life. But the consideration of public utility, to which I have so much adverted as the ruling principle in the mind of my friend, will weigh far more with them. They will in their wisdom acknowledge, that to celebrate and perpetuate the memory of great and meritorious individuals, is in effect an essential service to the community. It was not therefore, for the purpose of performing the pious office of friendship, by fondly strewing flowers upon his tomb, that I have drawn your attention to the character of the duke of Bedford: the motive that actuates me, is one more suitable to what were his views. It is, that this great character may be strongly impressed upon the minds of all who hear me—that they may see it—that they may feel it—that they may discourse of it in their domestic circles—that they may speak of it to their children, and hold it up to the imitation of posterity. If he could now be sensible to what passes here below—sure I am, that nothing could give him so much satisfaction as to find that we are endeavouring to make his memory an example, as he took care his life should be—useful to mankind.

I will conclude, with applying to the present occasion, a beautiful passage from the speech of a very young orator.* It may be thought, perhaps, to savour too much of the sanguine views of youth, to stand the test of a rigid philosophical inquiry; but it is at least cheering and consolatory, and that in this instance it may be exemplified, is, I am confident, the sincere wish of every man who hears me. "Crime," says he, "is a curse only to the period in which it is successful; but virtue, whether fortunate or otherwise, blesses not only its own age, but remotest posterity, and is as beneficial by its example, as by its immediate effects."—Mr. Fox then moved, "That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the crown, to make out a new writ, for the electing of a burgess to serve in this present parliament, for the borough of Tavistock, in the county of Devon, in the room of the right hon. John Russell, commonly called lord John Russell, now duke of Bedford, called up to the House of Peers."—Ordered.

Debate in the Commons on the Arrears of the Civil List.] March 29. The House having resolved itself into a committee of supply, to which the Report, &c. respecting the Civil List were referred,

Mr. Chancellor Addington said:—Sir, before I proceed to enter into the particulars of the report now on the table, or to refer more minutely to his majesty's most gracious message, upon which it is my intention to propose a resolution, I trust the House, in a committee, will approve of not resting it on the mere feelings, honourable as they are, of affection and attachment to his majesty, but on those combined considerations which cannot fail to make the most forcible appeal to the generosity, the justice, and the wisdom of the House. Before I enter upon these topics, I am desirous of being indulged with the attention of the committee while I advert to another part of the question, which appears to me necessary to be first stated to the committee. I cannot, Sir, but derive the greatest satisfaction from the consideration of our being now in that state in which we are enabled to contemplate a question deeply interesting to the subjects of this country in a way that affords the most ample room for discussion: we have now on the table of the House of Commons a report, containing all the information which it was possible for the various offices connected with his majesty's civil list to furnish, and certainly all that can be necessary to enable the House to come to a full examination of this subject. I derive the greater satisfaction from the circumstance of the report being on the table, inasmuch as the House will have, what it never has had before, a plain, clear, and satisfactory statement of what really are the charges and expenses of his majesty's civil list. The report will also furnish a complete answer to the observations and comments of ignorant and disaffected persons. It will appear that a very considerable portion indeed, when compared with the statements which have been made, is applied to the personal use and enjoyment of his majesty. I rejoice that we have a document which will put all doubt at rest. I trust that the report will have the effect of disposing, not gentlemen of this House, for they are above giving way to such injurious suppositions, but those persons who have been misled by ignorance, to look into their errors, and to become desirous of correcting them. I hope it will no longer be stated, after the report shall have been gone into, that his majesty enjoys advantages arising from income of revenue beyond those of his illustrious predecessors. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the circumstances which attended the kings of this country in past times. Let us recollect what possessions, applicable as sources of revenue, were enjoyed by the sovereigns of this country in former times, and then consider what is the amount of the civil-list establishment, which some have invidiously contrasted with those revenues. The sources of revenue anciently enjoyed by the kings of England, not only were calculated to fill the coffers of the monarchs who possessed them, but also to enable them to oppress their subjects; for when their revenues were in their own hands, they had the less occasion to apply to this House, and parliament consequently had but seldom the opportunity of exercising that invaluable privilege which can alone insure our safety—the privilege of imposing a restraint on the abuses of the executive government of the country. His majesty on the throne had not the power of applying any part of his revenue to his own purposes, either in a manner offensive to the people of the country, or for purposes of prodigality and corruption: it was only, Sir, in the commencement of the reign of Charles 2nd that estimates were introduced as means of control on the expenditure of the public revenue. It was in the time of Charles 2nd that the right of purveyance and pre-emption was given up as a source of enriching the king; for the purpose of relieving the people of this country from a prerogative so injurious, a price was to be paid for it by parliament: in consequence of which an hereditary revenue was granted in lieu of it. I mention this rather incidentally, the main purpose being to establish the point that the whole of the king's hereditary revenue consists of the grant to Charles 2nd for the abolition of the court of wards, and the privilege of purveyance and pre-emption. That there was a disposition to throw into the lap of the two succeeding kings a considerable part of the revenue of the country, I allow; and at the commencement of the reign of William 3rd, it was submitted to parliament, whether his majesty, jure coronæ, was in the situation which entitled him to that revenue which had belonged to the people of England. The Commons happily abstained from coming to a decision. I say happily, for it was perhaps the cause of a very large portion of the land of the country finding its way to the possession of the subjects. Parliament, having refused to say whether the king, jure coronæ, was entitled to the revenue of his predecessors, proceeded to establish a civil list. They gave to king William an annual civil list, at the same time endeavouring to ascertain what were the expenses of the household and establishment of his majesty. I am as inclined as any one can be to adopt the opinion expressed by an hon. gentleman in this House on a former night, that if a civil list is granted, it should be rendered permanent; but I am also persuaded that the principle cannot be uniformly applied. The very purpose for which a civil list is granted, implies the impossibility of its being absolutely permanent. It is granted for the purpose of the splendor of the crown, and the dignity of the executive government; and in the course of a long reign, circumstances must occur in which its expenses must necessarily be increased or diminished. The rapid increase of the wealth, and the extension of the commerce of the country, have hitherto prevented any decrease in the expenses of the civil list; and I have no hesitation in saying, they have justified the augmentation which has been made to it. In 1697 we find a civil list establishment was first permanently settled, and the aggregate of it was at that time 680,000*l*. At the accession of queen Anne it was 700,000*l*.: in fact, the amount of it was near 900,000*l*.; but it was charged with the payment of debts, by which it was reduced to the former sum. During her reign there was one instance of an application to parliament to relieve the excess of the civil list. In the reign of George 1st, the average expenses of the civil list were about 800,000*l*. Application was made to parliament in his reign for relief. At the accession of George 2nd, the various branches of revenue which had been voted to Anne and George 1st were also voted to the king on the throne; but it was stipulated that parliament was to make good any deficiency below 800,000*l*. When his present majesty came to the throne, many erroneous opinions had been entertained that the revenue enjoyed by his late majesty, and which would have been readily granted by parliament to his present majesty, was his hereditary revenue, which he was entitled to in right of his crown. The error was this—that the hereditary revenue consisted in nothing more than what was given to Charles 2nd in lieu of the court of wards, pre-emption, tonnage, and other royal prerogatives. There was, however, no doubt in the mind of parliament with regard to giving his majesty the same as had been enjoyed by his predecessors. It is well known his majesty was fully persuaded there was such an intention on the part of his parliament; had the fact been otherwise, the House would have been less just towards his majesty than former parliaments had been with regard to his predecessors. In consequence, no doubt, of his majesty being aware of the sentiments of parliament, a message was brought down soon after his accession, by the then chancellor of the exchequer, stating, that his majesty, ever desirous of giving a proof of sincere regard for the welfare of his people, left it to his faithful Commons in making provision for the support of the dignity of his crown, to arrange such dispositions and settle such a sum for the expenses of his household and civil list as would best suit the interest of the public. The conduct of his majesty in giving up his hereditary rights, and leaving it to parliament to provide the whole of his revenue, has been called by sir William Blackstone a proof of the most disinterested bounty; and in consequence of it parliament assigned a revenue of 900,000*l*. a year, subject to life annuities to the princess dowager of Wales, the princess Amelia, and the duke of Cumberland, amounting to 70,000*l*. It could not (and indeed it was foretold) happen otherwise than that, in the course of a long period, growing incumbrances would arise, which would render it necessary for his majesty to resort to the liberality of parliament. Accordingly, in 1769, an application was made to this House; in consequence of which a grant of 513,511*l*. was made to his majesty to make good the arrears of his civil list. In 1775, 100,000*l*. was granted for the same purpose. In 1776, the incumbrances arising from an increase of expenses, which were hourly growing upon him, were such that his majesty was reduced to the necessity of making another application to parliament, and a sum of 618,340*l*. was granted to relieve him from his difficulties. In 1784 there was a further grant of 60,000*l*. and in 1786 of 210,000*l*. The whole sum, therefore, that has been granted at different periods to pay off the excess of the civil list expenses has been 1,523,511*l*. I would ask, whether the sums which have been granted to his majesty on account of the arrears of the civil list up to the present time, when the situation and circumstances of his family are taken into consideration, and when we advert to the fact, that the country, during the whole of the period, has been advancing in wealth and prosperity, is a sum which, added to the amount of the civil list of each year, was capable of producing a revenue equal to what was enjoyed by Anne, or George 1st or 2nd.

We have arrived then at a period when his majesty is again under the necessity of requiring the assistance of the House. The course that has been taken will, I am persuaded, be considered by the House with satisfaction, if not with gratitude, as meaning to put the House in possession of the most complete information, and leave no room for cavil or doubt by the concealment of any thing that could in the least tend to elucidate the subject. His majesty having expressed himself most graciously in his message to the House and requested that the object of it might be taken into consideration, it was thought necessary that a committee should be appointed. A committee has been appointed, and the subject has been investigated in a manner adapted to the wish of his majesty. They have unravelled the whole of the accounts; they have stated whatever was calculated to render them clear and capable of being fully understood. They had no authority to offer any opinion of their own; they have not offered any; they have made no observations whatever, except such as were necessary to enable the House to comprehend the accounts submitted to them. This leads me to the consideration of the accounts themselves; and whatever may be the feelings of regret by which I am actuated, and painful as it may be to me to reflect that, if the committee shall adopt the resolutions I shall have the honour to propose, it will produce a considerable addition to the burthen of the people, I am persuaded the committee will neither discover in the report nor the accounts, the slightest imputation of mismanagement with respect to his majesty's household, of corruption in any quarter, or of profusion in the disposition in any part of the sum allotted to the expenses of the civil list. Under those heads of charge of which the House is justly most jealous, namely, pensions and salaries, there has been a very considerable reduction. It appears, that in comparing the increase and decrease with regard to the pensions and allowances to the royal family, the first class of the civil list accounts, the total increase above the estimate is 45,183*l*. In the second class, which refers to the salaries of the chancellor, speaker, and judges, there is a decrease of 2,987*l*. below the estimate. In the third class, comprehending the salaries to ministers resident at foreign courts, there is an increase of 129,643*l*. In the fourth class, containing the charge for tradesmen's bills, the excess on the whole amounts to 74,090*l*. In the fifth class, the charge for the menial servants of his majesty's household, there is a decrease of 1,605*l*. In the sixth class, or pension list, there is, on the whole account, a decrease to the amount of 114,402*l*. In the seventh class, comprising the salaries payable out of the civil list revenues, there has been a gradual diminution, by which there has been a saving of 129,750*l*. The eighth class, containing the salaries of the commissioners of the Treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer, admits of neither excess or diminution. Under the head Occasional Payments, there is an increase of 1,047,587*l*.; the particulars of which are stated in the report of your committee. I wish the committee, in adverting to the civil list expenditure, to divide it into two branches—the household and civil list establishment; and I am persuaded it will experience some degree of surprise that the increased expenses of the former are so small as they appear to be. No individual, who is obliged to preserve an appearance of rank, has of late years been able to do so, out of so little as at the period when the present civil list was granted to his majesty. When gentlemen refer to their experience of the increased value of every article in the course of the last two or three years, and when they reflect on all the circumstances of the times, I am sure the excess will be readily accounted for. I desire to have it understood, that I do not mean to attribute the excess so much to the war as many other persons may be inclined to do. It will be recollected, that during the war there have been three years of scarcity. Many of the articles to which the expenditure of his majesty's civil list refers have certainly been increased by the war, but not in the way gentlemen have stated. However satisfactory the accounts are in one point of view, they must be a subject of regret and shame on the other; because it is impossible for the committee not to be sensible what difficulty his majesty must have experienced with regard to his household. I am fully aware that there are many parts of the accounts which ought to receive explanation—it is not, however my intention at present to enter into the various articles which compose the accounts, unless I am called upon so to do by the committee;

there are, however, several articles which I feel it incumbent on me to advert to. In page 52 it will appear, that part of the debt is the debt under the first class, including the debts incurred by the queen, on account of the younger branches of her family. When it is considered what is the number and time of life of the younger branches of the royal family, and that the expense on their account falls exclusively on the queen, it will be no small matter of astonishment that the debt should have amounted to no more than a sum of 28,634*l*. A very large portion of this arose upon the marriage of the prince of Wales. In the same page will be found a charge for the princess Charlotte. It is made to commence in 1797, though it was not advanced till a later period. I am sure it will be felt by the committee, that it is quite impossible the expense of supporting the princess Charlotte should be borne by the prince of Wales, considering the restrictions to which he is subject by the act of parliament for arranging the liquidation of his debts. It will, perhaps, be for the committee to say, whether it is not a charge that ought to be taken from the civil list altogether, and thrown on the consolidated fund? It is a charge that cannot be borne by the prince of Wales, and ought not to be imposed upon his majesty. I beg the attention of the committee to pages 39 and 40, referring to the pensions to the late ministers at foreign courts. I am well aware that some farther information is necessary. Ample information will be given; and, whatever deficiency there may be in mine, will be supplied by my noble friend near me. I will observe that, with regard to foreign ministers resident, it has been universally admitted, that the estimate made in 1786 was insufficient. The pensions of the late ministers at foreign courts have increased considerably within the last two years; yet notwithstanding the increase which has taken place within the last two years is so considerable, the actual increase in the last sixteen years amounts to no more than 129,643*l*. There is another branch which falls under the head of Occasional Payments. The committee perceiving there was an error of 20,000*l*. thought it right to avail themselves of the information contained in the book required to be kept by Mr. Burke's bill. In page 46 of the Report will be found the amount of royal bounties. It is not my intention to observe on the advances to the royal family, though satisfactory reasons can be given for them. I can state with truth to the House, that under the pressure and difficulty which existed with regard to the state of his majesty's household and civil list, I conceive his majesty's ministers would have been little less than criminal if they had not adopted some method of relief. I am unwilling to enter into particulars, unless called upon; but I am prepared. His majesty's ministers had no alternative between the one they have adopted, and the criminality of exposing his majesty to inconvenience and difficulty.—The chancellor of the exchequer then went over all the items of which the arrears now standing are composed, the amount of which was 990,053*l*., a sum which, he said, it was impossible to contemplate without regret; but he had stated how a large portion of it had been created; no part of it was owing to profusion, none of it had been corruptly employed, and it appeared from the report what a vast portion of the whole of this went to the necessary purposes of the civil government, and was not at all appropriated, as some had most erroneously supposed, for his majesty's personal use, or for his own household establishment. Now, he would ask any gentleman in the committee, if any there were, who were disposed to advert to the amount of the present deficiency, to compare it with those former aids of the civil list, to which he had adverted in the early part of his observations to the committee, to compare the advance made in the expenditure under the various heads of the report, on the subject of the civil list, and then to see whether there was to be found in any part of the expenditure the character of profusion? Had we seen any thing but what was to be esteemed a necessary splendor on the part of the royal family?—Certainly none. We had seen one sort of abundance on the part of the chief magistrate of the community in which we had the happiness to live. Every virtue that belonged to that character abounded in him; but with respect to outward splendor, the loyal feelings of the people would have gone much further, if desired, than they had hitherto been called upon to do; and he would venture to say, that the people had rather been disappointed for want of more, than satiated with too much of that splendor. The sum advanced for the discharge of the arrears of the civil list for the same period, in another reign, was more than was now required. And he wished to know, whether there was any reason for supposing that, although 1,400,000*l.* were justly granted at a former period, there ought not to be 900,000*l.* granted now? For his part, comparing the present with the former time, and that when the last aid was granted, and the unavoidable expenses in the interim, of which every individual of condition in this country felt the force, in his own and his family expenses, he thought the present arrears extremely moderate, that it gave full proof of remarkable frugality; that the economy was very great; for which reason he trusted there would be no opposition to the resolution, with which he should have the honour of concluding. He had no hesitation in saying, that, according to his opinion, the augmentation for the younger branches of the royal family, or advances made to them, should not in future be chargeable on the civil list, but on the consolidated fund, of which however parliament were to judge. If the House adopted the resolution which he should have the honour of moving, the expense in the first instance would fall on the people; there was, however, a circumstance to be attended to in that particular. The committee would recollect that he expressed a hope, on a former occasion, that there would be some means of a diminution of the burthens of the people by the sale of the crown lands in the West Indies, St. Vincent, &c. that was not, however, to be provided for at this moment, but might become matter for future discussion; but he begged to be understood, as being most clearly of opinion, that without any reference to such resources as that to which he had now hinted, and if there had been no hope of any such resource, the payment of the present arrears of the civil list would be matter of unquestionable propriety, and such as would become the wisdom of parliament to provide for. The subject therefore of these resources from the West Indies, was fit matter for a separate and distinct discussion. The civil list arrears ought, in his opinion, to be paid off without taking that matter into consideration at all. He was well convinced that if there were no resources, but such as he had hinted at, parliament would find them abundant, in the good sense, the justice, and the loyalty of the people of England.

Now, although it was not his intention to propose any permanent addition now to the civil list, yet he had no difficulty in saying it would, in the present condition of things, be impossible to maintain, without further aid, the necessary splendor of the Crown, and to support the necessary expenditure of the royal family; and therefore, he hoped, that some relief would be afforded to the civil list hereafter, by taking away from it some charges which at present bore, and which, in his opinion, did not belong to it, and laying them on the consolidated fund. Several heads of charges now upon the civil list, and which had been so during the war, might with propriety be charged on the consolidated fund, and which charges were very heavy and enormous on his majesty's civil list revenue during the war. The account of all which should be laid before them: and after such accounts were laid before the House, he hoped the subject would be brought forward again for discussion, for which he should be perfectly ready. He thought it was unnecessary for him to trouble the committee any further, for the present; he was thankful for the indulgence he had met in the course of what he had delivered before the committee, some parts of which were naturally dry and unengaging, and, he was afraid rendered more so from the manner in which it had been treated by him. He should now conclude with moving, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that a sum not exceeding 990,053*l.* be granted to his majesty, to discharge arrears and debts due and owing on the civil list, on the 5th of January, 1802."

Mr. Fox rose and said:—Sir, there is no man in this House less disposed than I feel myself, at any time, to find fault with such measures as may be conducive to the comfort, the splendor, and the dignity of every branch of the royal family; and particularly what may tend to the ease and happiness of the chief magistrate of the state, as far as I can reconcile such proceedings to the duty I owe to my own constituents in particular, and the general interests of the country. If it could be supposed that humour or temper were to govern any part of this discussion, the present is a moment in which I could have little disposition to indulge them. I have not been more than about four hours in town; and, since leaving my carriage, have heard of two articles of news than which I know of nothing of a public nature that could be more grateful to my feelings. The first is that in which every man, wishing well to his country, must rejoice, I mean the conclusion of the definitive treaty of peace with France; and the second, that it is the intention of the minister to move for the repeal of the income-tax,—a tax the most oppressive, pernicious, and vexatious, that ever was imposed in any country; and tending more than any other to subvert that respect in which a good government ought always to be held by the people, and without which there can be very little security for its subsisting for any length of time. This, however, is a subject which is by no means connected with good or ill humour, and is solely dependent on what is consistent with our attachment to the throne, a proper view to the laws of the land, and the sacred principles of the British constitution. However I may have been instructed or entertained by the right hon. gentleman, in the history he has given us of the civil list during the last century, I do not conceive it to have been precisely in point, or to bear strongly on the present question. My ideas upon that subject differ vastly from those which have been brought forward in this committee; nor can I conceive how any thing respecting the revenues of the crown previously to the Revolution, has more analogy to the present civil list than what may be drawn from the remotest antiquity. The revenues of the crown before the event alluded to, compared with the present civil list, was as gold to silver. The king certainly possessed immense revenues in former times, totally independent of parliament: but for this revenue, what had he to do? He was to raise and maintain fleets and armies in times of war, as well as in peace. It was no private income of his own, as an individual, but a trust from the public. It is very true, that such revenue was not adequate to meet extraordinary occasions; and though the monarch was bound, at his own expence, to defend the country, and maintain the expenses of wars, as well as civil government, in cases of necessity he applied to parliament for assistance. Whether that mode was preferable to that which has been since adopted, is a question not worth discussing at this moment; but I am free to confess, that I am a strong advocate in favour of the modern system. Now, however, that the House and the country provide for all the expences (and God knows they have been severe enough lately!) of our fleets and armies, the revenues allotted to the crown must necessarily be at the disposition, and subject to the control of parliament. It would be a strange and absurd doctrine indeed, to maintain that the public should take upon itself all the expence, and leave the revenue precisely as it was before: such a doctrine is too monstrous to have met with any support even in the worst of times. Fortunately for us, some of our kings have been too improvident, by which they outran their incomes.

In treating of this question I do not wish to be severe; but I understand, that so much stress has lately been made on the claims which some persons suppose the crown ought still to have upon a part at least, if not the whole of the old hereditary revenue, that I cannot withhold expressing briefly my opinion on that subject. Were we now to allow the hereditary revenue to be the same as it was in former times, surely no gentleman could possibly say that it should be applied to the purposes of the civil list only. I admit that the revenue of James 2nd was two millions annually; but I believe no one will venture to assert that it was granted only for civil-list purposes. From the time, however, that parliament exonerated the crown (for that is the fact) from the expence of levying and supporting fleets and armies, from that moment the hereditary revenues became the property of the public. It was so understood, and so expressed on the election of William 3rd. He could hold no hereditary revenue jure coronæ, for he was not the heir to the crown when he succeeded James 2nd. I am aware that a great misunderstanding prevailed upon this subject, and perhaps continues to prevail; but we are not now infected with the superstitious notions imbibed by some persons of that day. We know that William 3rd ascended the throne, not by right, but by the choice and election of the people, and therefore had no rights jure coronæ, nor any other rights but such as had been covenanted. So of George 3rd. He is not the heir of James 2nd, but of William 3rd; nor has he any right to this hereditary revenue, unless we go back to the ancient and absolute rights of prescription. What did the parliament of William 3rd do? Instead of the hereditary revenue, they appropriated others for the civil list, to the amount of 700,000*l.* a year; and should they exceed that sum, the surplus was to be at the disposal of parliament. From the sum of 700,000*l.* they deducted 370,000*l.* for public services; decreed that the crown revenues should be under their own control; and came to what I consider to have been a wise and salutary resolution, of granting it to him for life. The same practice has since been uniformly adopted at the commencement of every reign. I know perfectly well that there has been much difference of opinion on the question, whether it would not be better to make these grants of annual revenue from time to time. This doubt so far operated in the parliament of king William, that the provision was at first made temporary, but it was afterwards thought expedient that the provision should be for life. The same line of conduct was pursued on the accession of queen Anne, and has been followed up in all the succeeding reigns. The right hon. gentleman has anticipated the answer which might be given to some parts of his statement. I know that it has been a mistake made, not by lawyers or other well-informed persons, but by courtiers, that the hereditary revenue formed only a part of the revenue of the crown. From general recollection also (for I have not lately had much access to the Journals) I think that in the reign of queen Anne an application was made to parliament in aid of the civil list, at a time when 800,000*l.* had been expended, though the grant was no more than 700,000*l.* Great stress has been laid on the expenses his majesty has been put to in consequence of his family; but let it be remembered, that there were equal incumbrances in the reign of George 1st; that in the reign of George 2nd annuities to the duke of Cumberland, the princess Amelia, and the dowager princess of Wales, were charged upon the civil list to the amount of 100,000*l.* which, out of the grant of 700,000*l.*, left only 600,000*l.* of actual revenue. It is true, that in that reign there were three applications to parliament for relieving the civil list; but I believe, and think I may say with some confidence, that the relief was effected by a two-penny tax on all pensions and salaries, which was, in fact, a mode of making the civil list supply and make good its own defalcations, without any additional burthens on the public. In the same reign there was a successful application to parliament at one particular period; but, if I mistake not, it was merely to make up the deficiency between the actual receipts of the revenue, and 800,000*l.*, which was about that time settled as the limit of the civil list. The right hon. gentleman has urged, that the civil list of his present majesty had been loaded with annuities to the princess Amelia, the duke of Cumberland, &c.; but if these were liens on the civil list in the present, they were equally so in the reign of George 2nd, who had also to pay 100,000*l.* a year to the then prince of Wales. These annuities continued from 1745 to 1760; the remainder of the civil list of his present majesty only for five; but George 2nd had paid them for the space of fifteen years. I mention this principally, because I do not esteem it altogether becoming in gentlemen to appear in this House, in the shape and manner of counsel, to depreciate the amount of the present revenues of the crown.

It is to be observed, that all those annuities which hung as incumbrances on the civil list of his present majesty, ceased in the year 1786; that to the duke of Cumberland expired in 1765; that to the dowager princess of Wales in 1763; and that to the princess Amelia in 1786; so that, in fact, the whole of them ceased before the debt now brought forward began to accumulate. The proposition, so much boasted of, which was made in the beginning of the present reign, would have been a good one, if properly followed up. By that proposal the king relinquished nothing, because, constitutionally, he had nothing to give up in point of right, there being no right in existence. All that was done may more properly be considered in the way of an exchange. His majesty, indeed, had a right to expect that parliament would make the same allowance to him that they did to his ancestors; but when a civil list of 800,000*l.* a-year was granted to his grandfather, it was implied that the excess, which was never very considerable, should be subject to the controul of parliament, and that he should possess no more income from the revenues of this country than what the parliament thought proper to allow him. The right hon. gentleman, in tracing the history of the civil list through the course of the present reign, might have called to mind, that it was settled under an administration composed of persons who were considered as his majesty's peculiar favourites. The duke of Newcastle was then prime minister, and lord Bute and the late lord Chatham, secretaries of state. The right hon. gentleman seems to think the provision was less than it ought to be; but let me ask, is it to be believed that such an administration would ever have thought of proposing an inadequate revenue? But supposing they had done so, yet we must recollect, that the several annuities already mentioned were then so many incumbrances on the civil list; and yet we find that the debts it incurred in the first nine years amounted to no more than 500,000*l*. Though I was at that time a member of this House, I remember little of the discussion, and do not recollect that I was even present at the debate; but I recollect reading some pamphlets at that time published on the subject: one of these was written by a gentleman whose pursuits have since taken a more serious and holy turn—I mean Dr. Tucker, dean of Gloucester, who treated the matter in a very facetious and good-humoured manner. In offering an apology for the proceedings, he said, that it was no extraordinary thing if a very young man, just come to his estate, and consequently not so prudent and economical as experience might in time teach him to be, and who had lately incurred the expenses of matrimony, enhanced by fêtes, a coronation, installation, &c.—It was no very extraordinary thing if such a man, possessed of 800,000*l*. annually should in nine years contract a debt of 500,000*l*. The debt first incurred was at the rate of 50,000*l*. a-year beyond the income allotted. Parliament, it is true, consented to pay it; but, by doing so, acted, in the opinion of many persons, rather rashly. In the year 1777 the ministers came again with another demand; and it appeared that the debt had increased more within the eight years between 1769 and 1777, than it had done in the former nine years. The demand I now refer to was for the sum of 600,000*l*.; and though ministers were successful, yet the minority, which condemned the payment of the sum, was by no means insignificant in point of numbers, but still less so in respect to character and talents, as the committee will acknowledge when I enumerate among them sir George Saville, Mr. Burke, Lord Sydney, &c. I have frequently had occasion to be convinced, that the more parliament agrees to act (what, in the vulgar phrase, is called) handsomely by the monarch on the throne in pecuniary affairs, the worse effect is sure to flow from it; and I always feel great pleasure in recollecting the speech which the then Speaker of the House of Commons, sir Fletcher Norton, made upon that occasion to his majesty at the bar of the House of Lords, May 7, 1777. That intrepid and public-spirited man told the king, that “in a time of public distress, full of difficulty and danger, their constituents labouring under burthens almost too heavy to be borne; your faithful Commons have not only granted to your majesty a large present supply, but also a very great additional revenue; great beyond example; great beyond your majesty's highest expense; all this they have done in the well-grounded confidence that you will apply wisely what they have granted liberally.”* But if sir Fletcher Norton spoke thus of the distress and burthens of the country in 1777, what character can be given to those of the present day?

It reminds me, Sir, of the observation of Florus, who, living at a period when the Roman empire was so infinitely extended, reflects with surprise, that his ancestors allowed a triumph for victories over the Volsci; and, in the same manner, when we look back to the year 1777, when the public burthens were then spoken of as so grievous, and when we view the infinite accumulation of taxes since that period, we are tempted to compare it to the observation of Florus on the triumphs of the Romans over the Volsci, or some other petty tribes. The speech of sir Fletcher Norton, notwithstanding the clamours of courtiers, was approved. Although court sycophancy has of late increased to a degree that must disgust every generous mind, although servility has made such rapid strides as, to every philosophic observer, evidently tends to the utter destruction of the constitution, yet we cannot forget the subserviency and sycophancy of former periods. Notwithstanding the resentment of the courtiers at the manly and spirited language of the Speaker, it was finally carried, on a motion brought forward by myself, to thank sir Fletcher for his general conduct in the chair, and particularly for the speech in question. This speech was made by a man of eminent qualities, eminent too in having filled the chair, a situation which of itself makes a man respectable; and within five years, during the administration of the marquis of Rockingham (a period when peerages were more sparingly granted than in the times that have succeeded), sir Fletcher Norton was one of four persons who were honoured with that dignity. About this period, Mr. Burke, a man of the greatest abilities, of the most eminent services, a man for whom, notwithstanding latter differences, I have always retained the greatest veneration, brought forward a bill, the principle of which was, that the debts of the civil list were criminal; that when parliament had settled what the expenditure should be, any excess was disobedience; that it was the duty of the king's ministers to square the expense of the civil list by what parliament had fixed, not the business of parliament to keep pace with the extravagance of the king's ministers. Such, unquestionably, was the spirit of Mr. Burke's bill, and that bill clearly lays down that such a mode of payment shall be adopted that the salary of the highest class shall not be paid till that of the class immediately below is paid. I know that in the courts below an act must explain itself; but here we may reason upon the spirit and intent of the legislature; and indeed I cannot perceive that the act is so loosely worded as the right hon. gentleman argues; far less can I admit the position, that the violation of it being never complained of in this House constitutes an argument that none has ever taken place. If omission or silence were to be construed into acquiescence and approbation, not a principle of the constitution would remain entire, nor an abuse at one time or other without justification. So much was Mr. Burke convinced that his bill would produce the effect I have mentioned, that he boasted, as one of the advantages of it, that henceforth no arrear in the civil list could ever take place.

But, if Mr. Burke's bill has not produced all the good he intended, what are we to do in regard to the arrear that has accumulated? I adhere to the practice of our ancestors, and to the principles on which they fixed the civil list, as a measure essential to the existence of the monarchy. But why, as a friend to the monarchy, do I conceive that we ought not to acquiesce in the payment of this arrear? It is because it is essential to the monarchy that the king should, by a fixed revenue, be enabled to pay his civil-list expenses, independent of parliament. If, however, we find that four times in this reign the debts of the civil list have been brought to parliament, the king actually becomes dependent on parliament to that extent. What is the nature of the civil list? Nobody imagines that every year the expenses will be exactly the same. It is sufficient that, on the whole, the funds shall be sufficient to meet what is allowed to be an ample establishment. Till 1793 there was no excess; since that period the arrear has accrued. What are we to infer from this? Is it that a peace civil list will not do for a state of war? When the civil list of king William was fixed, was there not the prospect of wars? In three cases out of five the civil list since that period has been voted in time of actual war.

It is said, that it is necessary to maintain the splendor of the monarchy; and certainly I approve of that splendor, nor do I think his majesty has ever carried it to excess; but, surely, if it were for urgent reasons at any time to be abridged, it would be reduced with most grace when war calls upon the public in general to submit to such galling sacrifices. I contend, therefore, that the civil list should be voted for life, and the quantum fixed by parliament ought not to be exceeded. Variations in the expenses from year to year must have been foreseen, but an exceeding ought to be compensated by a future saving. If an arrear is incurred, ministers should restrict the expenditure till it is paid off. Nay, reformations and reductions, if necessary, should be adopted, to prevent an accumulation of debt, and to create a sort of sinking fund for its extinction. Parliament having settled what the civil list should be, ministers are guilty of usurping the legislative authority in extending the actual amount beyond the sum fixed. If it is thought improper to adopt reforms, or suspend or abolish places, to prevent the increase of debt, parliament ought to be consulted on the emergency. There is no excuse for accumulations. Experience shows that they ultimately must come before parliament. Why, therefore, is the certain accumulation permitted? With what face can ministers come down to parliament and say, "You fixed the annual expense of the civil list at 900,000*l.*, but we have actually spent 950,000*l.*: you made one law, we have acted on another: you must obey us; it is not for us to obey you?" Observe, too, the time when ministers discover that the war adds so much to the expense of the civil list. They announce the effect when the cause has ceased. They were afraid to tell us formerly that the war added so much to every expense of life, because the confession might have rendered the war unpopular, and have interfered with their plans.

Besides, ministers do not consider the aids the civil list has received. Mr. Burke's bill, by abolishing places to the extent of 30,000*l.* a-year, actually increased it to that amount. It is to be considered, too, that no small part of the civil list consists of fixed salaries, such as the great officers of state, which have not been increased since the days of Charles 2nd. The source of increase, owing to temporary causes, must apply only to the tradesmen's bills; and if any part were at all to be paid off, this would be the branch of arrear I could be induced to give my consent that parliament should discharge. We have seen the repeated interference of parliament only produce new demands upon it. We are told, however, that there has been no prodigality, no corruption. But, have we all the items before us? Do we know the expense of the office of third secretary of state?—a measure which, pernicious in a financial view, is still more so as a question of constitution. On the present occasion, the length of the late administration has one advantage (an advantage, however, which, in my opinion, is far from counter-balancing other evils), that we know exactly to whom the arrear is imputable. When these ministers saw the growing arrears of the civil list, did they make any effort to relieve a fund already overloaded? No, they established a new office of third secretary of state. This is but one item. Many of the occasional expenses seem unjustifiable. At the time of the Russian armament, ministers, finding it necessary to yield to the opposition they experienced in this House, aided by the public voice without, were obliged to drop the ground of quarrel with the empress. At that time, though we had lord Whitworth at Petersburg, a person fully equal to the station in which he was placed, ministers thought proper to send Mr. Fawkener, of whom from more intimate knowledge I can speak more confidently. Mr. Fawkener, a man of the greatest abilities, and fit to be employed in any business, however delicate and important, was sent to Petersburg to do that which our minister there could surely have done; that is, intimate that we gave up to the empress every thing she wished respecting Oczacow. Lately too, Mr. G. Grenville, a gentleman for whom I entertain the greatest personal respect, was sent to Berlin, though we had at that court a minister, who, it is to be presumed, was adequate to the duty of the office in which he was employed. Last year, though we had a minister at Copenhagen, lord Whitworth was sent to Copenhagen to do for another what Mr. Fawkener had done for him at Petersburg; and his being sent on that occasion showed that he was thought qualified for more important business, if necessary, than that in which Mr. Fawkener superseded him, and which was merely to make a civil bow to the empress, and announce that we had dropt all opposition to her views. All these occasional expenses, therefore, seem to have been incurred without any sufficient reason.

Neither can I see that any addition to the establishment of secretaries of state was necessary. Formerly all the business of America and the West Indies belonged to the office of the secretary for the southern department; and lord Chatham, a personage undoubtedly of the greatest talents, but labouring under the interruptions of bad health, not only performed all the duty of those offices, but united with them the conduct of a war, which at least vied in glory and success with that conducted by Mr. Dundas. The office of third secretary, which had been established with such fatal effects to the empire, was abolished by Mr. Burke's bill, and it was not till 1794 that it was revived; and though two of the secretaries of state, holding different offices, resolved to accept no salaries but for one of the places, it was so arranged that those personages took their emoluments out of funds immediately affecting the public, and in such a way as to relieve the civil list to the extent of 8,000*l.* a year. Yet all the inferior expenses of the new secretary's office were added to the civil list. This, I dare say, produced since 1794 an expense not under 70,000*l.* I conceive that the establishment of the new office was altogether unnecessary; but, even had it been wanted, ministers should have considered their means of paying the expenses of the old establishment before they increased it with new. The civil list (to personify it) should have reasoned like an individual, "I wish for this or the other thing, but can I pay for it?" Thus the civil list: "I wish to have a new secretary of state." "But have you the means to pay for him?"—"No; but the House of Commons will pay cheerfully. I have good friends there."—"But ask your friends first."—"Oh, no; it is not necessary; I can use freedom; I know my friends very well; they will be quite delighted with the opportunity. They have brothers and cousins to provide for. Never fear; let the expense be incurred. Say nothing about the matter at present; the House of Commons will pay the money, and ask no questions." Thus, without the least necessity, and amid increasing debts, new modes of expense are employed without decency, and sanctioned without a murmur.

My opinion then is, that we ought to reject the motion, and address his majesty that he would be graciously pleased to confine the expense of the civil list within 900,000*l.*, and establish such savings and reforms as will create a sinking fund to pay off the debt contracted by the misconduct of his ministers. And here let me, in illustration, allude to the case of the Prince of Wales. We have been told, that the expenses of living are increased to such a degree that the funds of the civil list are no longer adequate to their former objects. But surely the expenses of the Prince of Wales must be still more dependent on the increase of prices, and the charges on the mode of living? The Prince of Wales having in the first outset of life exceeded his allowance, has been restricted to 60,000*l.* a year. But did parliament in his case consider the change in the value of money, and in the price of living, by which the Prince of Wales must be so much affected? The Prince of Wales, in 1787, having declared that his allowance, as then fixed, was sufficient, I conceived that he ought to adhere to that declaration, and that a reservation of his new establishment should be made for the payment of his debts. But has not the crown, by conferring marks of honour on sir Fletcher Norton, and more recently by the message in 1786, declared that the sum of 900,000*l.* was sufficient? for the civil list ought to be no less bound to adhere to that engagement, than a young man just entering into life. But, if it is proper to maintain the splendor of the monarchy, the same argument holds good in the case of the heir apparent. Parliament, however, thought it right for a season to abridge the splendor of the Prince of Wales's establishment, in order to supply a fund for the extinction of his debts; and the same principle ought now to be acted upon. If this be not adopted, at any rate only the tradesmen's bills should now be paid; but the occasional payments, and other branches of debt, should be treated agreeably to the spirit of Mr. Burke's act. I hope that peace will put an end to that species of misrepresentation so prevalent of late years, that every man who opposes measures calculated to increase the influence of the crown, and the power of a minister, is an enemy to the monarchy itself. The influence of the crown has increased so much, that a temporary reform in its means of expense could be attended with no abridgment of its authority. Formerly, the crown had more to give with smaller burdens. Its influence now arises from the enormous naval and military establishments, which the wars of Europe and our relations with other powers have produced. In these there is ample compensation for any suspension of inferior offices connected with the civil list. Mr. Justice Blackstone has been quoted. Mr. Justice Blackstone rather leaned to the principles most in fashion anterior to the Revolution; and yet this writer has the good sense and candour to admit, that it may be doubted whether the admirable arrangement in fixing the civil list has not compensated to the crown for many of the prerogatives which it formerly used to exercise. I can truly affirm, that it is my wish to contribute every exertion of mine, by every legitimate means, to promote the happiness and glory of the sovereign; but there is a duty I owe to my constituents and the country, not inferior to the respect I owe to the monarchy. I wish to address the throne in language different from the language of servility. Courtiers may flatter kings, by telling them that parliament will pay whatever they think proper to spend. A different language is more seasonable and more consonant to the principles which placed his majesty on the throne. I would recommend this House to address his majesty with due respect, to suggest to him that he ought to reject the insidious advice of his courtiers; that he should distrust the ministers who mislead him into unnecessary expense; that it is his duty in all matters of finance to comply with the restrictions of parliament; and that it will be for the dignity of his crown, and for the prosperity of his people, to quadrate his expenses by the rules which the wisdom of parliament has prescribed.

Mr. Pitt observed, that all that the right hon. gentleman had said resolved itself into two points: the first was, that it was inconsistent with the duty of parliament, and contrary to the system upon which the civil list was granted to the crown for life, in any case to pay a debt contracted upon that civil list—the other question was with respect to the meaning of Mr. Burke's bill. In arguing upon this, and indeed upon almost every other subject, the right hon. gentleman had always shown himself fonder of quoting any other times than his own, from any ministers rather than those whom he had opposed, and from any parliament rather than those of which he himself had formed a part; but the right hon. gentleman had been rather unfortunate in his precedents upon this occasion, for there was not one of them that was not an exception to the conclusion which he wished to draw: because the right hon. gentleman had not been able to show a single instance in which, upon a case stated, the debt had not been paid; and he was sure he could not point out any case in which all the circumstances had been so fully explained, and all the facts so clearly laid before the House, as the one then before the committee. He therefore did not feel himself bound to argue at large the question, whether parliament, by granting the civil list for life, had deprived itself of the power of relieving the crown from occasional embarrassments. He would not enter into a discussion of the civil list, nor would he occupy the time of the committee by arguing much upon the construction of Mr. Burke's bill, by which the right hon. gentleman had contended that no debt upon the civil list could legally exist. With regard to this construction of the bill, he could only say, that it was one which he had never acted upon. His right hon. friend had stated, that there were many cases in which, subsequent to the passing of that bill, parliament had been apprized that debts upon the civil list had been incurred, and which had not been considered as violations of that bill. The right hon.

gentleman had spoken of an argumentum ad hominem, and had objected to any interference being drawn from it; but he contended, that he had a right to press that argument, particularly if it related to a period near to that when the bill passed, and when of course, if the bill had been violated, those by whom it was brought in would not suffer it to be violated without censure. If the right hon. gentleman would turn to the Journals, he would find that the first excess upon the civil list, after Mr. Burke's bill, arose in the year ending the 5th of April 1784; at that time he (Mr. Pitt) had been three months in office, and the other nine months of the year, the right hon. gentleman himself was secretary of state, Mr. Burke paymaster, and lord John Cavendish chancellor of the exchequer. It appeared distinctly upon the Journals, that during the three last quarters of the year 1783, when those gentlemen were in office, there was an exceeding upon the civil list to the same amount as in the first quarter of 1784. This excess was laid before parliament, and was voted without any objection of this kind being urged against it; therefore it was evident, that the construction now contended for was not then considered as the real construction of the bill. He confessed that this question about the construction of the act never came into his mind; and in looking at the words of the act, it certainly was a matter of doubt. Undoubtedly, if Mr. Burke's speech was referred to in order to construe the act, it might have borne the construction the right hon. gentleman put upon it; but it was rather singular that Mr. Burke, who was not only a watchful member of parliament, but a severe and hostile opposer of ministers at that period, should not have said one word about the violation of his own act, or contend for any such construction as that for which the right hon. gentleman had now argued. In 1786, the subject was again brought under the notice of parliament, and certainly Mr. Burke did not upon that occasion make any such objection; the motion having passed without a division, though at that time very few questions passed without long discussions and divisions. Now, if the construction which the right hon. gentleman contended for, had been at that time considered the true construction of the bill, was it likely, in the state of parties at that day, to have been given up without comment and without notice? But the right hon. gentleman had said, that every thing which parliament might not happen to take notice of, was not therefore to be considered as tacitly acknowledged. Certainly not in every instance; but the right hon. gentleman's argument did not apply in this case. This was not a mere paper laid before parliament, and which might have escaped its notice; it related to a very important subject; it occupied the attention of parliament, and was acted upon. But the argument did not stop here, for in 1789 there was another application to parliament, in consequence of one of the royal family coming of age; the subject was again discussed, but no such construction was even hinted at. Before the war, the arrears undoubtedly were inconsiderable, but after the war had commenced, the subject was two or three times before parliament, when the arrears began to be considerable; but during all that period such a construction as that now contended for had never been put upon this bill. It had been confessed, that up to the period of the war, the excess beyond the estimate, did not exceed 25,000*l.* a year. This the right hon. gentleman seemed inclined to overlook, and to consider the excess as not taking place till the war. It certainly was to be wished that it had not been incurred, but when all the circumstances were taken into consideration, and when none of the items were liable to suspicion, he did not think the right hon. gentleman would induce the committee to oppose the motion. One of the objections of the right hon. gentleman was founded upon the charge for foreign ministers; this was an article of expense which the right hon. gentleman used always to approve of, but he had stated that his objection was not to the continuing the former expenses, but to incurring new ones. The right hon. gentleman had objected, that different persons had been sent upon different missions, and had been witty upon the subject of lord Whitworth being sent to Copenhagen, and another gentleman having been sent on a former occasion to Petersburg, and had contended that the whole of this charge ought to be struck off. It would indeed be most extraordinary economy, to say, the civil list is in a state of difficulty, and therefore we must not send extraordinary missions to foreign courts, although perhaps it might be the means of saving the country from a war, or of leading to the conclusion of a peace. He would not now enter into any argument about the object of those missions, he would only ask, whether a difference of 2 or 3,000*l.* arising from such a cause, and under all the circumstances of the times, ought to decide the conduct of government, or whether it ought to be introduced into a grave assembly by a grave man? With regard to what the right hon. gentleman had said about the office of secretary of state, it was a subject which had often been mentioned in the House, and might be discussed again; but it would not be easy to state any period in which there was occasion for greater exertion and vigilance than during the war, and which must in a considerable degree, be kept up during the peace. The right hon. gentleman had spoken of the effect of peace and war upon the civil list; but his right hon. friend had proved that this increase did not arise from the war, as such, but had merely increased during a period of war. No such idea had ever been advanced by his right hon. friend as that, because the general expenses of the country were great, the civil list must therefore be increased in proportion. It had been admitted, that some of the expenses of the civil list must have been increased by the great increase in the price of provisions; but there were some expenses which absolutely arose out of the war; he would take for instance one charge, that was foreign messengers, an expense arising almost entirely out of the war. He found that this was charged under the head of occasional payments, under which head the greatest increase had taken place. Many of these expenses could not have been foreseen when the estimate was made. When, however, he saw that the pension list had been kept within its bounds, when he saw that the salaries had been diminished in general, and when he saw that the increase which had taken place was in articles the least liable to suspicion; he thought that no application had ever been made to parliament, the explanation of which was more simple, or one that came with a better grace than that now under consideration. There remained but one point more, upon which he would say a very few words, and that was, respecting the nature of the civil list. Upon this part of the subject he would not enter into any discussion of the different changes which had taken place in the nature of our revenues. He would contend that, when the civil list was once granted to the crown to be disposed of, generally speaking without the interference of parliament, it was at the same time not only the right but the duty of parliament to inquire, whenever they saw any grounds for suspicion of prodigality or corruption, and especially whenever there was any application made to them for relief. The right hon. gentleman had spoken of the expenses in former reigns, but if he took into consideration the grants to the crown and the debt in the three reigns preceding that of his present majesty, he would find that in the first sixty years of the last century, the average expenditure was 794,000*l.* per annum. Now, allowing for all the sums which had been granted in aid of the civil list, and which was now proposed to be granted in aid of the civil list, for the last forty years, the expenditure, upon an average, was not above 918,000*l.* a year. He appealed to the committee, whether this increase in the proportion of from 8 to 9, taking all the circumstances of the times into consideration, deserved the language which had been applied to it by the right hon. gentleman? Let us look at the value of money during the period of which he had been speaking. It had increased in the proportion of from 2 to 3, and the increase in the expenditure of the civil list was only as 8 to 9. It would also be fair to look at the state of the hereditary revenue: the average amount of that revenue during his majesty's reign was 1,200,000*l.* a year, in 1800 it amounted to 1,800,000*l.*; and this great increase of these revenues was an additional proof of the increased prosperity and wealth which the people had acquired during his majesty's reign. He had no doubt but that the committee would concur in the motion of his right hon. friend.

Mr. Tierney, though he highly approved of Mr. Fox's general reasoning, could not agree with him that no instance could occur in which a motion for the payment of arrears on the civil list could be constitutionally entertained by the House. Very many instances might exist in which such a motion would be highly fit to be entertained, and when such arrears might be of such a nature as would fully justify their being discharged. Still less, however, could he agree with the right hon. gentleman opposite, that the mere circumstance of the debt having accrued was any ground for the House agreeing to its liquidation, without a previous inquiry into its nature, and a satisfactory statement that it was the result of unavoidable causes. He was not prepared at once to give his direct negative to the payment of the present arrears, and therefore the mode of proceeding which he would recommend would be for the chairman to leave the chair, to report progress, and ask leave to sit again. It would then be in his power to move, that the subject be referred again to a committee, with instructions to them to investigate carefully the character of the several accounts, and to report their opinion to the House as to those parts out of the whole charge which they conceived ought in justice to be paid. He begged the committee to consider, whether all the payments made from the civil list in former reigns, and even since the accession of his present majesty, were now chargeable on its revenue. He believed that, in the early years of his majesty's reign there were many charges on the civil list, which were now satisfied out of other funds specially appropriated for that purpose. But, were the committee fully aware of the actual amount of the civil list revenue at the present moment. He had made some statements, the result of which was, that the amount of the civil list revenue was not less than 1,083,000*l.* It had been confidently affirmed, that the accounts now presented to the House were not liable to animadversion, but he was of a very opposite opinion. At the end of a war unparalleled in the burthens it had brought upon the public, the House were called upon to vote the sum of one million to cover the arrears of the civil list. The discussion of the propriety of voting so large a sum was a matter of the gravest importance.

Dr. Laurence said, that nothing was more erroneous than the supposition that Mr. Burke had changed his opinion of the expediency and propriety of his bill. In this opinion, he had continued unshaken in his retirement; if before he quitted public life, he had entertained any doubts on the subject, he would have fairly and openly have made them known to the House and the public. The learned gentleman recommended an adherence to its provisions, and suggested the propriety of revising its most striking clauses.

The Committee divided on Mr. Tierney's amendment. For leaving the chair;

46; Against it, 228. The original question was then put, when there appeared, Ayes, 226; Noes, 51: Majority, 175.

Debate in the Lords on the King's Message respecting the Civil List.] March 29. The order of the day being read, and also his Majesty's Message,

Lord Pelham said, he conceived it was not necessary for him to go into the subject much at large, because the papers laid upon the table by him some time since, had no doubt been read and considered by every noble lord as well as himself. For this reason, he would briefly recapitulate the statement of the expenditure, divided into distinct classes; 1. The Pensions and Allowances to the Royal Family; 2. The Salaries of the Chancellor, the Speaker, and the Judges; 3. Salaries to Ministers to foreign Courts; 4. The Bills of all Tradesmen; 5. The Menial Servants of his Majesty's Household; 6. The Pension List; 7. The Salaries of all other Places payable out of the Civil List Revenues; 8. The Salaries and Pensions of the High Treasurer, or Commissioners of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, 9thly, Occasional Payments. His lordship explained upon each of these several classes, in what manner the decrease or increase had arisen. In those parts which related immediately to the expenses of his majesty's family, a degree of economy had been practised, which would not fail to excite a just sense of his majesty's earnestness to prevent any additional burthens on his people. For the most part, that branch of the expenditure exceeded the estimate only where the excessive advance on the prices of every article of consumption rendered such exceeding unavoidable. The head under which the greatest exceeding occurred, was that of Occasional Payments; a head, the objects under which were so various, that it was impossible to form any thing like regular estimates to meet them. His lordship then moved, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, to return his Majesty the Thanks of this House, for his most gracious Message, and to assure his Majesty of the grateful Sense this House entertains of his Majesty's well-founded Reliance on the loyal and affectionate Attachment of this House to his Majesty's Person and Government; and that this House, fully convinced of his Majesty's constant attention to the ease and welfare of his faithful people, will readily concur in enabling his Majesty to provide such means as shall be thought proper for removing the difficulties that have arisen from the debt which has been incurred in his Majesty's civil government."

Earl Fitzwilliam heartily agreed in the early part of the Address; but with regard to expressing their readiness to concur in any mode of relief that might be submitted to them, he conceived they were not ripe for any such declaration. It became the House to make an ample inquiry into the causes to which the debt was attributable. It was the more extraordinary that any new excess should have arisen, because by Mr. Burke's bill, restraints were provided to prevent the possibility of ministers again running the Civil List in debt. It must, therefore, without farther explanation, appear, that ministers had disobeyed a positive act of the legislature. His lordship concluded with moving to leave out, after the words "people will," the rest of the motion, and insert instead thereof, the following words: "immediately proceed to the examination of the circumstances which have led to an accumulation of debt on his majesty's Civil List."

Lord Hobart said, that when it was considered that so small a debt had accumulated upon the Civil List expenditure in sixteen years, he thought the best way to manifest their respect to his majesty, would be to vote the Address; and therefore he must oppose the Amendment.

Lord Holland said, that no man had a deeper sense than himself of the many advantages the country had enjoyed under the auspices of the illustrious family which now occupied the throne; but recollecting how frequent applications like the present had been made during the present reign, he certainly conceived that so large a sum should not be granted as a matter of course. It redounded to the credit of the present ministers, that they had instituted an inquiry in the other House; and that their lordships should pursue a similar course, was the object of the Amendment. This was the more necessary, as it now appeared, that little or no increase had taken place in the household expenses. The plea of the high price of provisions must therefore be given up; it was a milch cow that was milked dry. It now appeared, that the debts had principally arisen under the head of Occasional Payments, which were stated to have been unforeseen. But if the late ministers found that the yearly revenue was insufficient for discharging the necessary expenses of the civil government, how did it happen that application was not sooner made to parliament? They must certainly have been fully aware, that this accumulation was a direct violation of the act of 1782. Mr. Burke could not have foreseen, that the spirit and letter of his act would have been so grossly violated; that a third secretary of state would be appointed; that this third secretary would be a noble duke who had supported his bill for the regulation of the Civil List; and that he would have assented to this accumulation of debt, in opposition to that measure, and to the direct terms of a protest against the payment of the civil list arrears in 1777. He was ready to meet the argument of the noble lord, as to the inadequacy of the Civil List to the purposes for which it was granted. He conceived that parliament and his majesty had, upon good grounds, at the time when the additional 100,000*l.* was granted, expressed their conviction that no farther debt would be incurred. Here his lordship entered into a calculation of the exonerations which had taken place, with respect to the charges on the Civil List during the last sixteen years, from the operation of the sinking fund; the direct reduction in the expense of the household in 1782; the separate establishment of four princes of the blood royal; and the reversion of the pensions given to two others since dead. These he stated at the sum of 200,000*l.* yearly, exclusive of the savings in Secret Service money, and various other charges which were now voted by parliament. Some of these he found under the head of Army Extraordinaries. He would, however, do the late ministers the justice to state, that they had all along taken out of the Civil List so much of the Secret Service money as was included in the estimate of 1782; amounting to 10,000*l.* for the home department, and 25,000*l.* for the foreign. But it was, at the same time, to be recollected, in a comparative view of the sufficiency of this fund, that the whole of the Secret Service money was charged upon it during the American war. When all these considerations were looked to, he would ask noble lords whether there was not good ground for inquiry into the cause of the present embarrassments. They were told that sufficient information was laid before them; but what kind of satisfaction could they derive from a mere statement, that certain sums had been paid under the head of Occasional Payments. It was certainly singular, that while a saving had taken place in other classes, this, which had, at its utmost limit, been fixed at 20,000*l.* should have so far exceeded that estimate as nearly to comprise the whole of the debt; for it amounted to no less a sum than 1,047,587*l.* This mode of keeping accounts reminded him of a story he had somewhere read, of a man who, finding himself living beyond his income, determined, by way of check upon his disposition to extravagance, to keep an account of his expenditure. He purchased an account-book, and resolved to be very particular in his items of expenditure; but on opening his book at the end of a week it contained but two items, viz.—“A lead pencil, 8*d.*; Sundries, 150*l.*” Thus it was with the accuracy of ministers: in details of trivial moment they were extremely minute; but, on the greatest head of extravagance, they lumped off an enormous sum under the head of “Occasional Payments.” The noble lord then adverted to several of the items in the account; and repeated, that if exceedings upon some heads of expenditure were unavoidable, they were amply counter-balanced by exonerations and acquisitions to the civil list establishment. These were surely points for consideration, and arguments against the necessity of exceedings; and if parliament, in its liberality, should think proper to adopt a mode of clearing off those arrears, he saw no reason why it should be otherwise than the provision made for paying off the debts of the heir apparent. That illustrious personage, having to support high and splendid rank, with a confined income, became of consequence involved in debt; a grant is given for his disembarassment, but inadequate to prevent new difficulties; and ministers, nevertheless, induce his highness to promise, for the future, to limit his expenditure within his income, which the style he had to support rendered impracticable. On his marriage ministers obtained for him an additional income of 120,000*l.*; but then they devote one half of it to a sinking fund to pay off his debts: to something of this sort, in the present instance, he would have no objection: but he could not understand the propriety of one law for the crown, and another for the heir apparent. Amongst other items, under the head of Occasional Payments, he observed one of a large sum of money advanced by way of loan to the duke of York, to be repaid by instalments in six or seven years. But surely the act for limiting the civil list never meant to make that a money-lender: a loan surely could not be properly termed an occasional payment; Better call it a royal bounty at once, and provide for it in some other way. The noble lord concluded with declaring that, if the motion of his noble friend for inquiry were refused, he would vote against the payment of the arrear altogether.

The Earl of Moira said, he would vote for the Address; but in doing so he wished to be understood, as not precluding himself hereafter from asking information on this subject. He considered it a fit subject for an inquiry, that so many charges were made on the civil list which had no connexion whatever with that establishment. The household expenses of his majesty bore no proportion whatever to the other expenses. This was a point which ought to be clearly explained. In those infamous publications which had been dispersed through the country some years ago, for the most mischievous of purposes, great pains were taken to represent his majesty as possessing an income of a million a year. The effect those gross falsehoods had on the public mind was well known. He would tell the most enthusiastic of these demagogues, that the establishment of a monarchy was as economical as that which belonged to any republic whatever. He would appeal to the example of history in all ages and in all countries, and ask, whether the most galling and vexatious democracy that ever existed could conduct the affairs of its government with more economy than a monarchy? The annals of all nations, and the universal experience of mankind, warranted him in saying, that a democracy was the most lavish and extravagant of all governments. Milton had said, that the trappings of a king would support the whole expense of a republic. That great man must certainly have been blinded with enthusiasm, or guilty of gross adulation; for no government in this country was ever more expensive than the commonwealth under which he lived. The splendor and trappings of the crown were as useful to the state as they were conducive to the dignity of the monarch; yet these trappings formed but a very small part of the establishment. He would forbear saying any thing concerning the affairs of the prince; but he could not help observing, that the provisions for the younger branches of the royal family were much too small for their rank and situation in life. A degree of prodigality was required of them which it was impossible they could practise.

After some farther conversation, the question being put,—“That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the question;” the House divided: Contents, 60; Not Contents, 4.

The Address was then agreed to.

Protest against the Address on the King's Message respecting the Civil List.] In consequence of the rejection of the Amendment, the following Protest was entered on the Journals:

“Dissentient,

“Because it is inconsistent with the duties of parliament to burthen the public purse with the unwarranted profusion of ministers of the crown, without examination, and without vouchers, especially as under the salutary provision of the 22nd of the king, it is difficult to imagine the possibility of sixteen years accumulation of debt without criminal contempt of the direction of the legislature.

“Because such sanction to unscrutinized accounts tends to violate the independence and depreciate the utility of parliament, at the same time that it exposes the crown to the reproach of a burthensome debt, which might possibly, on examination, be justified by necessity, or the public good.

Debate on Mr. Manners Sutton's Motion relative to the Revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall.] March 31. Mr. Manners Sutton rose, to submit a motion to the House relative to the claims of the prince of Wales to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall. In bringing forward this motion, he confidently relied on the justice of his cause, and on the calm, impartial, and dispassionate temper with which he trusted it would be entertained by the House. He confessed he was at a loss to discover what material objections could be urged against it; but while he fondly imagined that he thus saw his way clearly, a consciousness of his own inability fully to discuss a question of such importance, filled him with an anxious wish that the performance of a task so arduous had fallen into more competent hands. But, in the situation which he had the honour to hold, he felt it incumbent on him to refer to some of the circumstances that had occurred when he had before the honour of addressing the House on this topic. In the course of that discussion a wish seemed to be expressed by the House that more satisfactory details might be entered into on the question then before them. He felt it consequently his duty to comply with that wish as far as he was able. The main object of his proposition was, that a committee should be appointed to inquire what sums arising from the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall have been received, and under what authority, since the birth of his royal highness till the period at which he attained the age of twenty-one; and what sums had been advanced to his royal highness up to the 27th of June 1795, towards the payment of his royal highness's debts. Should the House acquiesce in this motion, it would then be necessary for the committee to examine into the Journals of parliament, that lights might thence be derived to guide the judgment of the House, in deciding whether there was any thing so doubtful in point of law, or questionable in point of fact, as to make it necessary to refer to the courts of law, or to determine whether it was not fully competent for parliament to come to a decision on the question. Should the House agree to the appointment of a committee, there would then be two questions submitted to their consideration. First, whether his royal highness be or be not entitled to the arrears of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall: and, whether, if he be, those arrears have not been expended for the public service?—But he should now proceed to advance some of the grounds upon which he imagined the claims of his royal highness to be founded. First, then, the claim of his royal highness was founded upon a grant of Edward 3rd to his son the Black Prince. He conveyed the duchy and its revenues to his son for his maintenance when that prince was only eight years of age. What Edward had in view by this grant was, to make over this property to his son, and to secure it to him independent of the crown, that the prince might be enabled to keep up that rank and splendor which were suitable to his exalted station. The consequence of this grant had been to vest the duchy in the prince of Wales from the moment of his birth. The prince of Wales is born duke of Cornwall, and entitled to livery of possession from the moment he is born; and he is declared of full age with regard to the revenues of the duchy from that moment. Such being the object and the operation of the grant, must it not appear extraordinary that the king should be entitled to hold the revenues of the duchy till the prince is of age, without being under any necessity of rendering an account of them? But, when he said that it must appear somewhat extraordinary that the king should be entitled thus to hold them, he hoped it would be distinctly understood, that there existed not the least controversy between his royal highness and his majesty on the subject of these revenues. His majesty had not received them for his own use, nor did he withhold an account of them. Far otherwise: if any serious difference of opinion had arisen between these illustrious personages, if his majesty had really received those revenues and resisted the payment of them, neither he nor any person acting under the auspices of his royal highness would ever have been permitted by his royal highness to have agitated such a question even for a moment. He must, therefore, entreat the House to understand that in what he had to offer on this topic, he was speaking only abstractedly; and in speaking thus he might be permitted to say, that it was rather extraordinary that, after a grant had been so made, the king or any other person should receive the property and revenues of the duchy. Yet doubts had been entertained upon this point by men of super-eminent legal talents; and doubts from such men were entitled to the greatest deference. Yet, with all the weight so justly due to such authorities, he could not bring himself to believe that they had ever pronounced a decided opinion upon the matter. They had contented themselves with stating their doubts, and had done no more. One doubt was, whether the king as guardian of his children, had not a just claim upon the revenues of the duchy? This doubt, however, was soon abandoned; for it was understood that guardianship in chivalry applies only to non-age; and this unfair and oppressive principle of guardianship was no doubt abolished by the act of Charles 2nd. By this act it was conceived, that all the feudal system was swept away; yet if, for the sake of argument, it be admitted that it was not, still the guardianship in chivalry is not applicable to the present case. Another doubt was, whether the king by his prerogative, or some other attribute, was not entitled to receive the revenues of the duchy. But, if there be any thing of prerogative in the case, must it not arise out of the grant itself? That this, however, is not the fact, will appear from a reference to the several reigns that have succeeded the reign of Edward 3rd. The first grant was made by Edward 3rd to his son, the Black Prince. Upon his demise, his son, afterwards Richard 2nd had livery of possession of the duchy. When Henry 4th ascended the throne his son had livery of possession, though then only ten years of age. Henry 5th died abroad, when his son was no more than eight month old, and then there was no time to give him livery of possession. But the reign of Edward 6th afforded by far the most decisive case. In 1453, his eldest son, afterwards Henry 6th, was born. In 1455, an act was passed, stating that as his son was born duke of Cornwall, and as he had right of possession, there should be delivered to him (as to his eldest son) the lands, rents, and revenues of the duchy, that he might enjoy the same in as full a manner as they had been enjoyed by his predecessor, Edward the Black Prince. The act then recites, that as he was under age he should have certain persons to act for him. It next enacts, that from the 12th of November 1455, the king shall have the rents and revenues of the duchy, till the prince shall attain the age of fourteen, deducting certain sums to be applied to purposes specified in the act. In 1459, the council of the prince presented a petition to the king, complaining that the duchy had been materially dismembered, and praying that as his son was duke of Cornwall, and as such entitled to the rents of the duchy, he might enjoy those rents and revenues in as complete a manner as they have been enjoyed by any of his predecessors. This petition was moreover stated to be a petition of right. It was discussed in parliament, and, with the advice of parliament, the king acquiesced in its prayer. What is the legitimate inference to be drawn from this precedent? Evidently, that the king had no prerogative that empowered him to receive those rents. If he was vested with such a prerogative, why make any application to parliament? Why were terms stipulated? Why comply with a petition so worded, and thus called a petition of right? But as the king assented to it, the learned gentleman conceived that this assent proved his second proposition, namely, that the king's eldest son has a right to the duchy. Surely he should not here be told that Henry 6th was a weak prince: for, granting that he was, did the charge of weakness apply also to his parliament, who advised him to comply with the petition? Indeed, here the learned gentleman thought he might safely rest the justice of his case. But he felt anxious to state other instances, with a view of removing every possible ground of doubt. In the year 1472, Edward 4th, by the advice of his privy council, granted the duchy and livery of possession to his son, then only eight months or a year old. The patent recites, the eldest sons, being born dukes of Cornwall, are in that capacity entitled to livery of possession. These were the exact words: this charter of livery was ratified and confirmed by the consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and also by the Commons; which proves beyond a doubt, that there this no nonage with regard to the duchy. In 1495, upon the accession of Henry 7th to the throne, he had no son born, and the revenues of the duchy were vested in himself. But it was at the same time expressly ordered, that if he had a son, he should enjoy the duchy, rents, &c. in as full a manner as any of his predecessors. The property of this duchy seems to be held by an extraordinary limitation; it remains with the king when he has no son, but it goes to the son the moment he is born, and again reverts to the king should the son die. King Henry appointed certain sums out of the rents of the duchy for the relief of his subjects from some grievance of purveyance. The next year a son was born to him, and the king immediately gives him livery of possession, and acknowledges that he is of full age. It was the opinion of justice Doddridge, that the king's eldest son is not only of age, but that the king is by law forced to give him possession as if he were of perfect age. In 1486, prince Arthur was born, and had livery of possession given him immediately after his birth. An act was also passed, repealing the assessment that had been made of certain sums from the duchy towards the relief of the subject from the grievance of purveyance, and the receiver was directed no longer to pay them. On the death of prince Arthur in 1502, Henry, afterwards Henry 8th became duke of Cornwall, and was discharged from being duke of York, because, in the former capacity, he had great and valuable possessions. Large fines, which had been levied in the duchy, were also put to the account of the prince. Henry 8th's son was of course born duke of Cornwall; but when his charter of possession was made out he could not precisely say. In the reigns of Edward 6th Mary, and Elizabeth, there was no son.—The learned gentleman next proceeded to the reign of James 1st. There it was supposed that some very formidable objection would be found to the prince's claims. He had given the subject much attention, but, notwithstanding, he was unable to discover any circumstances in that reign that militated against, but, on the contrary, many that plead in favour of, the right. James 1st was indeed anxious to withhold this property from his son; and had it not been for the character and conduct of justice Doddridge, who was his adviser, his son might have long been out of possession. An act was at length passed, which recites that the eldest sons of the king were entitled to become dukes of Cornwall: and hereby the king is forced to admit the right, and to confess that eo instante his eldest son is from his birth duke of Cornwall.—The reign next to be touched upon was that of Charles 1st. When he granted livery of possession to his son was not clear. Charles 2nd had no issue, and James 2nd abdicated the throne. William 3rd and Ann had no issue. When George 2nd came to the throne, his son was under age, but, immediately on his coming of age, an account was rendered him of the revenues of the duchy, from the time of his father's accession. Surely, a case of such modern period was well calculated to remove all doubt. In 1760, his present majesty ascended the throne, and, in 1762, the prince of Wales was born. From the instant of his birth his title commenced, and was perfected. As duke of Cornwall, he was entitled to the revenues of the duchy. No act was deemed necessary—no charter of livery required—since the act of Charles 2nd. After the birth of his royal highness, an act was passed enabling the king to grant leases of lands in the duchy, and that act recites, that “whereas the prince is seized of the duchy of Cornwall.” What is the meaning of this seizing, but that his royal highness's right to the revenue was the same as that of his predecessors?—These were among the prominent circumstances on which were founded the rights and claims of his royal highness; and if any doubts rested upon them, was it not most advisable to have them duly examined into by parliament? All the cases referred to appear uniform and consistent in support of the validity of the claim; and it was difficult to see upon what grounds the appointment of a committee could be resisted. Is it to be objected, that in some reigns the king has not granted livery of possession as regularly as he ought? Or, if so, does this irregularity weigh in the least against the title? and will it be wondered at, if the relation that subsists between the monarch and the heir apparent be duly considered? Now, let it be asked, whether the public have received the revenues of the duchy? If the proposed committee be appointed, it will soon appear, that all revenues, except a small sum of 12,000*l.* and of 16,000*l.* were carried to the Treasury, which the late chancellor of the exchequer would not be disposed to deny, for that right hon. gentleman stated, in 1795, that the revenues of the duchy had been applied in aid of the civil list, and as such were recognized by parliament. If now the title of his royal highness appears so clearly made out, will the House compel him to resort to legal means in order to establish his right? Indeed, it appears so clear, that no candid man can deny its justice—no honest man resist it. And here the learned gentleman begged leave to remind the House of the manner in which the present discussion had arisen: it did not arise in consequence of any complaint, nor of any demand, on the part of his royal highness: it was entered into by the House itself. It should also be recollected, that one material object with his royal highness was, to take no step that could embarrass the decision of the question respecting the civil list, or tend to excite the slightest degree of contest. There was another, and, he trusted, a laudable motive, which actuated his royal highness in bringing forward the question: that motive was, that he might stand well in the eye of the public, and show that, if his rights had been duly acknowledged, he should have been no burthen on the people: that his expenses, whether incurred prudently or otherwise, would all have fallen upon himself.—Mr. Sutton described the situation to which his royal highness had been reduced, in consequence of his not having enjoyed what he conceived to be his just right. He was compelled to slide into retirement and obscurity, and to see the exalted station and rank to which he was born, disrobed of the splendor and magnificence that were due to it. He should anticipate how the committee, if appointed, would view the question; but if the result of their inquiry tended to confirm the claims of his royal highness, he should then have to propose that the surplus of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall should be applied to the discharge of his royal highness's debts. The learned gentleman concluded with moving, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire what sums of money are due to his royal highness the prince of Wales, from the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall—by whom, and by what authority, its revenues have been received from the birth of his royal highness until he attained the age of twenty-one, and how these sums have been applied? Also, what sums of money have been advanced to his royal highness from the time he came of age until the 27th of June, 1795, for the discharge of his royal highness's debts."

Sir Ralph Milbank heartily agreed with every sentiment which had been uttered by his learned friend. He wished his royal highness should have fair justice done to his claims; and he saw no mode which offered the means of obtaining that justice so well as the one now proposed.

Mr. Fuller said, it appeared by the Journals, that Mr. Humphrey Morris, a member of the House, having been appointed warden of the stannaries in 1763, a motion was made for a new writ; but which, after a debate, was rejected; it being determined that the office was not a place under the crown. It was to be inferred, therefore, that the prince of Wales was seized at that time of the duchy of Cornwall.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he did not know how he could give a stronger proof of the confidence he felt in the motives and principles which actuated his own conduct, than in rising now and delivering his sentiments, after so clear a statement of the case, and so able an address as had been made by his hon. and learned friend. In many parts of that speech, though there was much to admire, his learned friend did not convey conviction to his mind. He had stated, with great ability the right of the prince of Wales to the duchy of Cornwall; and he had stated it as attaching to the prince from the moment of his birth, in like manner as if he were of full age; but, whether or not the right was so indisputable as the hon. and learned gentleman had contended, there were considerations which operated upon his judgment, and rendered it impossible for him to assent to the motion now made. His learned friend had assumed the right of the prince of Wales to the revenue of the duchy from his birth; but he meant to go into the committee upon very precise words, as they appeared in his motion, which was to inquire "under what authority, and so forth," together with a power to search for precedents, for the purpose of investigating the grounds on which he rested the claims of the prince of Wales, as they might appear on the Journals of parliament. But, he would ask, could such a motion be submitted to that House consistently with any authorized precedent? What did it amount to? That the committee should have the power of examining the Journals of that House; for his learned friend could not expect the House would enter on the second part of the subject previous to its disposing of the first, namely, that of taking any account of the revenues of the duchy. His learned friend proposed that investigation of the Journals which, he said, would satisfy the committee, and whose report on that subject would satisfy the House, of the propriety of the claims of his royal highness; and after that investigation, his learned friend proposed that the House, being satisfied of the right, should proceed to take an account of the revenues of the duchy; a combination of duties intended to be imposed upon that House, never before included in any motion that ever was adopted by, or indeed, he believed, submitted to it. His learned friend had gone through a very ample field of precedents, in which he was not disposed to follow him; nor, in his view of the subject, was it necessary; for he thought his learned friend had fallen into a fundamental error, not from want of ability, but from not having applied his talents to the subject in the way in which he conceived it ought to be considered, and particularly according to the practice of the last two centuries. His learned friend contended, that the effect of the act of Charles 2nd, which he quoted, was to abolish tenures, as he had stated the case to apply to the claim of the prince of Wales to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall. He had great respect for the opinion of his learned friend; but there were others for whose opinion he had also great respect, and which opinion was contrary to that expressed by his learned friend; the technical expression of which was, that in this case of guardianship, in chivalry, the guardian while the ward is declared to be seized, until application for release, being in possession, has a right to the rents and profits belonging to the ward: that the guardian was entitled to the profits and revenues after seizin and until livery is demanded, &c. This was applicable to the case of the prince of Wales. There was no demand of livery made on his behalf, as duke of Cornwall, during his minority. This he understood to be a point of law, on which opinions of the highest authority were adverse to this claim. He was not prepared to give a decided opinion upon it; it was not necessary he should; it was enough for him to know that doubts were entertained by those who were much better qualified than he could pretend to be to form an opinion on it: knowing that these doubts were entertained, he thought it improper to take the step now recommended; for until it was found, that legal redress out of that House was unattainable, he should think the House would be going out of its proper course, by entering on an investigation of the subject. He did not presume to state what these means for legal redress might be, but this he knew, that some of the best informed men were of opinion, that a petition of right was the proceeding proper to be adopted in this case. His learned friend's second head of observations was one on which a few words ought to be bestowed; and here the question was, whether the public had received the revenues and profits of the duchy of Cornwall? This was a part of the case which had about it considerable delicacy. Where was the proof that any part of the duchy of Cornwall had been directly applied to the service of the public? Was the proof to be found in the Journals of parliament? He knew, that during the minority of the prince of Wales, sums of money arising from the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, had been voted to be applied to the purposes of the civil list, and that 94,000*l.* of this property came under the head of public services. The House would recollect what the circumstances were which attended this transaction, and they would be fully aware, that it did not always follow that a sum intended to be applied for the public service could be said to be actually for the public service. He was entitled to call on gentlemen who contended, that this claim was a claim upon the public, in consequence of the application of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall to the use of the public, to show from documents, how and when that application of that revenue took place? His learned friend had stated a wish, on the part of the prince of Wales, to give satisfaction to the public. Whoever had the happiness to be acquainted with his royal highness must be well aware of the truth of that assertion. It was a pleasure to the public to reflect, that such sentiments were entertained by that illustrious prince. It must give satisfaction to every good man that his royal highness had an anxiety to stand well in the opinion of the public. Any man who could entertain a contrary feeling or a different wish, must be void of honour, dead to every generous impression, and ought to be branded as a monster and held up to the scorn of the public. But this was not mere matter of personal anxiety, even in his royal highness, manly and virtuous as that feeling was; that the prince of Wales should stand well in the opinion and affection of the public, was a matter in which the public itself was interested. But the learned gentleman had stated, that if this matter was fully investigated, it would appear, that when the sums which his royal highness had received were put in opposition to what he was entitled to, his royal highness had not been the occasion of any burthen to the public. Now, as to the state of accounts in this particular, as they applied to sums voted, he had occasion to lay them before the House on a former occasion, in stating the circumstances of the civil list; but he could not consent to the course of proceeding proposed by the motion now before, the House; and he called on the House to do him the justice to believe, that he had but one object in view, and that was to arrive at truth. The motion was of two parts; that of deciding upon the question of right, and that of taking the account. Upon the subject of the right, he had stated what had occurred to him by way of answer to the application to the House: he believed it to be by means of a petition of right: he must, however, not be understood to recommend that, or any other proceeding. As to the statement of the account, it appeared that the sums issued for his royal highness out of the civil list were monies which arose out of a fixed allowance, and which it was unnecessary to trouble the House with the detail of; there was an aggregate of 128,481*l.* there was besides an extraordinary allowance of 50,550*l.* a further sum between the prince of Wales and the duke of York, of 32,000*l.* the proportion of which that fell to the share of the prince was more than a moiety, but the amount of the advances in the year 1783 was 211,390*l.* Now, deducting 16,000*l.* of this aggregate, there would then have been received by the prince at the period he alluded to, upwards of 195,000*l.* This was applicable only to twelve years of the nonage of the prince of Wales. He believed the average of the allowance of his royal highness during the rest of his minority was 13,000*l.* a year, so that the whole sum was 233,764*l.* for nine years. When the prince of Wales came of age, there was a grant made to him out of the civil list, of 50,000*l.* for his revenue, and which was received by his royal highness until the year 1787, at that period an augmentation of the revenue of his royal highness took place out of the civil list, which was then raised to 60,000*l.* per annum. The whole amount from that period to the 5th of January 1802, was 865,000*l.* The whole sum advanced out of the civil list to the prince of Wales, since he came of age, was 1,725,000*l.* out of which there might be particular items deducted; such as the sum laid out on Carlton-house and some other arrangements that were made, the particulars of which were laid minutely before parliament in 1795. But, under all the circumstances of the affairs of his royal highness, supposing the advances which were made on the one hand, and the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall taken on the other, without touching the question of right, he doubted very much the accuracy of the calculation by which it was found that a considerable balance would be in favour of the prince of Wales. It could not but be matter of joy to the House to hear, that his royal highness intended to appropriate any thing he might receive, to the payment of his debts. The station of heir apparent of the crown, was so high and so onerous, that it perhaps required more than was allowed to him when he came of age. It was much to be wished, for the sake of the feeling and comfort of his royal highness, and indeed upon public grounds it was desirable, that he should be put in possession, as soon as possible, of the means which were granted by parliament. It was to be desired by the public, that every branch of the royal family should be supported with splendor, for the public was interested in that very appearance; and, however the oddity of the expression might excite a smile, he was of opinion, there was much sense in what was once said at the bar of the House of Lords by sir Fletcher Norton, namely, that all the branches of the royal family should be supported with a degree of splendor peculiar to themselves—that their affluence ought to be a conspicuous feather in the cap of state; it was a feeling proper to be cherished by a statesman, for respect to splendor was founded in the nature of man. It was his earnest wish that the payment of the debts of his royal highness should be accelerated as much as possible. It was with considerable reluctance that he opposed a measure that had for its object the attainment of so desirable an end. He knew it might be said, that a guardian, or a father, was not at liberty to make use of what might be left to his son during his minority, but that he was to apply it to the nurture and education of the infant during his minority, and account to him, when he came of age; but, considering the circumstances which attended the creation of the prince of Wales, for the first time duke of Cornwall, which was that of Edward the Black Prince, he thought it hardly possible to conceive, that it was then intended the whole revenue of the duchy of Cornwall should be appropriated by the duke of it, and yet that the king should have all the charge of the maintenance of such prince during his minority. He was not saying that the claim was unfounded; if it was a claim fit to be made, it was fit to be adopted, and ought to be so without delay. But a doubt was entertained on the subject. In 1783, when the duke of York came of age, there was much difference of opinion on the subject of the title of his royal highness, as now insisted on; and it was matter of surprise that the claims, as they were now stated, had so long escaped the vigilance of so many able men as had their attention so particularly called to this subject. He did not think he should be justified, under the present circumstances, in recommending to the House the adoption of this motion. There was one general objection, that of its blending two objects, in themselves naturally distinct, the question of right and the question of account. But his leading objection was this, that wherever there was a wrong in this country, there must be some redress. Such a point, in his opinion, ought not to be entertained in that House. If it had appeared in proof, that no application for redress could be made elsewhere, or had been made elsewhere in vain, it would then be time enough to apply to that House; but in the present posture of this case, he must oppose this motion, as one which did not come under the legitimate functions of that House. Nothing but absolute necessity could justify its adoption. He was unwilling to negative such a proposition as this, because it might be made a question elsewhere; but he could not support it, and would conclude with moving, "That the other orders of the day be now read."

Mr. Erskine rose to support the motion, and maintained that the length of time that had elapsed from the origin of the grant to the present period, was no answer to the claim, and if the law was clear, the House would be so far from being out of its course in entertaining the motion, that it would be in the direct discharge of its duty to the public. The only proper way of ascertaining the law upon the subject would be by referring it to a committee; and if upon the report, the matter appeared to be doubtful, it would be then time enough for the House to say so, by declining to proceed any farther. Mr. Erskine then took an historical review of the statutes and other records, from the time of the grant of Edward 3rd, to the Black Prince downwards; all of which, he said, were in favour of the right, and that it appeared from the statute of Henry 6th, that the king himself at that period, as well as the parliament, considered the right of the prince of Wales to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall to be clear and unquestionable. This, indeed, was obvious by that king coming himself in person to his parliament when the prince was only two years of age, to take some of it away, but still more from the petition of right decided two years afterwards, when the entire revenues were restored. This was a full recognition of the right, by parliament, and by a monarch whose interest and disposition to the contrary had been so manifest; and this decision, without a whisper to the contrary, remained untouched to the present hour.—It was true, that when Charles 1st was prince of Wales, it became a question, whether he was so entitled, but his title was only doubted upon the legal construction of filius primogenitus.—In the present instance there was but one point for consideration; viz. whether these parliamentary proceedings and other documents were sufficiently satisfactory, or whether a doubt remained for the decision of another tribunal. For his own part, he thought them absolutely conclusive, and consequently a sufficient foundation for the determination of the House without further controversy. He then went through the history of livery of seisin as dependent upon tenure until abolished by the 12th of Charles 1st, and said, that no prince of Wales had had livery of the duchy of Cornwall.—George 2nd, when prince of Wales, had no livery of seisin; his present majesty had none, and the present prince of Wales had none.—The claim, therefore, was not a doubtful one to be settled by a legal decision, but one that had been recognized for ages, and confirmed by repeated acts of parliament. Indeed, the only reason for asking the aid of the House of Commons was, because, though a petition of right had for a long time been prepared, difficulties had occurred in its progress; the best endeavours had been employed, but no certain advance had been hitherto made towards a decision.—With regard to the account, he would say nothing, except that it was on all hands agreed, if the right were found to be with the prince, that his royal highness had not, in any period of his life, been the smallest burthen to the public.

The Master of the Rolls observed, that the proposition of his learned friend had been submitted to the House with every possible advantage which could arise from luminous statement, or a display of the soundest judgment and discretion. However he felt himself under the necessity of opposing the proposition, it was impossible not to feel respect for the motives by which it had been suggested, and he was ready at once to allow that the anxiety of his royal highness for the discussion of his claims, arose much more from a wish that the real state of the account betwixt him and the public might be ascertained, than with any hope of immediate advantage. Still, however, the proposition was one which called upon the House to exercise judicial functions and legal investigations; and no disposition, however strong, to display marks of affection to his royal highness, should induce the House, consistently with the order of their proceedings, to entertain such a discussion. Discussions collateral with the general subject now under consideration might indeed be introduced, but they were wholly unnecessary, and for this reason he would not enter into them on the present occasion. On a similar principle, he would forbear to give any opinion on the claims of his royal highness, for if it should hereafter be found expedient to institute some legal inquiries, it might perhaps fall to his lot to assist in framing the decision which might be given; and sure he was that he would enter on any such investigation without the smallest portion of bias on his mind. True it was, that in 1795 he had, when the general subject of his royal highness's affairs were under consideration, expressed doubts how far the claims in question could be legally substantiated; but it would be recollected that he had, on the same occasion, confessed that he was far from being possessed of documents sufficient to found any decided opinion. As he had alluded to this period, he could not omit pressing upon the attention of the House, that at that period not a single individual, as far as his recollection extended, had held such high language on the subject of the claims as that which was now employed. Even an hon. general who had taken a very active part in the discussion, had not spoken of them in such terms, nor was a proposition then made by him for introducing a clause into the bill then framed, instructing the prince's commissioners to institute suits for the recovery of debts due to the prince on his revenues in the duchy of Cornwall. His learned friend had contended, that the claim of his royal highness was a legal claim, by which nothing else could, with any propriety, be meant, than a claim founded on principles of law. If this, then, was the case, what had the House to do with the discussion? Was it by a committee of the House that the rights of property were to be tried? He wished his learned friend to state, what was the kind of jurisdiction which they were to exercise on this point. In the first place, the existence of the right was fully asserted, and then a committee of the House was to be converted into a court of judicature to decide on its validity. If the case had been doubtful, it was allowed that it ought to be referred to a regular court of judicature; but he would contend, that if every member were convinced that the right did exist, the House could not accede to the proposition. If the doctrine held on the other side were once admitted, and if the House were thus to take upon itself to decide what rights were clear; would there, he asked, be any protection against the grossest infringements on property of every description?—The House, it was said, was never to interfere, except when the case submitted to their consideration was perfectly clear; but how false and dangerous did such a declaration appear when applied to analogous circumstances. Did it not daily happen, that in one court of judicature, a point appeared quite clear, which, on being considered by the court of review, seemed altogether as ambiguous and obscure? Suppose a point were decided a hundred times, and a litigant chose to think it clear in his favour, would that be any ground for him to come to the House and demand their decision? Did not his learned friend who spoke last in every term submit motions to a court of judicature, on points which almost all the profession allowed were unanswerably clear? It thus appeared, then, that the grand argument for the adoption of the proposition, from the clearness of the prince's claims, was totally fallacious, and therefore any farther objection might perhaps be considered as an act of supererogation. He would, however, shortly advert to another part of the argument of his learned friend. He had no hesitation in admitting the truth of all that was said about the prince of Wales being lord of the duchy of Cornwall at the moment of his birth; but, unfortunately, one of the doubts which might be entertained, arose at the time when their discussions ceased. No one doubted the truth of this general proposition; it was clear from the acts of parliament which had been quoted. It was not, therefore, that he had doubts on this point that he resisted the appointment of a committee; but it was the livery at an early age, when the prince of Wales was in a state of incapacity to exercise any function of life, which formed the grand subject of doubt. During the continuance of this state of incapacity, the whole management of the revenues necessarily devolved on his majesty, by whom alone every thing respecting them was to be directed. Not a single officer employed in the collection of these revenues was subject to any control but that of the sovereign, nor could carry what he had collected to any place but to the Treasury. To the king exclusively belonged the management of the education of the infant prince; and he it was who was to determine on the propriety of every article of expenditure. The question then came to be, did his majesty exercise these powers subject to control, or were they a part of his prerogative, free from every inquiry? It might be argued by those who deny that the king exercised these powers exclusively by his prerogative, that an account of the distribution of the revenues might be obtained. But how this was to be accomplished, he was at a loss to conceive. It was obvious, that it was not here, as in other cases of the investigation of accounts, where the distribution of the particular sums in question might be censured as unfit, as unnecessary, or extravagant. Here, he who took the account, and he by whom the disbursements were made, was one and the same; and therefore any examination which took place was idle and nugatory, because wholly without effect. The question, however, which the committee would have to resolve would be, whether the king was or was not accountable for the disbursement of the revenues? for that, he conceived, was the plain import of the words in the motion which empowered them to inquire under what authority the different sums had been received or expended. It made no difference as to this point whether his majesty, the public, or the civil list, were supposed to have received the benefit of the revenues; for, if his majesty was not accountable, neither could any responsibility be attached to the civil list or to the public. If any restoration was to be made to his royal highness, it could only be on the principle that the revenues had not been applied to the purposes intended. The question, therefore, in this view, resolved itself into the same thing as to the object of the committee's inquiries. What, besides, was to be the result of the opinion which the committee (supposing it to be appointed) might form? Was it to bind the present king, or was its influence also to extend to future kings? Was it, on the idea of its being unfavourable to the prince's claims, to deprive his royal highness of the privilege of applying for redress to a regular court of judicature, or to prevent future princes of Wales from asserting their rights; or was it to be of that description which was to leave it to the option of future princes of Wales to try the fate of another appeal to the House, or to a court of judicature? All these considerations ought to be well weighed before the House consented to appoint a committee. To induce the House to comply with the proposition, his learned friend (Mr. Erskine) had supposed that the difficulties of enforcing his royal highness's claims were so formidable that they could be ascertained in no other mode. He would not say that there were no difficulties in obtaining legal redress, but at present he declined giving any opinion. Whether such a remedy did, or did not exist, was as much a legal question, as a decision on the validity of the claims. If it could be shown that no legal remedy existed, this might be a fair ground for removing particular obstruction, but was no reason for the House taking the decision in the first instance into its own hands. Such interference as this was what the House was every day resorting to; and to raise particular statutes for the purpose of giving a remedy to an evil of very grievous pressure, was strictly consistent with their legislative powers. If, on application to the courts of judicature, it should be found that his royal highness had no legal remedy, then a question would naturally arise, how far it was proper for the House to interfere, for the purpose of removing obstacles in the way of legal redress. This position might be illustrated by numerous analogies. It frequently happened, that certain legal obstacles stood in the way of a cause being brought to trial, and by an application to a court of equity this obstacle was removed; but in such cases the court came to no decision. It merely removed obstructions to the regular course of law, and never went beyond what actual necessity demanded. The House, he imagined, were now pretty well in possession of his objections to the appointment of a committee. He did not oppose it, either because he was convinced that the claims of his royal highness were right, or because he held a contrary opinion; he had already stated, that on this point, he at present gave no decision. What he specifically objected to in the appointment of the committee was, that if the House consented to entertain the proposition, they would be assuming judicial power, to the exercise of which, on such occasions, they were incompetent, either on the principles or the practice of the constitution.

Mr. Fox confessed, he understood the question in a light considerably different from that in which it seemed to be viewed by most of those who had delivered their opinions. If he rightly understood the words of the motion, the object of the committee was not only very different from what the last speaker had supposed, but from what seemed very generally to prevail in the House. The motion did not seem to him to contain a single word of law, or a point of opinion, but related solely to the investigation of facts. The facts which the committee were to be directed to inquire into were, what was the nature of the orders by which particular revenues were levied and expended? Were they warrants from the Treasury, or from what other office did they originate? Such was his understanding of the object of the committee; and in this he could discover nothing of legal difficulty. He could, therefore, safely vote against passing to the order of the day; for if doubts of a legal kind existed, it was proper that they should be removed. Viewing the question as referring merely to facts, he begged to consider what these facts presented which called for the consideration of the House? It might be said, of what use was it to inquire into facts if there was no intention of grounding on them some subsequent proceeding? To this the answer was obvious. The consideration of the subject had come before the House from his royal highness in the character of a public creditor. He had stated his claims; he had desired the House to ascertain the quantum of what was due to him; he had called upon them, after this investigation, to discharge a debt owing from the public. If the committee, on their report, should state that the claims of his royal highness were just, the House would then be bound to discharge those claims; not by a judicial act, but by a legislative enactment. In this view, the statement of his learned friend (Mr. Erskine), with regard to the clearness of his royal highness's rights, was of the highest importance. He had heard every statement of the learned mover fully corroborated by his hon. friend, and the grand position which they had laid down of the right of the prince of Wales to the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, from the moment of his birth, was not denied by those who had spoken on the other side. If this, then, was admitted, all that he contended for was at once given up. If it was allowed to be the fair interpretation of the various acts of parliament which had been quoted, that the prince, from the time of his birth, was entitled to enjoy these revenues as much as if he had arrived to the age of maturity, why was it that he was not to enjoy the same advantages during his minority, that wards were entitled to under common circumstances? In one part of the speech of the learned gentleman who spoke last, it was not denied that it was a subject which, at some time or other, ought to be discussed. It was allowed that the case was analogous, because guardians were, in common circumstances, liable to a strict inquiry into their conduct, while the revenues admitted to be the unquestionable property of the heir apparent, were appropriated without any similar species of control on the mode of its disbursement. If ever a case for legislative interference did exist, this was surely one. But he could not so easily admit that the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall were subject to no control; and, in support of a contrary opinion, he referred to the statute passed in the first year of the prince of Wales's age, in the reign of Henry 6th, by which, for certain specified purposes, the king was empowered to appropriate the revenues, and that passed four years after, by which the former act was repealed. He was ready to admit that there existed many useless statutes; but of all the statutes he had ever heard of, this last was the most useless, if it did not mean that the king was to be accountable to the prince for whatever sums the revenues afforded.—He next alluded to the manner in which the claim of prince

Charles was decided; and contended, that the mode of decision in that case, was one which, even at the time it took place, was unjustifiable; but which, if it were to take place under the present circumstances of this country, and in the present more perfect state of the constitution, could not fail to be regarded as flagrant in the highest degree. When he heard gentlemen on the other side so strenuously contending against the proposed mode of deciding on his royal highness's claims, he was astonished that no learned gentleman should venture to hazard an opinion on what he conceived to be a legal question. In his own opinion, the strongest possible argument which could be used against the proposed mode, would be to point out another mode in which the prince's claims could be urged in a less exceptionable manner. On this point, however, they had chosen to say nothing, and had contented themselves with general objections. The learned gentleman who spoke last had said, that during the infancy of the prince, his majesty was necessarily the sole director of his affairs, and was subject to no sort of control. No man was a greater admirer of English laws than he was; every new opportunity which presented itself of studying their character served but to increase his admiration of the excellence of their spirit, for he did not mean when he said this to allude to particular statutes: but, in common with every other human production, they would be allowed to partake of defects, and one of the most striking of these defects was that to which he had alluded. The want of a provision on this subject was undoubtedly a subject of regret, and was productive of some degree of difficulty. Supposing the case of an infant heir to the crown, while no oath of allegiance was framed, perhaps it might be difficult to determine to whom allegiance was due; but, if called upon to give an opinion on such a case, gentlemen on the other side would probably admit, that it was due to the feeble infant whose hands were unable to wield the sceptre. In the same manner, when he was asked, how the infant prince, who, from the moment of his birth, was allowed to be the possessor of the revenues of Cornwall, was to enjoy what was admitted to be his property? He might be at a loss to give a satisfactory answer; he would not, however, feel himself entitled to say that these revenues were not to be appropriated for the prince's use in riper years. In coming to the history of more modern times, it appeared that the sums which had been received in the first years of George 2nd. had been paid over to Frederic prince of Wales, for those years which had elapsed, from the time of the accession till he had reached his majority. With all these cases therefore in view, reflecting on the variety of evidence by which his royal highness's claims were supported, he had no sort of doubt on his mind on the subject. But if he had no doubt on the validity of his royal highness's claims, he had still less even a glimmering of hope that they would ever be enforced by any other mode of application. As a general proposition, he not merely admitted, but contended for, the necessity of keeping the judicial and legislative powers totally distinct and independent of each other; but he could not allow that, in no circumstances, this general rule could be suspended. In every country, under every form of legislation in the practice of senates or of parliaments, circumstances have sometimes occurred where the ends of substantial justice required that forms should give way, and the legislative body should assume the powers of judicial discussion. Was this, then, one of the cases which would justify such an interference, such an extraordinary exercise of authority? The rights of the first subject in this country were left in a situation which deprived him of the advantages they were calculated to afford, and no adequate remedy was provided by the constitution. Under similar circumstances there could be no doubt that every means would be used to give relief to a private individual, and was the heir apparent to be denied that redress which the legislature was so ready to afford to the community at large? The mode of stating the claim of his royal highness to be on the public and not on his majesty, he granted was highly decorous, but it by no means altered the substance of the question. His majesty had appropriated the revenues which were the property of his royal highness, not indeed to the support of his privy purse, but in aid of the civil list. To this amount, consequently, the public had reaped the advantages of this appropriation. If his royal highness came forward to make any claim, he had two parties against him; his majesty, who had diverted the revenues to other purposes, and the public, who had reaped the benefit of this mode of distribution. Super-added to all this, he was to be told, that the king was entitled to make whatever distribution he thought proper, without being liable to any account, and that the public were not to be called upon to refund the sums which had been appropriated to their service. There was one sum of 90,000*l.* derived from the prince's revenues, and expended for special service, which was perhaps not of this particular description. A right hon. gentleman had hinted a suspicion, that it was applied for purposes that were bad—purposes injurious to the public. Not only was his royal highness to be deprived of his revenues, but, what an honour was to be conferred on him in the mode of depriving him of his property! No less a sum than 90,000*l.* is applied for special services; but the public has reaped the benefit. Not a bit of benefit has the public received from this application; but the prince is told, "Do not think of it: if the money has been applied even for purposes of corruption, this is a matter quite unworthy of notice, and cannot surely, for a moment, ruffle your royal highness's feelings!" What was this but adding an insult to injury? What was it but endeavouring to sport with him who had such serious grounds of complaint? He conjured the House to consider, that they stood in the character of debtors, applied to by their creditor, who required the liquidation of his claims: for that purpose, he wished their amount to be ascertained; he desired to know how his revenues had been collected, and under what authority they had been expended. This was one of the great questions, on which, if any legal difficulties existed, parliament was to act as referees; and in assuming this character, they would only be doing what was by no means uncommon even in the best times of our history. Every one knew that it was no uncommon thing for the House to declare what the law was on great constitutional points. To refer to no other instance, the decision of the House, declaring the illegality of general warrants, was an instance never to be forgotten. It might be said, that no precedents could be found to sanction the interference for which he contended; but to this he would answer, that the onus probandi lay with those who argued against the proposition now under consideration. In support of what he contended for, it was found, de facto, that the prince of Wales, from the time of his birth, was the possessor of the revenues of Cornwall; while, on the other hand, it was not found that the king had any power to appropriate them to any other purpose than the use of the prince. Putting the case of the whole of these revenues being appropriated to the support of the privy purse of his majesty, what was the situation in which, by such a distribution, a prince of Wales would be placed? The claim of the prince would, in this case, be the same as if the money had been applied in any other way. It was a claim, however, which no prince would assert; it was a right which he was confident his royal highness would sooner suffer every sort of privation than come forward to prefer. He was confident his royal highness would rather forfeit all his revenue, than urge any claim which might have the appearance of a contest with his royal father. He possessed, he was sure, in their full force, not only the common feelings of filial duty, but was impressed with all the sentiments which more peculiarly applied to such a father. He would say, if it was to be viewed in such a light, that he had received from his royal parent protection, kindness, instruction, accompanied with every testimony of parental affection, and he would sooner die than urge so ungracious a claim, or ask for any part of what was appropriated by one to whom he felt so many powerful obligations.—It was contended, that consideration should be had of all the money laid out on the prince's account during his minority—of the expense which he occasioned in his cradle. In the case of a private guardian, this would certainly be proper; but the king was in a very different situation: a private gentleman gives his son an education more splendid, on account of the wealth he was to inherit. Would any one say, that the possession of the duchy of Cornwall could have any influence in determining how the heir to the throne of Great Britain was to be educated? It was a duty incumbent upon his majesty to give a suitable education to all his children; and the public had supplied him abundantly with the means. There was a very strong proof that this was the way in which the subject was viewed by the king himself. The duke of York, when yet a child, was elected to the see of Osna-burgh, and entitled, of consequence, to considerable revenues. Had his majesty appropriated these to his own use, in con-

consideration of the expense which he had incurred? They had been held sacred, and the accumulated proceeds of the bishopric had been laid out in purchasing large estates for his royal highness when he came of age. No reference had been made to his private patrimony, or that of any of his brothers. The expense of the prince of Wales's education might be set off against the sums he is entitled to. He was of opinion, that this deduction would be unfair; but to think otherwise was no reason why this motion ought not to be agreed to; that point could only be agitated with propriety after the prince's right had been acknowledged, and an account had been taken of the money received in trust for him. He denied that any argument could be drawn from the late period at which the claim was set up. In 1783, when the prince's establishment had been settled at 50,000*l.* a year, certainly no demand upon this score had been made; but it would be most unfair that any should suffer from the negligence and laches of others. Mr. Fox allowed, that the affair had been entirely overlooked by him, as well as by Mr. Wallace and Mr. Lee, the attorney and solicitor general, and the other members of that administration. But in this, he contended, there was nothing extraordinary, and no ground for any unfavourable inference. It often happened to the most diligent, able, and capable men, to overlook what was clear and undisputed. What he was now to say was a matter of testimony. He gave the House his honour, that a thought of this matter never once entered their heads. It was not stated to the House from any opinion of its merits, but because it really was not known to exist. Some then thought the allowance of 50,000*l.* greatly too small, and he certainly was of that number. He was prevented from proposing an addition, only because there was a difference of opinion upon this subject between him and his majesty. When so much was said of the depreciation of money and the high price of provisions upon certain occasions, it was strange that on others they were never thought of. How could ministers talk so much of the increased expense of living in one case, and, on a parallel case, allow those considerations no weight? He allowed, that all the sums of money advanced to the prince since he came of age, would form a clear and undoubted set-off; but that any difficulty should be made in balancing the account, he professed himself amazed. He loved the laws; he approved the established forms of judicial proceedings; he had the highest regard for the line of distinction between the judicial and legislative powers; but, most of all, he had a regard for the principle of substantial justice. He should prefer the last, if incompatible with the foregoing; but here, he contended, there was no variance between them. It had been said, and said truly, that whether there was a legal remedy, was a legal question; but not the slightest intimation had been given of the manner in which this legal question might meet with a legal decision. The matter would not, he trusted, be got rid of by such shifts, whatever might be the fate of the present motion. For a subject of this country to be placed in a situation of such hardship, was most unjust and most disgraceful. There surely was no reason for this illustrious personage being treated in this manner. In 1795, he was placed under many restrictions—just, yet severe. Not only with the letter, but with the spirit of these, he had punctually and cheerfully complied. He had been obliged to reduce his establishment, and to live in the most private style. The right hon. gentleman had often talked much of the necessity of keeping up the splendor of the monarchy. He certainly thought this a very important object, though he was not sure that it might not sometimes give way to a greater. But did the right hon. gentleman think splendor quite unnecessary to the heir apparent? Would no bad consequences follow from the splendor of his establishment being so long suspended? According to the right hon. gentleman's principles, the most serious evils were to be apprehended. Under these circumstances, Mr. Fox said, if the prince of Wales had applied for relief without reference to any particular rights, he should have been inclined to have received the application, and to have considered it favourably. But when he says, "I have a just demand upon you," to refuse to hear him could be reconciled to no principles of generosity, of justice, and far less with the principles professed by the right hon. gentleman. He could not believe that the House would say, "I do not know whether I owe you the money or not; try your cause in a court of law: I rather suspect, that whether I owe you or not, you have no means to enforce payment: seek your remedy, bring your action; but, as a friend, I tell you, you have no remedy at all." This would be meanness and disingenuity of the deepest dye. The words of the motion might perhaps be rendered more unexceptionable; but no one could deny, that the prince of Wales had made out a colourable right, which ought to be inquired into. If it turned out to be well founded, he should receive what is due to him; if it should appear doubtful, it might be put in a way of judicial inquiry, and the king might be addressed to remove all difficulties in point of form. Last of all, if the House should be still more hostile to the claim, a resolution might be voted, saying that no farther proceedings should be had. The argumentum ab inconvenienti had often been allowed great weight, and never greater than of late. A member was allowed to retain his seat, who had been judicially declared ineligible; for a declaratory law was a judicial act. How much more was it necessary that there should be some relaxation in forms, in matter of such difficulty and importance as the present! He sat down in the confident hope, that the order of the day would be negatived.

The Attorney General said, if the prince of Wales were placed in circumstances in which he could not maintain the dignity of his rank, he should be willing to listen to an application for relief; but the question now before the House was a dry question of right. He expressed great astonishment that it had not occurred to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Fox) and his colleagues in office. He knew the extensiveness of their information and the grasp of their understanding, and he was sure that if the claim had been sustainable they would have advanced it. But it had never struck them that the prince of Wales, after having been maintained for one and-twenty years in all the splendor becoming his elevated rank, could at last call the king to an account for all the money received for that purpose during his minority. The learned gentleman was glad that the question had been brought to its true bearing, namely, whether the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, granted for the support of the heir apparent during his minority, should not be applied to this purpose. Edward 3rd could never mean that he should feel no exoneration by the rich grant which he made, but that it should be a dry, accumulating fund. The provident intentions of Edward 3rd and his parliament, forsooth, were now to be frustrated, and the money was to be locked up in a banker's chest. He did not ask the opinion of a lawyer upon the charter, but that of any man of common sense. Instead of occasional supplies, the prince had received his royal appenage. From the 33rd of Henry 6th the contemporaneous exposition of the legislature clearly appeared to have been that which he supported. By that it was enacted, that the prince should sojourn and be at diets in the king's palace, and that the king should receive an account of all the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall [Mr. Erskine called out that that act was immediately repealed.] The learned gentleman maintained that this made no difference whatever. The Yorkists had gained great advantages at that time, and every one at all acquainted with history knew that every thing was in the utmost confusion. The repeal of the law was of no consequence whatever. After considering the point of livery, the learned gentleman proceeded to deprecate the idea of the House mixing with the determination of a matter of right. This would be a thing of the worst omen. It had no sanction in the past, and would be a most mischievous precedent for the future. Particularly it would lay open a wide field for canvas and cabal, which could not possibly enter into the courts of law. The wisdom of our ancestors had made a separation which we should do well not to confound. He by no means said that the prince had any compulsory means of enforcing his rights, supposing them to exist. The king could not be called to account. When a petition of right was presented to the chancellor, although he decreed for the petitioner, if justice was still refused him, he had no remedy. This was on account of the peculiar situation of the sovereign, in whom great confidence was placed, and whom it might be dangerous to subject to any legal process. If the House went beyond their constitutional competence, and entertained this question, they would do so to no purpose. It had been shown clearly, that the money advanced to the prince of Wales during his minority exceeded all his revenues, and that no balance was due to him. The House had declared general warrants to be illegal, but that was a mere abstract question; and bore no resemblance to a question of civil right, touching the property of individuals. He thought it would be highly unbecoming in the House to obtrude its mediation between father and the son: it would be irreverent to the sovereign, and detrimental to the state. It was not pretended that these revenues had been in any degree misapplied. The elegant accomplishments and splendid endowments of the prince, showed that he had experienced the highest degree of parental care, liberality and attention.

Mr. Tierney said, that the master of the rolls had urged a very formidable objection to the motion, and had evidently made a deep impression upon the House. If he had not got over this difficulty, he confessed he could not so readily have given his support to the motion for a committee. But he thought he could furnish a complete answer to it. He denied, in the first place, the position, that the affair was between the prince of Wales and the king. The king had nothing to do with it, and his name ought not to have been introduced. The public was the other party with the prince, and, in taking cognizance of the matter between them, the House by no means acted as a judicial tribunal. A judicial tribunal was a tribunal that took upon itself to decide upon the contending interests of individuals; but the public, through the medium of their representatives, were now called upon to settle a dispute between an individual and themselves. Whatever was the nature of the report, it would conclude nothing. Against the prince the law would remain the same; and if in his favour, still it would not be final; as the appropriating act must go up to the Lords and receive their consent. The advantages of this mode of proceeding were very great. The learned gentleman was a judge of the soundest understanding, indefatigable in his exertions, and who studied not only the causes but the convenience of his suitors. Unbiassed as his enlightened and upright mind ever was, yet would he not feel, unavoidably, some degree of prejudice against a man who obstinately refused to hear the claims of his adversary, and rejected every proposal for an amicable accommodation? Would not he, most probably, have right on his side, who wished to avoid litigation; who would not exercise the extremities of the law; and who was anxious to make an appeal to his adversary's conscience?

The method of investigation proposed was, in fact, a species of arbitration, calculated to prevent unseemly altercation. It had been said, that the motion could not possibly be entertained; but sums of money were often voted, where a matter of right must be discussed and determined. He would suppose that a contractor to the loan paid in too much, and this contribution was carried to the Exchequer: when he applied for relief, the House could not say—"Seek your redress at law." A committee would be appointed, and substantial justice would be done. Again, he would suppose that the steward of the royal princes who had borrowed money from the civil list, were to pay the instalments to the civil list, instead of the consolidated fund, according to the proposed arrangement: if they petitioned for redress, would you turn them round and tell them to seek their remedy at law? According to this mode, no injustice could be done; and as this was not a suit to be determined between litigating parties, no form would be violated. The public by its representatives was merely to consider, whether it had not received an undue advantage, and whether this was not an advantage which justice to an individual required it to forego?

Lord Hawkesbury said, the right must still be tried. He disapproved of deciding a point of this nature collaterally, and by a side wind. The fact could not be determined till the law had been determined; and for the House to erect itself into a court of justice, would be attended with the most dangerous effects. He maintained, that the question was not between the prince of Wales and the public, but the prince of Wales and his majesty, into whose hands these revenues had come; and, though he might in justice call upon the House to make good any sum he was obliged to give, still he was the accountable person, and upon him the claim must first be made. He had administered the revenues; and if they had been diverted from their right use, it was he who had diverted them. He was incompetent to pronounce whether the claims of the prince were ill or well founded; but he must be blind not to see the mischief that would be produced by determining upon them in this manner. He must ever set his face against attempts to confound the different branches of the constitution. The motion appeared to him unprecedented in its nature, and dangerous in its consequences.

Mr. Nicholls contended, that as the House had permitted the property of the prince in the duchy of Cornwall to be sold, and leases to be given, by which the prince, on his coming of age, was deprived of a very large sum which he might have raised by renewing them, the House was bound to make good those losses to his royal highness. He quoted precedents to show that the House had been always desirous to protect the right of the Prince to the duchy of Cornwall and its emoluments.

Mr. Sheridan was happy to find that the noble lord was disposed to place the question in a plain light. For his own part, he should have been better pleased, had the motion more distinctly stated the nature of the points that were to be decided, and their grounds. In his opinion, it was to be considered who the parties were; whether a just claim existed; and whether any other remedy than an application to parliament could be pursued by the prince, if it was found that his claim was good? The parties in the question appeared to be the prince and the government in general, and therefore the House of Commons acting for the public. If the revenues which of right belonged to the prince were, by error or inadvertence, applied, for the public service, would it be a fair thing to tell the prince that they would not listen to his claim? With regard to the historical knowledge of the attorney general, he must say a few words. That learned gentleman had commented on the act of Henry 6th as settling principles for guiding the application of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall. But if, as that learned gentleman had contended, the king, as guardian of the prince of Wales, had a right to interfere with the application of these funds to the prince of Wales in his minority, why was this special act passed? The learned gentleman, however, upon an historical reference to the times in which these events passed, had laid very little stress on the repeal of the act. But he forgot that it was repealed on a petition stating it to be injurious to the prince of Wales. If the prince, however, had any claim upon the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, how was the right to be made effectual? Were the prince even to obtain a verdict against the king, could it be made available? And if it could not, would the House then be disposed to listen more favourably to the prince's application? For it was to the House certainly that the prince must ultimately look for payment. The House therefore ought to examine the right, to ascertain how much the prince might, on the statement of accounts regarding the application of the revenues of Cornwall, be entitled to recover. Surely it was ungracious to advise the prince to enter into a law-suit to ascertain his right, when some gentlemen contend, that no arrear would be found due. But, if there was any other mode by which the prince could proceed, it should be stated. This was no hostile proceeding. The prince acted with the most honourable motives, with the utmost delicacy towards the king, in trying to ascertain his right: he felt that he had a duty to his father; but he felt likewise a duty towards his creditors.

The Solicitor General contended, that if the prince had any legal right, the proper mode of proceeding, in the first place, was, to ascertain that right in a regular manner. If a petition of right failed, the claim might then be submitted to parliament. It had been said, that the prince came forward as a creditor of the public; but that was the very point to be proved; for how could he be a creditor, if he had no right to the sums for which he sought re-payment? Whether he was a creditor or not depended on the question, whether the revenues of the duchy had or had not been properly applied? It was understood, when the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall were settled on the prince of Wales, that they were to be for his support; because, when sojourning and at diet with the king, they were to be by the king applied to his use; but, when not sojourning and at diet with the king, he was to live at his own charge. He contended, that the revenues of the duchy being settled by the crown for the maintenance of the prince of Wales, no account of them could be asked for; and he cited, in illustration, the practice of the court of Chancery, where, after a sum was liberally granted for the support and education of a minor of large property, no account was given of its minute application.

Mr. Tyrwhitt was sorry, that any thing should have been said that could lead to the supposition that this question involved any contest between the king and the prince of Wales. The consideration of the prince's right to the revenue of the duchy, during his minority, came first to be considered in 1795; and in every consultation upon the mode of making it effectual, the prince had always made a proviso, that no measure to be pursued should imply any dispute between him and his royal father. When it was thought proper to proceed, by presenting a petition of right, the lord chancellor was applied to, who intimated, that he did not consider it as belonging to his official duty to present such a petition to the king. In 1796, however, the petition was prepared; and after it had lain over a time, the prince wrote the lord chancellor on the subject, who returned for answer, that he did not think it within the province of his official duties to present such a petition to the king. Since that time, no other mode of presenting it being found, nothing farther had been done in it. This statement he had made to show that the prince wished that this question should not be considered as between the king and himself.

Colonel Grosvenor had come to the House inclined to favour the claims of the prince; but the arguments he had heard had convinced him, that he could not venture upon the decision of the right.

Mr. Johnstone expressed great surprise, that gentlemen who had opposed the vote on the civil list, could consent to load the public with the sums now claimed. It appeared to him to justify what had been said of public men, that they were indifferent about what sums might be imposed on the nation, until the contest was about, through whose hands they should pass.

Mr. Calcraft thought the prince's claim entitled to the attention of the House.

Sir F. Burdett conceived that the cases of voting money to the civil list, and voting for examining into a claim of right by the prince of Wales were very different. It was the duty of every member to be jealous of the application of the civil list money, especially after repeated arrears had occurred, and when it was strongly suspected that the public money was unconstitutionally applied by ministers. No such jealousy was to be entertained of the prince. While this constitution existed, it was right that a suitable degree of splendor should be assigned to the prince. Surely there was no proportion in the extent, and none in the danger to be apprehended from the sums voted to the one, and the sums voted to the other. Besides, it was right to teach the prince, that the best way for him to succeed in any claims he might conceive he had, was to bring them forward constitutionally. For his part, he thought, that, owing to the influence which a right hon. gentleman opposite had acquired in the House, by his eloquence, or some other means, the prince of Wales, on every occasion where a question concerning him was brought forward, had been treated by the House in a degrading and shameful manner. [Here the hon. baronet was called to order. The Speaker observed, that to say the House treated any branch of the royal family in a degrading and shameful manner was unparliamentary.] He meant to say, that in his opinion the prince of Wales, in consequence of the influence of a right hon. gentleman opposite, had been treated in a manner unworthy of the House. He had seen, that by loans, and jobs, and pensions, the minister could always procure support to his own measures: he was jealous, therefore, of the influence of ministers. He thought the prince should be made independent: that he should be encouraged to bring forward his claims in a constitutional manner, that he might have no temptation to become the slave of administration. When he considered the nature of the profusion of ministers, when he saw pensions given to rich earls daughters, and made the subject of marriage settlements; when emigrant French clergy and noblesse were supported by money voted in parliament, he was surprised how any gentleman could stickle about taking the claims of the prince of Wales into consideration. He had no objection to a just degree of splendor in the crown; and he thought any one might look at the splendor of St. James's without being dazzled; but he did not think that the prince ought to be treated with contempt. The late administration had shown a marked disregard for the prince of Wales. He thought the prince almost one of the worst used men in the kingdom. Ministers had treated him with equal contempt as those whom they had confined in Cold Bath Fields. Indeed, they treated all those, of whatever rank or station, who did not support their measures, and would not be subservient to their views, with indignity or with rigour.

Mr. Ellis said, he deprecated whatever brought burthens on the people, as much as any man; and as to the present question, he conceived it to be of that kind with which the House had nothing to do.

Earl Temple said, he should have given a silent vote, were it not for what had fallen from the hon. baronet, which he thought made it necessary for every independent man to state his reasons for the vote he should give. His lordship then delivered his opinion, that the House was not a fit place for the discussion of the prince's right.

Mr. Jones said, that the claims of the prince were comprehended in one word, and that was, justice. He thought the honour of the House, and the dignity of the empire were at stake: "Fiat justitia ruat cælum."

Mr. Manners Sutton observed, that nothing could be more unfounded, than the assertion, that he came there to involve his majesty and the prince in variance; that could not possibly be the case; for the question was not between the prince and his majesty, but between the prince and the public. His majesty had no right to receive the revenues in question; nor, in fact did he receive them: they were received by the public; and he asked them of the latter in parliament, the only constitutional representative of the public. His learned friend had said, that the only remedy was by an adverse suit at law. He was not aware how this was practicable; as, in the opinion of one of the first legal authorities in the country (Mr. Hargrave), no petition of right could lie with respect to personal property. He knew not by what rule of law the king could be called on to restore, even supposing his majesty to be the object of application; but he would repeat, that if the king did receive and should resist, the prince would not enforce his claim.

The question being put, "That the other orders of the day be now read," the House divided:

Mr. Canning's Motion for Papers respecting the Island of Trinidad.] April 2. —Mr. Canning said, that the present motion was preliminary to one, of which he had also given notice, relative to the cultivation of the Island of Trinidad. He did not disguise, that his attention was directed to the question relative to the slave trade, though he did not mean then to enter into the discussion of that question; but, often as it had been discussed, he had never heard any one attempt to maintain that if the trade did not now exist, it ought to be commenced. There had been only two points relative to this subject that had been decided upon by the House; the one in 1792, that the slave trade should be gradually abolished; and the other in 1797, when an address was voted, praying that his majesty would take such measures as would lead to the ultimate abolition of this trade. It must be admitted, that to bring a great extent of new lands into cultivation, must be very far from contributing to the ultimate abolition of this trade; and, if the whole island of Trinidad was brought into cultivation, it evidently could not contribute to that abolition. It was important, therefore, that the House should be in possession of authentic information relative to this island. If he was not misinformed, the land to be put into a state of cultivation in Trinidad, was somewhat more than half the whole quantity of land which was cultivated in all our West India Islands. According to a statement published by a member of that House, now no more, the whole quantity of land in a state of cultivation, in the island of Jamaica, in 1795, amounted to 1,000,000 of acres, employing 250,000 slaves. If he was not much misinformed, Trinidad contained 800,000 acres, of which, at the time it was captured by Great Britain, only one-eighteenth was in a state of cultivation, employing about 10,000 negroes. If 250,000 negroes were employed in the cultivation of the lands in Jamaica, how great must be the number of negroes which must be imported to stock the lands of Trinidad. The objection most frequently made, by those who opposed the abolition of the slave trade, was, that it was injurious to the vested interests of the West India proprietors. No man was less willing than himself to trench upon those interests; but this objection would tend rather to strengthen the motion which he intended to bring forward, as the great advantage resulting from confining his motion to Trinidad was, that there was very little property vested in that island; and he particularly wished to know, as nearly as possible, how many individuals had a vested interest in that island. He had been informed, that since the capture of Trinidad, some resumption-grants of land had been made. The Spaniards had made several grants of this nature, as they had formerly done in Jamaica; that is to say, the lands were to be resumed, if not put in a state of cultivation within a certain time. He wished to know what the criterion was, by which it was ascertained that the lands were not put into a state of proper cultivation? Upon considering the subject, it struck him, that nothing was so likely to be the criterion, as the number of labourers or slaves employed in the cultivation of the land. If this was the case, and if the land was liable to be resumed if there was not a sufficient number of slaves employed in its cultivation, it became a question, what was the least number of negroes without which the land could not be put in a proper state of cultivation. Upon looking at Jamaica, he found, that 250,000 negroes were employed in the cultivation of 1,000,000 acres, or one negro to every four acres; he might take this, therefore, as the least number of negroes, without which the land could not be sufficiently cultivated. He wished, however, that the House should be in possession of every information relative to the subject; and concluded by moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, that he will be graciously pleased to give directions, that there be laid before this House, copies or abstracts of any information transmitted by the governor or commander in chief of the island of Trinidad, since the capture of the same, relative to the state of the cultivation of the said island, and to the amount of its population, distinguishing the different classes of inhabitants; likewise of any plans or descriptions of any proposed allotment or distribution of lands for the improvement of the said island; and also, copies of any instructions which have been sent to the governor or commander in chief of the island of Trinidad, since the capture of the same, directing or authorizing him to make any grants, sales, or settlements of land within the said island; and of any accounts received from the said governor or commander in chief, of any grants, sales, or settlements, made in pursuance of such direction or authority; and also copies of any information received from the governor or commander in chief of the island of Trinidad, relative to any resumptions of lands within the said island, since the capture of the same; specifying the causes of such resumptions, and the authority under which they have been made."

Mr. Chancellor Addington was extremely desirous that the House, in acquiescing in this motion, should not entertain expectations of information which, he was inclined to think, could not be afforded. All that he could say was, that if the House should agree to the address, every thing that depended upon government would be done, to give it full effect; but no inference was to be drawn from this acquiescence, that the motion would be the means of procuring all the information that was expected.

General Gascoyne said, that the right hon. mover had asked, whether, if the slave trade had not yet existed, any member of parliament would venture to recommend its institution? Now, there certainly was such a member of parliament, and he was that person. He would say, that if the slave trade had never existed, viewing, as he did, the beneficial consequences of it to this country, it ought to be commenced now. The advantages of this trade were immense; they were not confined to the town that he represented, but were diffused over the whole country.

The motion was then agreed to.

Debate on the Budget.] April 5. The House having resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, the several acts passed relative to the Income Tax, and the accounts that had been presented, were ordered to be referred to the said committee.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that whatever might be the reflexions which presented themselves to his mind at the present moment, he should abstain from uttering any, except those which appeared to be absolutely necessary. It would be his first duty to remind the committee of the Supplies already voted, which were as follow:—

By this it appeared, that the period for which these sums were voted for the navy, army, ordnance, and miscellaneous services was for five months only. There would remain seven months more to be voted in the committee of supply; but, under the present circumstances of the country, it was not his intention to propose now any resolutions for the remaining seven months for the navy or army; but, in the mean time, he could assure the committee, that every retrenchment that was practicable should take place. There would, therefore, remain to be voted for the navy, army, ordnance, &c. for seven months, and some for miscellaneous services. The Ways and Means, as they now stood, were as follow:

The terms of the loan were 65 3 per cent consols, 60 reduced. Deferred stock, 6*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*; making together 131*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* for every 100*l.* of money. The 3 per cent consols were taken at  $75\frac{3}{4}$ , being  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent more than the market price at the close of Saturday. The reduced, generally estimated at 1 per cent under the consols, were taken at  $1\frac{3}{4}$  above the market price on Saturday also. This bargain he considered as perfectly satisfactory and auspicious to the greatest degree.—On the subject of the tax on income, he could assure the House, that the step which he was about to take was the result of his own thought; and that not only from what he had felt in his own breast for a considerable time, but that which he had communicated to others, who, if necessary, would vouch it for him; and he was sure the hon. gentleman opposite would do him the justice to say, that in January last he spoke with reserve upon that subject, and begged that no inference should be drawn as to the course which might be thought advisable by the executive government to pursue; all he said, or meant to say, at that time was, that the income tax was a measure much too important for the House to let go during the continuance of the war. He should be sorry if the measure he was about to take was the result of a change in his opinion, as to the policy of continuing this tax had the war continued; for, upon that subject, he knew he differed from many hon. members, for whose judgment he had great respect. He was, however, bound to declare, that it was his thorough and entire conviction, that it was to the wisdom which originated that tax, and the firmness which induced the House to persist in it, that the country was indebted for the comforts we now had; for it was by that system that we were enabled to surmount the difficulties with which, during the last three years, we had to struggle; and it was from that conviction also he now recommended that this burthen should not be left to rest on the shoulders of the public in time of peace, because it should be reserved for the important occasions which, he trusted, would not soon recur. In that sense of the matter, he should always look to this mode of impost to be carried into effect, with little difference from that which now subsisted, except as to such modifications as might render it more efficient; he thought it worthy of the credit and the character of this country, to look forward to such a resource, in the painful event of being obliged to struggle for its honour and independence: not that he apprehended such a condition likely to be our lot soon; but he thought it his duty to state the sentiments he entertained on this subject—sentiments which he believed he should never change. He had now, however, the satisfaction of proposing an exoneration to the extent of this impost for the people of this country. He had stated, that it was his painful duty to suggest to the committee, the taxes by which he proposed that interest was to be provided for 97,934,437*l.*; and he should commence this head of what he had to submit, with observing, that it was impossible to satisfy the claim of interest on such a sum, without proposing taxes which must bear hard on the people. All he would ask of the committee was, to follow up the principle which had governed our conduct of late, namely, that of looking our debts and engagements fairly in the face.

Without further preface he should proceed to lay before the committee, the taxes, by which he proposed to provide the means of raising the supply. The first he had to propose was a tax on malt, hops, and beer. On malt. 1*s.* 0*d.*  $\frac{1}{4}$ per bushel; on hops,  $2\frac{1}{4}d.$  and 8-20ths per pound, to make it  $3d.$  When lord North was chancellor of the exchequer an allowance was made to the common brewers in the nature of a drawback, of  $1s. 4d.$  This he should propose to repeal. He should propose  $2s.$  per barrel on strong beer, subject to a drawback, this year, of sixpence, in consequence of the difficulties with which the trade had to contend. The effect of this additional duty, on each barrel of beer, would be the next year  $5s. 11d.$ , but during the present year,  $5s. 5d.$  He was willing to hope, that this tax would be as little liable to objection as any. He was aware of the opinion which prevailed when the brewers raised the price of their strong beer to  $4\frac{1}{2}d.$  per pot, in consequence of the high price of malt, and an erroneous opinion it was. He was aware also, that the brewers should not be placed in a situation wherein they could not stand the competition of private brewing, or in which the trade of a common brewer might be materially injured. The private individual was also to be the subject of this taxation: this was a subject which involved the interests of the public materially, as well as those of the common brewer. It was painful to increase the price of that necessary article of life, malt-liquor: the proportion, however, as it bore on the common brewer and the private individual; would be so managed, that the inducement to brew at home would not be diminished, nor, on the other hand, so increased as to injure the public brewer. The operation of the duty on beer he expected would enable the brewer to sell for  $18s.$  that which at present he sold for  $16s.$  Under this head he meant to do away in taxation the distinction which had subsisted between table and small beer; and in doing this, he proposed at once to correct a great deal of fraud, and put an end to a pernicious beverage which had lately been used. A great deal of small beer had been mixed with strong, for the purpose of bringing the whole of it under the lowest duty; by which practice certain noxious ingredients were introduced into the beer. He should propose to attach the duty on strong beer and table only, so denominated. This duty, together with the duty on malt and hops, he estimated at  $2,000,000l.$  per annum.—The next tax he had to submit was an augmentation of the assessed taxes; and here he must remind the committee of the repeal of the income tax. It could not be expected, that those who were to be now excused from the pressure of the income bill were to feel nothing after the repeal of it; since those who contributed to the one must, generally speaking, contribute to the other. His purpose was to proceed upon a scale of progression, the average increase produce of which he estimated at about one-third of its present amount; the particulars of which would be specified hereafter. There was, however, one subject on which he would glance as he passed. A large number of journeymen tradesmen remained in the houses of their employers, and did the duty of servants; but under the title of journeymen, they were not taxable; by which means a considerable evasion took place of the duty on domestic servants. He should propose to charge for each of these persons  $10s.$  a year; the produce of which he should presume would be  $100,000l.$  Taking this sum and the rest of the addition to the assessed taxes, he would set down the whole under this head, at  $1,000,000l.$  per annum.—He had next to propose a tax upon imports and exports, as a substitute for the convoy duty. He had held conferences with several well informed individuals, who had given him much useful information upon this subject, and whose co-operation he had reason to expect. He proposed to get rid of the present mode of taking the duty, to do away the system of ascertaining it ad valorem, in some cases, and to make certain regulations in others, as explained by a schedule which comprised 5,000 articles of duty, which would be exhibited all at one view. The duty on imports, with certain modifications, was to be increased, and that upon exports to be diminished. This could not be said to be a duty that would operate to the injury of trade; for it had been tried for three years, and during that period our trade had rapidly increased. He estimated the produce of this duty at  $1,000,000l.$  The amount, therefore, of the Ways and Means, for defraying the interest of  $97,934,437l.$  would be—malt and beer,  $2,000,000l.$  assessed taxes,  $1,000,000l.$  duty on imports and exports,  $1,000,000l.$ —In all,  $4,000,000l.$  By this there was an excess beyond what was wanted of near  $800,000l.$

Upon the subject of the produce of the consolidated fund, he requested, for a few moments, the patient attention of the committee. He knew he was treading on tender and sacred ground. He was sure there was not an individual more deeply impressed than himself with a conviction that the sinking fund was the sheet anchor of this country; and if he were to make a proposition which could, in the slightest degree, shake that fund, or retard its progress in the redemption of the public debt, he should deserve to meet the reproach of every friend to his country. The operation of the plan he had to submit would be the subject of discussion on a future day; the object of it was not to retard but to accelerate the plan for the reduction of the public debt. The committee would recollect, that in 1786, the plan was first submitted to the consideration of the House, and then a bill passed by which one million was appropriated to the reduction of the national debt. All the compound interest of this sum was made to accumulate, and it was vested in the hands of commissioners, who should receive the annuity thus accumulating until the whole should amount to four millions annually; and when that period arrived, it was declared to be in the power of parliament to say, whether that should continue to increase, or be applied to the reduction of taxes. In 1792, it was provided that 1 per cent of every loan, or further sum borrowed, should be applied in the same manner as the million was in 1786; that was, to operate as a sinking fund for the extinction of such loan. Now, he intended to propose, that these two powerfully operative sinking funds should be consolidated, and work their purposes together, for the reduction of the whole debt, and, however paradoxical it might appear, yet it was true, that the whole debt could thus be extinguished in a shorter period than by keeping each to its operation, according to the former system; because, by the new plan, the whole fund would continue to accumulate, whereas by the old one, the operation of accumulation would cease when it amounted to 4,000,000*l.* By the latter system, the extinction of the whole debt would be accomplished in 45 years, a debt which must now be considered as upwards of 500,000,000*l.* His great object was, and he should expatiate upon it hereafter, to do justice to the present time, and also to make provision for the welfare of our posterity. It might be said, that the benefit to be derived to the public by the reduction of taxes, after the sinking fund had attained its maximum, would be prevented by this plan; but it should be considered, that, independent of this plan, there would be to be provided 900,000*l.* to support the fund of one per cent, for the reduction of the capital accrued since the last provision was made for such reduction.—There was one other subject on which, he was sorry to say, he was not able to give the satisfactory answer he could have wished. He alluded to the duty on salt. He never gave any assurance upon that subject; but he had stated in the course of the present session, that he had hopes he should be able to get rid of this duty. No man felt more than he did a desire to get rid of such a duty as this, when it could be done with safety. But, under the present circumstances, he did not think that he should be justified in proposing the repeal of this duty. He did look forward to the period when the country might be relieved in this respect; but he would not allow that the tax was so oppressive as some had stated it to be on the lower order of the community.

He would now recapitulate the substance of what he had stated. The whole supply was 24,614,430*l.* of which there was for Ireland 1,808,338*l.* The whole of the ways and means already voted was 27,930,874*l.* The sum actually wanted for interest, management, &c. was 3,211,202*l.*; and he had provided taxes for raising 4,000,000*l.* The general ground of the operation of the two sinking funds united, he should hereafter have to bring forward. He trusted, that by a firm and temperate system, we might promise to ourselves security and comfort. To secure to us our advantages, we should adopt, to use the words of his noble friend, a system of conciliation and firmness, by which we might preserve to ourselves the blessings of peace. The evils of war, he hoped, and indeed was confident, had ceased to operate on us; but this should not make us forget the maxims of our true policy. He then moved a resolution for raising the sum of 25 millions by way of loan.

Mr. Whitbread said, that if the plans which the right hon. gentleman had brought forward this evening respecting the trade with which he was very materially connected were to be carried into effect, they would be found to operate in the most oppressive manner. Perhaps, the peculiar situation of danger in which he found himself placed, might unfit him at present to enter more cordially into those feelings of satisfaction and triumph in which the House were disposed to indulge from the conclusion of a loan on terms so extremely favourable, and the pleasure they experienced that the day was at last come when "the solid system of finance" which had so often formed a subject of exultation to a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt), but which the country had found to be so odious and so oppressive, was to be abolished. Undoubtedly, the repeal of the income tax was a circumstance which could not be contemplated without pleasure, and however the chancellor of the exchequer might pretend to have preserved the same sentiments on the expediency of the tax as at any former period, the repeal, at the present moment, was a severe sarcasm on the conduct of his predecessor. Proceeding now to the point in which he felt the strongest degree of interest, he went on to show that the principle of taxation now proposed was different from that adopted by any former administration. He reverted to the tax on beer imposed by lord Chatham in 1760, and showed, that at that period the public brewer received an allowance in the way of drawback, which in a great measure, indemnified him against the loss which he would otherwise have sustained: in the administration of lord North, when the tax was imposed in 1780, the same system had been pursued; and, during the administration of the right hon. gentleman's predecessor, this allowance was not withdrawn, when, in consequence of the Spanish armament, an additional tax on beer was imposed, the policy pursued by parliament hitherto on this point was uniform; and in every one of the acts of the legislature on the subject the allowance granted in the way of drawback was precisely declared to be for the purpose of protecting the public brewer against those who brewed only for purposes of private convenience. He could not but consider it a very odd sort of reasoning, to say that the brewers were now able to bear this tax, from the fall which had lately taken place in the price of grain. It was to be considered, that this was said at the time when the brewers were merely come to the prospect of relief; for hitherto this relief had been but very partially experienced. For a number of years, they had laboured under every sort of disadvantage: with all their exertions it was hardly possible to avoid a positive loss, and to gain any profit was absolutely impossible. Because grain had fallen for the last two market days, was this any thing like a fair argument, that the brewers were able to support so large an increase of taxation? He would assert that the brewers could not afford to sell beer to the public at less than 4*d.* a pot; and, when this additional charge was to be made on them, it could not henceforth be any object to them to continue their trade. On the supposition of any house brewing to the amount of 200,000 gallons a year, by the proposed tax, they would have to contribute to the exigencies of the state no less a sum than 10,000*l.* He would put it, then, to the justice of the House, whether the repeal of the income tax, was any just cause of exultation to those connected with a trade on which a direct levy to so great an amount was to be imposed. If once such a principle of taxation were admitted, future chancellors of the exchequer might without hesitation apply in a similar manner to a variety of other departments of trade. In 1760, when the tax on beer was imposed by lord Chatham, the price of malt was only 23*s.* a quarter, and beer was 3½*d.* per pot. In 1780, malt was at 30*s.* 9*d.*; whereas in 1802, its price was not less than 52*s.*, and had during a considerable period been as high as 98*s.* a quarter. He asked the House to compare the prices at these different periods, and then to say, whether such an additional charge was founded either in fairness or justice? He wished to know whether the stock in hand was to be subject to its operation? He touched on the exertions used by the brewers to favour a large importation of barley; and said, that while the speculation had been of considerable advantage to the public, it had turned out very injurious to those by whom it was in the first instance promoted. He believed the loss was not less than 40,000*l.* of which a large proportion had fallen on himself; a sum for which they had surely a reasonable claim to indemnification. He examined the calculations of the right hon. gentleman, and contended, that, on the principle he had laid down, the tax would produce two millions and a half, instead of two millions. If so, it was hard he should take so much from them. The brewers had suffered great hardships before they had raised the price of beer; and as soon as the prices of barley and malt had lowered, they reduced the prices. If a halfpenny a pot more was to be laid on beer, the repeal of the income tax would be no cause of joy to the brewers. If the whole of the tax was laid on malt instead of beer, he thought it would be more beneficial to the revenue. We are told (said he) that the national debt amounts now to upwards of 500 millions, 250 of which were contracted during the administration of the right hon. gentleman's predecessor. I cannot but think, that at the conclusion of a nine years' war, it is but a poor satisfaction to the people to tell them, that such is the amount of their debt; and that, after all their exertions, every object of the war has completely failed. France has extended her dominion far beyond what even the fears of the most desponding had ventured to calculate. The Bourbons are driven even from the hopes of a throne. The prince of Orange has been deprived of the possessions long attached to his family. The states of Switzerland have lost the independence, which the blood of their fathers had purchased; and England, in return for all her exertions, and all her sacrifices, has gained the Dutch possessions in Ceylon, and the island of Trinidad! I am glad to hear from the right hon. gentleman, that the maxims he has laid down for his administration are different from those of his predecessor. I rejoice that it is his intention to avoid every thing which may have the appearance of insulting foreign powers; that he is determined not to interfere with the internal situation of our neighbours, but to conduct the foreign politics of this country on a principle which, though by some it may be despised, is the justest guide of national conduct—the principle of intrepid moderation. With such a system, and with a rigid plan of economy carried into every branch of the public expenditure, I do not despair of seeing the country recover its former greatness. The right hon. gentleman has exulted a good deal at the prospect of the continuance of peace for a considerable period. I sincerely hope his prophecy may be better founded than that of the right hon. gentleman who preceded him in office. In 1792, that right hon. gentleman at the opening of his budget, rejoicing that never at any former period was there such a prospect of peace for fifteen years as at that very moment. But how fatally did reality falsify the prediction! In nine out of these fifteen years the nation has been plunged into a disastrous war. I have only to hope, that the prediction uttered this evening may not be equally disappointed.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, it was not proposed [to lay any tax on the stock of beer on hand; but he saw no ground why the stock of malt on hand should not be made an object of taxation. The hon. gentleman had stated a material loss sustained by the brewers in the importation of foreign barley; but it was impossible he could say any thing upon the subject at present. The hon. gentleman had stated, that at the close of the war, none of the objects of that war had been attained. He denied the position: they had attained the objects of the war, seeing that they had gained all that they had not lost.

Mr. Pitt said:—Sir, I wish to offer a few words, in consequence of what has fallen from the hon. gentleman who spoke last. The hon. gentleman has referred rather inaccurately, to certain expressions which he supposes me to have used in 1792. But the tendency of the language to which he alludes was an expression, not only of my confident reliance, but of my earnest hopes, of the continuance of peace. It is certainly true, Sir, that at that period there was not a man living, who felt more his personal happiness engaged in realizing that happy prospect which then opened itself to this country than I did—that prospect of the continued operation of our increasing wealth, our increasing commerce, our increasing resources, which had been the happy result of ten years of economy, of labour, of firmness, and of wisdom, on the part of parliament, in their endeavours to cultivate the arts of peace, to augment the revenue, and to ameliorate the condition of the people of this country, and which they hoped to follow up with no other task but that of steadily reinforcing the sinking fund for the diminution of the public debt, and of taking off those taxes which then pressed most heavily upon the laborious part of the community. Have I then, Sir, any very criminal charge to answer to, if, with some degree of fondness, I indulged the hope that those distractions would not affect us which then desolated France, founded upon principles which I then thought, and which every man must now admit, were directly contrary to those on which our happiness and prosperity were grounded? Can I, Sir, I say, have any very serious charge to answer to, if, under such circumstances, I did indulge a hope that the blessings we then enjoyed would not be interrupted? This hope I was not singular in indulging; it was a hope entertained in common with men who have sometimes been the objects of the obloquy, sometimes of the reverence, of the hon. gentlemen opposite, men who went beyond me in horror and detestation (if any men could go beyond me) of those principles which were then disseminated in France, but who certainly went beyond me in their opinions of the measures by which those principles were to be resisted and defeated. I allude, Sir, to the late Mr. Burke, and those who thought with him: he thought that France would, in a political sense, become a blank in the map of Europe: that man whose prophetic mind had enabled him to obtain a glimpse of those unexampled horrors and crimes which have since desolated France, thought, that however dreadful those convulsions might be to herself, they would present to foreign countries nothing but weakness and imbecility. If, Sir, at that moment, I did entertain the opinion which has been attributed to me, it is an error of which, upon reflexion, I have no occasion to repent, since it did not betray me into any disregard of my duty. My hopes are, I confess, seldom among the least sanguine; but I trust that I never enter upon any great work, trusting alone to my own hopes. But from the beginning I did state, that it was a contest on which we ought not to enter without being fully convinced that we had no choice left—without feeling, as my right hon. friend has truly expressed it, that it was a contest in which we should gain all that we could preserve. That there were moments during the contest in which we did hope to obtain within the bounds of moderation, indemnification, and additional security, I am ready to confess, and these I contend were fit objects to be aimed at. But if we had obtained peace, with our constitution entire, we should have satisfied the motives which induced us to engage in the contest. Let me ask, after all that has passed, whether the hon. gentleman has any reason triumphantly to exclaim, that this day has seen the subversion of my “solid system of finance,” as he calls it? It does so happen, that, after many prophecies of the hon. gentleman and his friends of the ruin of the country; nay, after denunciations of actual ruin, when we were stated to be so irretrievably ruined as to justify the hon. gentleman and his friends in seceding from their parliamentary duty, at a time when many unfortunate events had added to the calamities of the war; at a time when there was a stoppage of the money payments at the Bank, and when there appeared symptoms in the British navy inconsistent with the principles and with the feelings which actuate the hearts of British seamen—at that time it was, that a proposition was made to provide a large part of the supplies within the year. Undoubtedly, the produce of that tax has proved to be inferior to what I was inclined to hope; but I have no reason to believe that that deficiency rests so much upon any mistake in the calculations I then made, as upon the difficulty of enforcing a principle which no man has yet by any solid argument disputed? Do we not remember the fears and despondency of the gentlemen on the other side, their wish to impress those fears upon the minds of those who listened to them, and to make the calamities which threatened the country even greater than they were? But let me ask, were not those difficulties considerable? when the stocks were, I believe, under 47—when the amount of the loans was so great, in consequence of the expense which we were obliged to support—when the hearts of many men sunk within them, though their principles remained sound; if at that moment no groan had escaped but for public distress, the public difficulties would not have been so great as they were. Since that time we have sustained four years of war, with the necessity of extending our operations, and with our enemies multiplied. In that very period, however, instead of realizing those desponding predictions of the hon. gentleman and his friends, we have gone on with increasing vigour, both in our finance and our commerce, notwithstanding the lamentable pressure upon the people—a pressure, however, much more augmented by the unfavourable nature of the seasons, than by political causes. We come now, Sir, to the peace, the discussions respecting which have been inevitably protracted to such a length as to render the expenses of this year equal to a year of war; and in this first year of peace, at the end of nine years of a war, unexampled in its nature and extent, we make a loan for 25 millions at the very same price of

stocks at which, in the first year of the war in 1793, with all the accumulating resources of ten years of peace, we made a loan for only four millions. I think, therefore, the hon. gentleman might have chosen some other day to call upon me to do penance, and to admit the destruction of that solid "system of finance."—With respect to the proposed tax upon beer, if it was in its nature bad, it ought to be given up; but ought certainly not to be made up by a tax upon malt, which could not relieve the brewers, except by extinguishing the private breweries, and thereby giving to the public brewers a monopoly of the trade. The hon. gentleman had omitted to state how many barrels of beer might be made from a bushel of malt. If his recollection was correct, a bushel would make three barrels and a quarter, or three and a half. At the period when the brewers raised their prices, he believed they were justified in so doing; but he thought that, previous to that period, their profits were such as ought to have prevented them from being in haste to complain, if sometimes those profits sunk below the common rate of mercantile gain; and certainly, when the price of corn fell, they must have been reimbursed in a considerable degree for their previous loss.—With respect to the modification of the sinking fund, there was no man who could look with more jealousy than he did upon any thing that appeared like a deviation from the system upon which that fund was established. If the plan of his right hon. friend was found to break in upon that system, it would be much better at once to provide 900,000*l.* in taxes. The proposal seemed to him to be attended with no inconvenience, but offered an additional aid to the sinking fund, which, after rendering all the direct benefits which the public had derived from it during sixteen years, now presented the means of deriving out of it a collateral aid, by which a great public burthen would be saved: it was at once the fruit and the test of the resources and the perseverance of the country.

Mr. Grey said:—The right hon. gentleman, taking advantage of one or two points of my hon. friend's speech, avails himself of them to pronounce a general panegyric on his own administration. With respect to the plan proposed this night, I will take notice of two remarkable features in it: first, that it is a total abandonment of that solid system of finance so much built upon by the late chancellor of the exchequer, and secondly, a manifest infringement of an act brought in by that minister, and laid down by him as a rule by which all future chancellors of the exchequer were to be invariably guided. On the point of the abandonment of the solid system of finance, I wish to ask, whether it be consistent with the public faith, that stock, which, according to the original terms of subscription, was to be redeemed in eight or nine years, is now only to be paid off at a time coeval with the extinction of the whole debt? What, I would wish to know, can have produced such an extraordinary change in the public engagements to a part of the public creditors, as the repeal of the income tax will produce? In my apprehension, it is to be ascribed solely to the consideration that the tax had been found so oppressive, so intolerable, so detestable, that not even its being pledged to the public creditor can prevent its repeal. I will now follow the right hon. gentleman into what he has adduced of the general success of the war. In what, Sir, does this success consist? We have gained, forsooth, all that we have not lost; but how does it appear that we have gained what we would otherwise have lost? Have we gained what has been a recompence for the sacrifices of the war? Let the people of England answer this question. The object of the war has been stated to be twofold, to check the progress of French power, and to counteract the influence of French principles. Has French power suffered any decrease? or has not the right hon. gentleman, by unnecessarily plunging the nation into a war, enabled France to reach a degree of power far beyond what was ever projected? Is the influence of French principles exploded, or will the right hon. gentleman say that the first consul's title is not founded on those very principles which he has so often condemned? Is he prepared to say, that Buonaparté is not now, as much as at any former period, "the child and champion of Jacobinism"? Or has he, by some sort of mysterious purification, purged France of it in principle and in conduct? Does his dominion present less formidable dangers now than at the period of his elevation? The right hon. gentleman accuses us of calumny; but have not all our assertions respecting the war, its origin, its progress, as well as its objects, been canvassed, and have not all furnished the subject of a direct charge?—On the subject of his speech in 1792, the recollection of the right hon. gentleman seems a good deal to have failed. I happen to recollect the language which he then held. So far was he from apprehending any danger from the French revolution, that he declared he saw in that very revolution that the French government might become more powerful, but less dangerous. But admitting that in 1792 the right hon. gentleman was desirous of peace, no fair reasoner will argue, that the disposition to peace existed in 1793, because it existed in the preceding year. In the interval, false calculations of the resources of France had been formed, and false estimates had been adopted of the effect of coalitions to subvert the liberty and independence of a great and powerful people.—But the right hon. gentleman is not content with defending his own conduct: he accuses us of despairing of the resources of the country, of leaving the House under such an impression, and of returning only for the purpose of obstructing the measures of government. I am not accountable to the right hon. gentleman for any part of my conduct. I wish, however, to say, that neither I, nor any of those with whom I acted, ever despaired of the resources of the country. We reprobated the system pursued by the late ministers; we opposed, to the utmost of our power, their destructive measures; and we predicted consequences of the most disastrous kind, and even ruin, as the result of adherence to such measures. But, with a system of moderation to foreign powers instead of insult and indignity, of laudable economy instead of lavish profusion, of constitutional liberty instead of unjustifiable infringements of the liberty of the subject, we never despaired of the fortunes of our country. We left parliament, not because we despaired of the national resources, but because our views and the views of ministers, supported by a great majority of the House, were so different, that we saw no good could be derived from our attendance. Since that time, occasions have occurred, where we have thought it our duty to resume our places in this House. I, for one, must however declare, that I have never attended without reluctance; and that my attendance has been dictated by an imperious sense of duty. Any apology for my conduct at present would be impertinent. My reasons for taking the step are sufficiently well known, and I leave the decision on them to the public; or, if they cannot be fairly estimated by the public now, I leave them to the decision of an impartial posterity. If the right hon. gentleman looks back with pleasure to the whole conduct of his administration, I assure him, that I look back to the share I have had in opposition to his general system with no less satisfaction.

Mr. Jones said, that whatever collusion might have been charged on the late and present ministers, this night afforded proof that there was none; whatever coincidence there might be in their language, they were at variance in fact; one sung the Te Deum of victory in repealing the income tax, the other pronounced its funeral oration. The nation had so unequivocally expressed their indignation at the degrading and oppressive nature of the tax, that he was sure no minister would ever dare to reinfract it on the country. He gave the minister credit for honest intentions, and would vote for other taxes to the amount, which every Englishman would bear rather than submit to that diabolical impost.

Mr. Mainwaring thanked the chancellor of the exchequer for repealing the income tax—a tax so oppressive and odious as to excite the horror and indignation of every class of the people; but he could not forbear to express the deep regret with which he heard the right hon. gentleman declare, that this odious tax was to be held as a rod of iron, in petto, when the country might have the misfortune to be again involved in war. So strongly did the people of all classes detest this tax, and the mode of its exaction, that they would rather pay nine-tenths of their whole property in any other way, than be forced to pay this odious impost.

The several resolutions were agreed to.

Vote of Thanks to the Army and Navy.]

April 6. The following resolutions were moved by the chancellor of the exchequer, seconded by lord Hawkesbury, and agreed to by the House nem. con,

1. “That the thanks of this House be given to the officers of the navy, army, and marines, for the meritorious and eminent services which they have rendered to their king and country during the course of the war. 2. That this House doth highly approve of, and acknowledge, the services of the petty and non-commissioned officers and men employed in his majesty’s navy, army, and marines, during the course of the war; and that the same be communicated to them by the commanders of the several ships and corps, who are respectively desired to thank those under their command for their exemplary and gallant behaviour. 3. That the thanks of this House be given to the officers of the several corps of militia, which have been embodied in Great Britain and Ireland during the course of the war, for the seasonable and meritorious services they have rendered to their king and country. 4. That this House doth highly approve of, and acknowledge, the services of the non-commissioned officers and men of the several corps of militia, which have been embodied in Great Britain and Ireland, during the course of the war; and that the same be communicated to them by the colonels or commanding officers of the several corps who are desired to thank them for their meritorious conduct. 5. That the thanks of this House be given to the officers of the several corps of yeomanry, and volunteer cavalry, and infantry, and of the sea fencibles, which have been formed in Great Britain and Ireland during the course of the war, for the seasonable and eminent services they have rendered to their king and country. 6. That this House doth highly approve of, and acknowledge, the services of the non-commissioned officers and men of the several corps of yeomanry, and volunteer cavalry, and infantry, and of the sea fencibles, which have been formed in Great Britain and Ireland, during the course of the war, and that the same be communicated to them by the colonels and other commanding officers of the several corps, who are desired to thank them for their meritorious conduct."

Similar resolutions were, on the same day, moved in the House of Lords by lord Hobart, and agreed to nem. diss.

Debate in the Commons on the Clergy Non Residence Bill.] April 7. The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House to consider of the act of the 21st Henry 8th, intituled "Spiritual Persons abridged from having Pluralities of Living, and from taking of Farms, &c."

Sir William Scott rose, and said,—Sir, in pursuance of my notice, I have to move for leave to bring in a bill for amending the statute of Henry 8th, respecting the clergy; and before I enter upon the subject itself, I must trouble you with a very few words in excuse of the person who has been rash enough to undertake it. Sir, it is by no obtrusion of myself that this office has descended into my hands; no man could be more sensible of its difficulties, or less disposed to a personal encounter with them. But I have yielded to the judgments and inclinations of other minds, aided by a sense of public duty in my own; the House, therefore, will have the satisfaction of knowing, that what I have to offer to its consideration is not the eager expression of any favourite, preconceived opinions; whatever other demerit may belong to it, it will come, I am sure, without the confidence, and I trust without the prejudice of system upon the subject.—The business is to review some of the provisions of the statute of king Henry 8th. The prosecutions recently brought in great numbers, and in different parts of the kingdom upon that statute, have imposed what I may venture to call an admitted necessity upon the legislature of reconsidering it. I say admitted, because the legislature, under a sense of that necessity, forcibly impressed upon it last year by two most worthy members, representatives of western counties, has already agreed to suspend its operation. I meddle not with the motive, nor with the characters connected with those prosecutions; if any thing exceptionable belongs to either of them, I fear that the reproach must be shared by the legislature which has addressed such motives and invited such characters. It is the less necessary for me to advert to them, because if no such prosecutions had existed, the statute would nevertheless be, in my opinion, a very fit subject of modern consideration. It is a statute upon important subjects immediately connected with the religion and morals of the country; but a statute made three hundred years ago, in a state of religion and manners very different from the present. It is a statute which enforces its operation by money-penalties; but those penalties prescribed under a very different valuation of money from that which obtains at present. On these considerations alone it might be deemed not unfit to revise this statute, even supposing it to be possessed of all the characters of original wisdom and justice that are to be looked for in an act of the legislature; framed with an attention to the exigencies of the times that gave it birth. It is admitted by lord Coke, 150 years ago, that "it then required alterations and additions, although excellent for its time." Lord Hobart has likewise described it as a "most wise and politic statute." May I be permitted to say, with all the profound reverence which I owe and feel to the opinions of very eminent persons (men of oracular weight upon questions of the existing law of their country, but I may say, without offence, not quite of such unappealable authority upon questions of legislative policy), that I cannot help entertaining a doubt whether these panegyrics on the original wisdom and equity of this statute have not been somewhat liberally conferred.

It is impossible not to advert a little to the times in which it was produced, and the motives which, in part at least, operated in producing it. The times were times of great fervour and irritation; the corruptions of the church collected during the grossness of the darker ages, and which that church, by neglecting the favourite opportunity of reforming, has entailed upon itself the unhappy necessity of perpetuating and defending, had provoked great popular resentments; but, as was natural to be expected, resentments not always justly directed to their objects, nor very exactly proportioned in their measure. They overflowed upon the whole body of the clergy, deserving and undeserving (for unquestionably there were many of the first description), and upon all clerical claims, just, and unjust, for it is equally unquestionable that there are both. In short, the times were exactly those which are the least fitted in any country for a happy exercise of deliberative wisdom, lying in that precise juncture when ancient opinions and maxims have become the objects of contempt and aversion, and the new and improved system had not yet settled itself in a firm, and sober, and correct possession of men's minds. The history of those times abounds with instances of the general animosity that then prevailed against the clergy. It is a familiar anecdote in every body's mouth, of the observation made by the then bishop of London in a letter respecting an idle and malicious charge of murder brought against his chancellor, that a London jury was at that time so prejudiced against the clergy, that, where a clergyman was concerned, they were ready to find Abel guilty of the murder of Cain. A more singular demonstration of the general prevalence of that sort of inveteracy is recorded by one of the most exact in-quirers into our national history (particularly the ecclesiastical parts of it), Mr. H. Wharton in his Remarks on Strype's Memorials of the Reformation, "crimes of incontinence," he says, "were then, as now, cognoscible only in the ecclesiastical courts; but rapes were then, as now, triable at the common law; and of this the laity took such malicious advantage in times immediately before the Reformation, that they were wont to pretend all acts, and even indications of incontinence in ecclesiastics to be so many rapes, and to indict them as such; insomuch that scarce any assizes passed at that time wherein several clergymen were not indicted for rapes, and a jury of laymen impanelled to try them, who would be sure not to incur the guilt of showing too much favour in their verdicts." There is reason enough to suppose that parliament was sufficiently tainted with the popular prejudices of the times. It had its particular resentments against that great minister and churchman Cardinal Wolsey: a man of great talents! "qui nihil humile aut sensit aut dixit;" but who had likewise that pride and confidence of great talents, which, in a state of course manners, is with difficulty kept free from betraying itself in an oppressive insolence of language and demeanor. "They hated him because he hated parliaments," says lord Coke, in the passage I have alluded to, "and had been the mean that no parliament was holden in the realm but one, for the space of fourteen years;" and it could not well be forgotten, Sir, that in that one parliament, the very one which immediately preceded the parliament which made this statute, he had come into this room in all the pomp of the most ostentatious prelacy, and seating himself by your chair, had demanded 'to know the reasons of those members who opposed the king's highness's subsidy, in order that he might confer with them thereon. It is not out of our historical recollection, how severely an intrusion of the like kind cost the sovereign of this country in the following century. As to the king, he had other passions besides resentment to animate him in these measures; he had two years before began the business of his divorce: it proceeded much too tardily for the impatience of such a lover; he had quarrelled with Wolsey on account of the delay, and was determined to menace the pope into a compliance. "The king," says bishop Burnet, "set the bills forward, and they were agreed to, and had the royal assent. The king intended by this to let the pope see what he could do if he went on to offend him, and how willingly his parliament would concur with him if he went on to extremities."

Under this ferment of passions was this statute conceived: and if it did come into the world with the characters of wisdom and propriety appearing in its constitution, it would add one more instance to the number, which the experience of mankind has certainly furnished, of good effects produced by questionable and mixed causes. I have ventured to doubt the existence of such characters. The very policy of throwing matters of this nature into the general tribunals of the country is, in my apprehension, subject to very reasonable doubt. I shall speak with the less reserve upon this policy, because, finding it here established, it is not my intention to attempt to remove it, guarded, as I propose it should be, by the correctives which I propose to apply to it. I cannot help remarking, that it was a violent innovation on the practice of the church, not only of the church then existing, but upon the general practice of the Christian church, which has considered matters of this nature as administrable in the course of ecclesiastical discipline only. Take, for instance, the matter of residence. The power of enforcing, or dispensing with residence, belonged de jure communi to the bishop. "Super residentiâ faciendâ potest ordinarius gratiam dispensative ad tempus facere, prout causa rationabilis id exposcit." Such was the rule of the Christian church. The oath of vicars taken at institution, which has existed in this kingdom for 600 years down to the present hour, is, that they will reside unless dispensed with by their ordinary. In the Reformatio Legum, a code drawn up for the use of the Reformed Church of England, by some of the most considerable persons of the age, both laymen and churchmen, the rule is, that absence is excused if the party is "annis gravis, morborum incursione extenuatus, vel ob quamcunque justam aliam causam episcopo approbandum." And in fact, the power of dispensing with residence continued to be formally exercised by Cranmer, and other eminent prelates of the Reformed Church, down to a very late period, notwithstanding the apparent prohibition of this statute, as appears from the records of the office of faculties, and from episcopal registers. I take such to be the practice of the Lutheran and Calvinistic Churches. In that most respectable branch of the Calvinistic Church, the Church of Scotland, I understand it to be a matter of consistorial discipline: nor does this practice found itself merely upon high and exclusive notions of the immunities of the church: it is no more than what the policy of the law has found it convenient to apply to the regulation of the conduct of men in other professions, the peculiar duties of which are enforced not in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding; but in forums of their own, and in a course of official administration, confided to the vigilance and integrity of their respective superiors: nor is it to be alleged (as one sometimes hears), that the interest which the laity has in the good conduct of the clergy makes this absolutely necessary, because, in the first place, no one will deny that they have a pretty considerable interest in the good conduct of other professions; in that, for instance, of their naval and military defenders; and, in the next place, because their interest, give it what comparative magnitude you please, seemed to be sufficiently secured by the power which the laity then possessed, and still possess, of applying to the consistorial tribunals, and there enforcing a specific performance of canonical duties, in all cases where it was fit it should be enforced.

I do not, however, object merely on the ground of this policy being a novelty, and a novelty without a necessity (though this alone is no contemptible objection in acts of legislation), but because it is a novelty that is unavoidably productive of practical injustice and inconvenience. When I use these words, let no man be perverse enough to impute to me that I am hazarding irreverent expressions against the great tribunals of my country; no man venerates more, either the wise constitution, or the honourable administration of them. They have both of them, at all times, and at no times more than the present, been amongst the best securities, and the proudest ornaments of our country. But I may be permitted to express a doubt, whether, in consequence of the very fact of their being so admirably adapted to the administration of general justice, they may not be less conveniently framed for wielding the peculiar discipline of a peculiar profession.—Take, in illustration again, this matter of residence.

The statute enacts, that "whoever is wilfully absent from his benefice (and which the courts of law have interpreted to be the parsonage house of that benefice), for one month, is liable to a penalty." The courts have of course followed the strict construction, which, as courts of law, they were bound to do, and they have accordingly determined (as far as can be inferred from the adjudged cases), that a wilful absence is that absence which is not produced by some physical necessity; for I cannot find, in any adjudged case, that any cause of absence has been allowed besides these three: 1st, Imprisonment of the body elsewhere. 2dly, Infirmary of body; and, 3dly, Want of habitation, or of an ubi in the parish; a plea which, I must observe, has been in effect disallowed, or at least contracted in some late determinations, in which it has not been admitted as a valid defence, unless it has been at the same time shown, that the clerk has approximated his habitation to the parish cy près, or as near as he could in some contiguous parish. These pleas likewise (all of which are merely physical), must be proved in an absolute degree. As to imprisonment of the body, that is not a matter which much admits of plus and minus, but the matter of infirmity of body must be proved to a degree, not merely of discomfort, but of something approaching to actual peril. With respect to habitation, I have only to mention the late case of the rector of Bow church; that clergyman was shown to be one of the most exemplary of his time; it appeared that he not only performed, in an assiduous and edifying manner, the public duties of his church, but in a manner equally assiduous and edifying, the more painful but not less important offices of private and constant ministration to the spiritual wants of his parishioners. It was admitted, on the part of the prosecution, that on these very accounts he was selected for the purpose of showing that no merit could excuse the legal guilt of non-residence; for true it was that he was legally a non-resident, living not in the parish of Bow church, but in the no distant parish of Saint Andrew's, Holborn; and under these circumstances, that the proper parsonage house was of such confined dimensions that the only ground floor room was converted into a shop. Any enlargement of the house was hopeless, not only from the obstructions of the statute of Mortmain, but from the excessive value of ground in that highly commercial part of this capital. Under this representation the jury was instructed, and properly instructed, by the learned and noble judge, to consider whether this habitation, incommodious and uncomfortable as it might be, was not yet one in which a clergyman, submitting to a painful necessity, might contrive to live, and the jury found for the full penalties against the defendant. I mention this case to show the degree in which even these legal pleas must be substantiated. As to pleas of necessity, merely moral, I cannot find the admission of any such in the cases which the practice of 300 years has furnished. I cannot deny that an attendance elsewhere, upon the last months of a declining wife, or parent, or child, or upon any other of the charities of life, is certainly a wilful absence; for it must be admitted, that it is produced by a mere determination of the will, though the will may be influenced in the particular case, by causes as powerful and as laudable as any that can act upon human volition. In the consistorial courts, acting under the episcopal discretion, or a discretion of the like nature, such pleas can have a reasonable attention paid to them. A court of law, acting upon the express letter of a statute, assumes no such discretion to itself; and it is expressly forbidden by the same statute, to invoke or admit the interposition of episcopal discretion. As far as a court of law contemplates such a subject under such an authority, it has been, and I presume must be, upon the footing of a something very little short of a hard and dry physical necessity.

So much as to the general policy. Are the specific provisions more clearly marked with wisdom? The provision made for carrying all its other provisions into effect, is by means of the common informer. Of that personage I shall take care to speak with all due caution, because I perceive, that although he is a very abhorred man, when he is blowing up a conspiracy against the state—not very gracious when he is enforcing a tax—yet that he is received with some degree of kind acceptance, when he betakes himself to the employment of privateering upon the church; all, therefore, that I shall venture to say of him is, that it appears to be but a clumsy sort of policy at best, to make the avarice of mankind the grand instrument of religious and moral reformation. But, supposing it ever so decent a thing to dethrone the bishop, and to put the common informer in his place, look at the penalties with which he is armed! perfectly ruinous to the majority of the clergy at the time, and in that respect directly contrary to every principle of our happy constitution—ten pounds for a month's absence! By the valor beneficiorum, made five years after the passing this statute, a very large proportion of the cures in this kingdom were under ten pounds a year in value; so that the great body of the clergy were put into this state, that if they slept out of their parsonage house for one day above a month, they were deprived of all subsistence for above twelve months following.—What was the grand object to be secured to the public by this unnatural change of the ecclesiastical constitution, bearing so hard upon the convenience of individuals? Is it a canonical residence? By no means. What is a canonical residence? Not merely residentia parochialis, but personalis ministratio likewise—residere in parochiâ, et deservire in ecclesiâ. Such is the general language of the canon law; and mere bodily presence in a parish is no sufficient defence, in the ecclesiastical suit, for non-residence, if it is shown that the clerk has not likewise performed the duties which ought to accompany it. But this statute takes the bodily presence, independent of the personal ministration—the corpus sine pectore—upon the presumption, which, the experience of the world proves, will often fail, that the man who is compelled to be upon the spot, will perform every thing for which he is compelled to be upon the spot. If a man does but sleep in his parsonage bed, he may sleep there from month's end to month's end; he may live in the most slovenly disregard, or in the most insolent defiance, of every obligation of duty; and yet, as far as this statute reaches him, he may go utterly unwhipped of public justice. The residence which this statute secures to the public, may be a parish nuisance, and a parish scandal, and nothing better.

In pointing out such passages in this statute as appear to me to mark it rather as a statute of vengeance than reformation, as uniting in itself the extremes of violence and inefficiency, I cannot help adding, that if such provisions are really, what they have been sometimes called, the First-fruits of the Reformation, they are fruits collected in a state of great acerbity; harsh, and crude, and unmel-

lowed; much fitter to ferment than to compose the passions of mankind. Let me ask those who shelter this statute under the apology, that time may perhaps have rendered some of its provisions unseasonable, for what times such provisions as these could possibly be fit? "That no clergyman, beneficed or not beneficed, should take a house, except in a city, market-town, or borough, under the penalty of ten pounds a month? That no poor vicar could take a lease of the parsonage, to help out his own scanty endowment, under a penalty of ten times the value of the profits of such lease? That no clergyman can hold a lease of land, though not occupied by himself, and though descended to him from his family, under a penalty of ten times its annual value? That no clergyman possessed of a patrimonial freehold estate, in a grazing country, could buy and sell a cow, without a forfeiture of treble the value of that cow?"—In my apprehension, nothing could have concealed the vices and infirmities of this statute, but its having been consigned, by almost general consent, to almost general inefficiency, ever since its birth, till within the last two years, when it has been made the commercial bank of two or three trading attorneys. Before that time it had rarely been heard of, but occasionally as a postscript to a dispute about tithes, or to some personal squabble between the parishioner and his parson, generally discountenanced in the particular instance by the excellent persons who have presided in the courts, who have repeatedly lamented their own inability to admit pleas highly proper to be attended to, and that they were bound to consider the most conscientious clergyman, who, after twenty years' most sedulous performance of all his duties, absented himself for one month from his parish (or even from his parsonage-house, though doing the duties of his cure), and with the permission of his superiors, as a culprit; and as a culprit who was not to be exonerated on any other plea than that which would exonerate a man from charges of the most atrocious kind—the plea of having acted under something little short of an irresistible necessity.

But whatever may be the original character of this statute (on which I have ventured to express an opinion, contrary to opinions which I cannot but respect when I look at those who have entertained them), it is not to be denied that the change of time and manners has imported into it a degree of incongruity and injustice which no man can be found to defend.—In the first place, the money-penalties have acquired an additional injustice by acquiring an additional inequality. Many of the livings of this kingdom, that were meanly endowed with land or tithes, continue in their original poverty; others, better provided with those species of property, have risen into opulence. On the poor livings, the statute operates with its original severity, aggravated by the consideration that it touches the richer benefices, comparatively, with a feather. Its utmost effect upon a living of 1,200*l.* per annum (of which there are several in this kingdom), is compounded for by the payment of an income tax.—In the next place, the general alteration which has taken place in the general system of life and manners, must be adverted to. The native clergy (as far as the statute applied at all to them) were single men, living in the habits of a secluded life. They generally fixed near the places of their nativity. I observe, in most ancient catalogues of the English clergy, both secular and regular, that their names are usually taken from some neighbouring village or borough to that where you find them settled. From the spot where they settled, they had few possible calls; there was little communication between different parts of the country or with the capital; correspondence was rare, and carried on either by special messengers, or by the accident of pilgrims passing that way. The gentry themselves, excepting those who attended parliament, ventured little beyond the sod of their own village, unless to the county-court; the business of the county was transacted in the county. All this has undergone a great alteration; the different classes of men are no longer glebæ adscriptitii; communication is opened; much of the business of the kingdom is transacted in this town. The clergy are most generally beneficed in parts of the island remote from the places of their birth and education, and they have calls of family affection and duty to the relations they have quitted. Being invited by the Reformation to marry, they form new family connexions, which again produce calls of a similar nature; and, I presume, no reasonable man would wish that they should be deaf to such calls, and should turn their backs on the happy intercourses of family kindness. It is one of the best effects of the Reformation, that, by introducing them to the charities of domestic life, it has taught them the practical knowledge of the duties which belong to those charities. They have family property in other parts of the country; they are called to the capital for the transaction of family concerns; they are called to attend to the declining health of a wife or a child, by a temporary change of air and situation. I am no advocate for dissipation, when I observe they have families of young persons who are not without their claims to reasonable indulgences for the purposes of health, of education, of improvement, and, I venture to add, without fear, even of innocent curiosity and relaxation.

In the next place, the change, not only of the manners, but of that which is every day assuming a greater importance in the country, its agriculture, makes a change of the provisions of the statute, relative to farming, quite indispensable. It is impossible for me to state this effect half so well in any words of my own, as in those which compose a letter written to me by two most respectable clergymen of the west of England, and which, with the permission of the House, I beg leave to read, as a part of what I have to offer.—“Whilst we were thus indulging in what we conceived to be innocent pursuits, we find ourselves amenable to that part of the statute of Henry 8th, which interdicts us from buying and selling; and an avowed informer, who has come into the country with an express intention of prosecuting the clergy on the other parts of the act, has just begun to enforce this tremendous clause. What constitutes the peculiar hardship of the modern clergy is, that the restraint in question did not materially, if at all, affect their predecessors at the time the act was made, but has, for the most part, been occasioned by the alteration that has taken place in the general state of society, and our habits of life. The facility with which all our wants are at present supplied, was in the sixteenth century wholly unknown. Our ancestors, who resided in the country, derived from their estates the most ample maintenance for themselves and dependants. The provisions which were laid up against winter in the great mansions, fill with astonishment the mind of a modern housekeeper. In conformity to this general practice, the resident country clergyman had, comparatively speaking, few demands for money, the glebe and tithes supply all his necessities ; his wheat provided bread, and the barley, under his own eye, was converted into malt—most of the old rectorial houses having, even now, a building formerly appropriated to that purpose ; the wool was spun under his own roof, and wrought into cloth in the neighbouring towns ; the cattle, fattened during the summer (there was no winter feeding), were slaughtered and laid up for the remainder of the year ; and, as his family must have been large, the day labourer and occasional artificer being fed from his table, it is reasonable to suppose that he had little to spare beyond his own consumption : add to this, that he was then a solitary being, deprived by superstition of those endearing connections, which impel mankind to look beyond themselves, to the welfare of those who are of far more importance to them. His situation is now totally changed—commerce and the influx of wealth have entirely overthrown his domestic arrangements : money is the medium through which all his wants are to be supplied ; he therefore sells his wheat to pay his workmen : barley, the laws of his country restrain him from making into malt, he sends it to a market, and with the money received in return purchases beer—the wool is disposed of to a distant manufacturer, and with its value himself and family are clothed : the fat cattle are sold instead of being salted, and the profit ensures a weekly supply of fresh meat till the return of summer. The expenses also attendant on a marriage state (to say nothing of the various and heavy taxes), occasion repeated demands on him for money, which were wholly unknown to the clergy at the time of Henry 8th. A revolution equally great has taken place even in our system of agriculture. Formerly a part of every farm was appropriated to tillage, another to pasture, and a due proportion of calves and lambs were annually reared ; but by experience it is found, that some districts are fitter for each separate purpose, so that a glebe may be wholly given up to corn, or pasture, according to its soil, to the great advantage of the proprietor and the public. In one instance, different sorts of grain will be sent to market : in the other, the return must be in fat cattle. By occupying his lands in this manner, the modern clergyman doth not violate the spirit of the act : though he buys to sell again, yet it is a buying and a selling incidental to the farming of his glebe ; he is not carrying on a traffic, which is evidently the offence prohibited, but only in conformity with the improved mode of husbandry, cultivating his ground to the best advantage. Enforce the statute literally, and at once he is deprived of his principal support ; it will be impossible for him to farm his glebe, which he must immediately let, to the incalculable loss of himself and the community ; as instead of being (which whilst in the hands of the clergy it will generally be found to be) in a progressive state of improvement, it will gradually become worse, no tenant choosing to risk his money in manuring premises, the possession of which cannot be assured to him for a single day. The foregoing observations apply for the most part to our own case, but it would be selfish in the extreme were we not to remark, that there are many of our brethren of opulence and great respectability, who, actuated by the most politic motives, have, by occupying their own estates as well as their glebes, held up a superior mode of husbandry to their neighbourhood, and done essential service to the country. “ To take them also out of the hands of informers, would be conceived to be an act well worthy your serious consideration. Any undue restraint on their exertions must prove a manifest injury to the community at large, and agriculture in its present state may be considered so far from an illiberal pursuit, that it is hard to say how any clergyman can employ his hours of relaxation (and such hours must occur in every profession), with more innocence to himself, and benefit to the public, than in the moderated study and practice of its various branches.”

I have my doubts, from what passed within these walls last year, whether the House will quite go along with the sentiments expressed in the last paragraph. I confess that my own sentiments are considerably mollified, since the last year, in favour of farming ; I see that in this country the parish priest is, by the very constitution of his office, in some degree, an agriculturist ; he is, ex officio, in part a farmer. He is to take care, undoubtedly, that the ecclesiastic shall not merge in the farmer, but shall continue the presiding and predominating character ; but the moderated and subordinate practice of farming supplies many means of cheap subsistence for the clergyman and his family ; many means of easy kindness and hospitality to his poorer parishioners; many opportunities of distinguishing the industrious and well-disposed by the favour of employment; and many motives of pleasing attachment to the place, which furnishes the healthy and amusing occupation of his vacant hours. Personal debasement must be guarded against; but when I recollect that it has been the opinion of all antiquity that agriculturâ libero homine nihil dignius, and that the practice of modern times reconciles it with the dignity, and even the majesty of the most exalted stations, I am not prepared to admit that personal debasement is a necessary consequence; and in the example of the illustrious Hooker tending his sheep on Barham Downs, I think I see, that even some of its humble occupations may be performed without degradation.

But what above all creates a necessity for new moulding this statute, is the extreme depauperated state of many of the churches and parochial clergy of this kingdom. The statute makes one uniform demand of universal residence, under one uniform penalty; and universal residence cannot be had without universal competency. If all the benefices in the kingdom were equal and competent, an equal obligation, enforced by an equal penalty, might be applied to them all universally. But the fact is, that the inequality is great, and has greatly increased since the passing of this act; since it is certain, that if many benefices have increased in value, many have been comparatively depauperated by the Reformation. The appropriation of the church revenues to the religious houses, was, in ancient times, a subject of loud and energetic complaint from parliament. This House represented, "That the religious men mischievously, under divers colours, appropriated benefices, and grievously threw down the houses of the same to the ground, and cruelly did take away and destroy divine service, hospitality, and other marks of charity; and the clergy from promotion did bar, in offence to God, confusion of their own souls, grievous desolation of their country, final destruction of the clergy, great impoverishment of the kingdom, and irrevocable ruin of the church of England." But the clergy, though pillaged of their glebe and tithes by the monks, had their resources. In market towns they had a variety of small devotional offices to perform for individuals, for which they were paid. In the country they farmed from the monks the glebe and tithes which they formerly possessed; but their grand resource was in the authority of the bishops, who had a power, and occasionally exercised it, to compel the monks to raise their stipends, as the times required. Temporary vicars, who answer to modern curates, had been raised successively up to ten marks, considerata temporum qualitate, which Spelman computes to be equal to 60*l.* a year, and the perpetual vicar was raised to twelve marks, equal to 70*l.* a year. They were single men, of small wants, and generally smaller learning: he who had Latin enough to read the office to those who could not read English, had no call for an expensive library. This statute, followed by the Reformation, struck a severe blow at their means of resistance. In the country it put an end to their farming the glebe and tithes, a grievance bitterly complained of by the convocation of the same year with this statute, which represented that the statute had non-nihil iniquitatis in it, by robbing the miseros vicarios, the miserable vicars, of this advantage. The Reformation swept away in towns all the traffic of private superstitious offices; but the great blow was struck by the statute of Alienations, or rather by the construction which has since grown upon it, and which has now exonerated the impropriated parsonages, from any power of the bishops to provide for the better maintenance of the officiating minister; for though the statute expressly reserved all rights, and transferred these church revenues to the crown, and consequently to its grantees, in the same state and condition "as they now be, as held by the religious houses;" yet it is settled law, in later times, that these impropriations, being lay fees, are no longer subject to the authority of the bishop.

It is now, Sir, too late to undo what was done at the Reformation in this matter. The property has for 300 years passed into circulation, is become family inheritance, possessed by as good a title and as safe a conscience, as other family inheritance; but when I observe that it is to be lamented that a better provision was not at that time made out of these revenues for the support of the national religion, I say no more than what is supported by high authority, particularly by that of a person who was a great favourite and ornament of this House, and no partial friend to ecclesiastical claims—Mr. Selden; and by that of another person of still more elevated character, the ornament of his age and country! whose voice when not perverted by passions or interests of his own, was the voice of reason and philosophy itself! the great lord Bacon. The former expresses himself thus: "I doubt not but that every good man wishes that, at our dissolution, their land and tithes, and churches, had been bestowed rather for the advancement of the church to a better maintenance of a labouring, deserving ministry, relief of the poor, and other such good uses (as have in them a character of the good wishes of those who first dedicated them to God), than conferred, with such a prodigal dispensation, on those who stood ready to devour what was sanctified." The latter thus: "It were to be wished, that impropriations were returned to the church as the most natural and proper endowments. In mine own opinion and sense, I must confess, (I speak it with all reverence), all the parliaments since the the 27th and 31st of Henry 8th, which gave away the impropriations, seem to me to stand, in a sort, obnoxious to God, in conscience to do somewhat for the church, and to bring the patrimony thereof back to a due competency." May I presume, with all humility, to impress these memorable words upon the recollection of the House! Till that is done, which, lord Bacon says, "ought in the conscience of parliament to be done," all legislative provisions, I fear, can be mere temporary palliatives, and no better.

The truth is, that king Henry 8th put the matter of the church establishment into such a state, that without some forcible interposition of parliament, it is become remediless in all time coming. The poverty-struck condition of the clergy, at that period, is recorded in a hundred striking instances, by Strype, by Kennet, by Wharton, and other collectors. The venerable Latimer, in a sermon preached before king Edward, says, "We of the clergy had too much, but that is taken away, and now we have too little; for my own part I have sufficient, God is my judge, I crave nothing of any man, but I know them that have too little; there lieth a great matter by these appropriations, great reformation is to be had in them; I know where there is a great market town with divers hamlets and inhabitants, where do rise yearly of their labour to the value of 50*l.* and the vicar that serveth hath but twelve or fourteen marks, being so great a cure; so that of his pension he is not able to buy books, nor give his neighbour drink, all the great gain goeth another way—A redress God grant!" The same collectors record similar complaints made in a popular publication of that day, called "The Supplication of the Beggars." "Your pretence to put down the abbeyes, was to put away what was amiss: it was amiss, that a great part of their land was spent on a few superstitious monks, who gave not 40*l.* alms, when they should have given 200*l.*: it was amiss, that monks should have benefices, and preach once a year to them that paid their tithes of the parsonage: it was amiss, that scarcely among twenty they set one sufficient vicar to preach. But see now how that was amiss, is amended—marry as the devil amended his dame's leg; when he should have set it right, he broke it in pieces. The monks gave little alms, and set unable men in their benefices; but now where 20*l.* was given to the poor, in more than a hundred places, not one meal's meat is given; that's a fair amendment. Where they had always one or other vicar to preach, now no vicar at all, but the farmer is vicar and parson altogether, and only a castaway monk or friar, which can hardly say matins, is hired for twenty or thirty shillings, and meat and drink, yea, in some places, for meat and drink only. I know, and twenty thousand more men know, more than five thousand benefices thus well and gospelly served." The fact of the reduced condition of the clergy is admitted by the legislature itself, not only by the acts of shortly afterwards passing the statutes of Union of Benefices, and of Dilapidation (which for the first time found their way into our municipal code, from a necessity then first emerging in any pressing degree), but it is expressly recorded in the preamble of these statutes, lamenting "the decay of parsonage houses, and the insufficiency of single benefices for the maintenance of a minister."

The condition of the superior clergy was comparatively little better. Cranmer, in a letter to his friend sir William Cecil, who had just taken to himself a handsome estate from the newly-erected see of Peterborough, and immediately thereon had reproached the bishops with covetousness (as was customary, if the bishops showed the least repugnance to the operation of being stripped of their property), replies, "As for your admonition,

I take it most thankfully; for the saying of St. Paul, that they who would grow rich fall into temptation—I fear it is not half so much as stark beggary: and if I knew any bishop that were covetous, I would surely admonish him; but I know none but all very beggars, except it be one, and yet I dare well say, he is not over rich!" The general condition of churchmen at that time affords a solution natural enough of that otherwise extraordinary fact, of their general and hasty relapse into the ancient superstition.

Succeeding times have provided nothing like a sufficient remedy. On a complaint made to king Charles 1st by parliament against non-residents, he answered them, "He recommended to this House to make due provision, that every parish should allow a competent maintenance for an able minister;" and it was upon that occasion well observed in the House, "that scandalous livings made scandalous ministers." From that time nothing was done till the splendid benefaction of the first fruits and tenths made by queen Anne; on which occasion her majesty observed, "that she had taken into her princely consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom;" and the parliament in the preamble to the act, recites, "that a sufficient settled provision for the clergy, in many parts of this kingdom hath never yet been made." This fund has now been in operation for near a century, under the administration of a board composed of persons of high station, both in church and state. The number of livings returned, certified to this board and to the Exchequer, were not exceeding

Since the first returns many hundred cures have been returned as of small value, some not more than twenty or forty shillings; so that there being about 11,700 and odd livings, in the kingdom, about one moiety of the whole were under fifty pounds a year, and upon an average less than twenty-three pounds a year. Private benefactions and accidental improvements have aided the operation of this charity; the two lowest classes have all received an actual augmentation from it; and a third class is now receiving the same benefit; but by a paper from the secretary of that board, which I hold in my hand, it appears, that "if we compute the number of livings under 50*l.* per annum to be as above about 6,000, a moiety of which were actually under 30*l.* per annum; and if we reckon that they have been since improved by the governors, and by other means, upon an average two-thirds, which is a very liberal allowance indeed, it follows that there are now 6,000 livings in England and Wales, that do not exceed upon an average 85*l.* per annum, and that a very great proportion of them are, at this time, not 30*l.* per annum, and so progressively from 30*l.* to 40*l.* and from 40*l.* and 50*l.*" In a document with which I am favoured by Mr. Archdeacon Plymley of Salop, I am informed, "that of 186 churches in that archdeaconry, (which, as he justly observes, comprehends a part of five different counties, and has within it specimens of almost every natural and artificial situation), 109 only have any parsonage house. Independent of this deficiency of fifty-nine parsonage houses, many of those in existence are totally unfit for the residence of any clergyman's family; forty-seven churches have no glebe land. Where there is a house, or land to build one upon, the want of a sufficient residence would be an excuse if the livings could afford money to repair or to build: but twenty-seven churches, exclusive of those that are subordinate churches, and which for the most part have no independent income, have from 2*l.* 5*s.* a year only to 50*l.* a year: no living would remain so low as 2*l.* 5*s.* a year, if the patrons would accept of augmentation from queen Anne's bounty; but this is declined for fear of putting them under the bishop's jurisdiction. Of the livings, twenty-seven are under 50*l.*; thirty-three above 50*l.* but under 100*l.*; twenty-three above 100*l.* but under 150*l.*; twenty-four above 150*l.* but under 200*l.* per annum: there are but nineteen livings of the whole hundred and sixty-eight that are above 200*l.* per annum; and this in a country in which the ecclesiastical state is conceived to be much more respectable than in the average state of the kingdom.

In adverting to this subject, I just venture to remark, that in a publication of an hon. baronet, upon the revenues of the kingdom (whom I do not see in his place), it is stated, "that the revenue of this charity of queen Anne's bounty, at first amounted to about 14,000*l.* per annum; and on the 1st of January 1735, the governors of that charity possessed besides from savings and private benefactions, the sum of 152,500*l.* of old South Sea annuities, and 4,857*l.* of cash in the hands of their treasurer; the state of that fund has of late years been carefully concealed, but it probably yields at present from 40 to 50,000*l.* per annum." The hon. baronet will, I am sure, thank me for using the present opportunity of correcting such a misapprehension. It is perfectly true, that such a sum existed in the funds in the year 1735; but it is equally true, that this was a sum fully appropriated to a great number of livings, to which it was paying a money interest till proper purchases of land could be found; and wherever there is a surplus of such interest, it is made principal, and is applied in a similar manner. Its present income is, with very slight accidental variations, the same as its original income, between 14,000*l.* and 15,000*l.* per annum. It would be difficult, indeed to conceive any reason for an idle unproductive accumulation of the money of this charity, to the prejudice of its present numerous objects; though, if any such practice could exist, I certainly should not be much surprised at the careful concealment of it.

To the mischiefs arising from the extreme poverty of many parochial benefices, I have heard it suggested in this House as a cure, that there should be an equalization. Equality is in these days the grand panacea for all disorders. Unfortunately, besides twenty other objections, arising from the general interests of the civil and religious policy of the country, there are two objections that seem to dispose of it completely: one is, that it could not be effected without a most enormous plunder of the laity; and the other, that if done, it would not answer the purpose for which it is intended. In the first place advowsons, though originally perhaps mere trusts, are now become lay-fees. They are bought and sold, and are lay property, just as much as any other tenements or hereditaments. And they are not merely lay property in law, but a very large proportion of them is so in fact; for of the 11,600 livings in this kingdom, 2,500 may be in ecclesiastical patronage, the rest (exclusive of those which belong to the crown, amounting to near eleven hundred), either belong to various lay corporations (for even colleges are such), or to lay individuals, who alone possess near 6,000 of the whole number. Now, sir, in this state of things, I desire to ask, upon what ground I can be called upon to give up half the living, the advowson of which I have purchased, upon a price relative to its value, in order that that moiety may be transferred to improve another living, belonging to another patron, who has paid nothing for that moiety, and who has no other title to it, but that he happens to possess the advowson of a smaller living? I see no ground, except such an one as would justify the legislature, in taking away half of any other estate I had purchased, in order to give it to my neighbour, because he happened to have less. Let gentlemen consider the effect of such speculations! In the next place, suppose that this was accomplished in a way consistent with the rights of property, what would follow? Equalize all the clergy, and you in effect degrade them all; for it is the grossest of all mistakes, that the parochial church of England is amply endowed. It is demonstrated by a very exact inquirer upon these subjects, Mr. Cove, that if even all the preferments, of every species, belonging to the church of England, were moulded into one common mass, and thence distributed, if the venerable fabric of the hierarchy was dissolved (a matter not to be effected without a convulsion and laceration of the civil state of the country, of which no man can foretell the consequences), and its funds parcelled out amongst the parochial clergy, the maximum of an English benefice would be not more than 167*l.* a-year, an income by no means adequate, in the present state of the world, to the demands which society makes upon that profession in point of education, of attainments, of manners, of general appearance in life. As the revenues at present are distributed, the clergy, as a profession, find an easy and independent access to every gradation of society, and maintain a fair equality, as they ought to do, with the other liberal professions; and the elevation of the highest ranks give something of a dignity to the lowest: alter the mode of distribution, and you run the risk of producing a body of clergy, resembling only the lower orders of society, in their conversation, in their manners, and their habits; and it is well, if they are not infected by a popular fondness for some or other species of a gross, a factious, and a fanatical religion.

An invidious parallel is sometimes stated, between the sister churches of England and Scotland, upon this matter, and particularly upon the opinion of Dr. Adam Smith, to the disadvantage of the former. With all respect to the talents of a very acute and accomplished person, I am disposed to stop a little short of an unlimited subscription to his opinions, on many subjects, and particularly upon the subject of the English church, and the English universities; both of which I have had means of knowing, in consequence of causes from which I can claim no merit, in a mode of personal observation and experience, which that eminent person never possessed. Sir, when I consider the extraordinary men which the church of Scotland has produced, (quales viros Caledonia emisit) if I may use the words of Tacitus respecting their ancestors,) I cannot help adverting to the circumstances, that their harvest of literature has been principally produced within the last thirty or forty years; within which time, I understand, a more liberal provision has, by the authority of the courts of justice, been made for their clergy. Sir, I presume that I state a fact that is generally admitted, that from the Revolution downwards till that time, the clergy of Scotland had not taken a distinguished share in the literary occupations of Europe, even in those of a theological nature. They have amply paid up their arrears, and their country has, in part at least, paid up its arrears to them, of a due and honourable maintenance. The improvements of their incomes have been very considerable in late times. I know not whether bishop Burnet, who certainly had the means of knowing, is correct in saying, that in Charles 2nd's time, all benefices in Scotland were raised to 50*l.* sterling; but I have been given to understand, that the church of Scotland, particularly taking into consideration the cheapness of education and cheapness of living, may be deemed a better endowed church than the parochial church of England. Which distribution of the church revenues is preferable, is a question (if it can possibly be made a question in the actual state of things), which must be examined not simply by a view of the distributions themselves, but with reference to many important circumstances connected with the civil policy of the two parts of the island. This I may venture to say, as a general position, in spite of the bright exception of the church of Scotland, that the general effect of an equality and mediocrity of provision, is to produce an equality and mediocrity of talent; and I think I do not misrepresent in saying, that it has had some such effect upon the foreign protestant churches, when I refer what they have produced, to any comparison with the splendor of the literary fame of the church of England. One thing I am sorry to learn from the statistical accounts of the worthy baronet, that the number of youths educated for the church in many parts of Scotland, is considerably falling off. It rather looks as if the profession, notwithstanding the kinder treatment it has lately received, has not yet obtained its fair share in the growing prosperity of that country.

Sir, I have to apologise for digressing to these topics; in returning, I must observe, that in the state of the church, I have described, universal residence is out of the question. How can the public demand, under pains and penalties, that there shall be a resident incumbent in each parish, when so large a proportion of the benefices in the kingdom do not pay more than what most of us in this House pay to our upper servants? There are, I suppose, three thousand livings not exceeding 50*l.* a year, and many below it. When I look at the real situation of the clergy, at the distresses and difficulties of a very large proportion of them, men must be made of sterner stuff than I happen to be composed of, who can say that this matter is to be put upon the footing of a rigid, universal, unbending obligation, to be applied with a mathematical apathy to all cases without the least consideration of men's families or their fortunes! Let us remember, that we are providing, not physical laws for the government of matter, but moral regulations for the conduct of a great number of men, placed in an infinite variety of situations, the effects of which must be taken into the account, and with a candid and humane consideration. Gentlemen say, and I am sure with the very best intentions, "give us clear, general rules; we desire to have nothing to do with any man's discretion." My answer is "Give me a subject that admits of clear general rules: this is not one of them." If the benefices of the kingdom were all equal, and the men who held them were all single men, it would be easy to take the compasses out of one's pocket, and to mete out exactly the extent of indulgence, that might universally be granted to men, simply and uniformly situated; but you cannot apply a straight rule to a surface infinitely uneven and irregular. Here are above eleven thousand persons in conditions of great disparity, of different habits of life, of no small difference of education and attainments, of church incomes that bear no proportion to each other, and of family circumstances that are equally disproportionate. What is to be done? The rule, that would be no more than a just rule, applied to the opulent rector, would be a rule of severe oppression upon the poor man, with his benefice of 30*l.* a year, who is driven to eke out his family subsistence by a more beneficial employment of himself elsewhere. Will you construct your rule upon the scale of the value of benefices? To say nothing of the different value of money, in different parts of the island, the different state of men's families will still create a monstrous inequality; for no man will deny, that a single man, and a married man with ten children, living each upon the same income of 70*l.* a year are in a state of great inequality. All that can be done in such a subject is to call in a discretion, to operate on this infinite variety of circumstances. God forbid that I should mean an interested jobbing partiality! I mean a prudent and humane discretion, that is, to distribute itself honestly, and honourably, between the just rights of the public service on the one side, and the necessity of private convenience on the other as far as the infirmity of human judgment will allow. Another consideration calls with a loud voice for the existence and exercise of a discretion; I mean the consideration that must be had of that meritorious body of men, the curates. Establish a rigid rule of residence to be carried into a hasty effect, under the letter of a statute, and you turn these persons adrift, from situations where they have spent their lives innocently and usefully, to seek their bread where, on a supposition of universal residence, it is not to be found, perhaps, at an advanced time of life, and with families dependent upon them. These persons must be tenderly considered; if there is a curate who has long demeaned himself with propriety in a station, it would, in my opinion, be not more than a just exercise of discretion, to bear with the absence of the incumbent, till that curate is removed, in some way consistent with the attention due to his interests; otherwise the reformation of incumbents will be the persecution of curates. A discretion therefore must be called in, at least till the charity and piety of parliament has put the lower parts of the church establishment on a more favourable footing: and the only question can be, where shall that discretion be placed? And of that question, I say, that it must be determined by the result of this question, where can it be most constitutionally placed? that is with reference to the general frame of the church establishment, to the principles on which it is founded, and to the nature and character of the authorities that exist in it?

Upon all the different grounds I have stated, a necessity exists of revising the statute. What I have to offer I desire to propose as merely a provisional or interim bill; for I can never repeat too frequently, that till the situation of the lower clergy, is improved with respect to their incomes, their parsonage houses, and other circumstances, which I trust will soon become the subjects of parliamentary attention, nothing radical, nothing permanent can be projected. But, so far as the present bill is concerned, I beg leave to state the principles on which, I conceive, with all deference, the legislature ought proceed to the consideration of such a subject. In the first place, not to recede from ancient foundations, not to attempt reformations, particularly in the present disordered state of the church finances, upon high, à priori, notions of a theoretical perfection, but to use and apply the existing means in the constitution, in order to obtain such a quantity of good effect as is really attainable; to keep to that which, considering the familiarity of ancient usage, the attachment of habit, and the uniformity of general system, promises to be practically the most commodious; to give confidence, and to allow discretion where the constitution has vested discretion, has required confidence; and to guard, by reasonable caution, against the perils of a blind confidence and an abused discretion. Secondly, not to look to a petty harassing system of regulations, that is to be dogging and hunting men in every hour of their lives, and at every turn of their steps, for no sufficient purpose of respectable utility, but to a substantial bonâ fide enforcement of substantial bonâ fide duties, that the public may not be told that there is nobody responsible, and, in truth, as the matter stands at present, there are but few comparatively who are responsible. I have no wish to deny that there are many offensive cases of non-residence; though the majority of cases, I am persuaded, are such as a man of even strict religious principles, tempered with a little human feeling (possibly not much the worse for that temperature), would find to contain circumstances of more extenuation than he had supposed. But even in the offensive cases, it is difficult to say who is responsible beyond the individuals themselves: certainly not the governors of the church, in hardly any case; for I must, in justice, let out to the House a secret, a little dangerous perhaps to be communicated at large, that in truth there is hardly one act of discipline which a bishop can execute upon his clergy (if it is at all resisted), but at the expense, and the vexation, and hazard of a law-suit.

Take this matter of residence.—A bishop admonishes his clerk to reside, and the clerk turns a deaf ear; what is to be done? The bishop has only this election, whether he shall employ the compulsion of the ecclesiastical process, or the common law compulsion of this statute; for a suit of one kind or other he must have. For a bishop to be dragging his clergy, in the character of common informer, into every assize town of his diocese, subject to all the public freedom of discussion (necessary, I admit, in that mode of inquiry), and to all the levity of remark (allowable, I likewise admit, in the advocate who has to carry his present point with his jury), is no very seemly sight; I cannot help thinking, that more harm is done to the modest dignity of religion by such exhibitions, than balances the advantage of the success of the particular prosecution. On the other hand, if the bishop repairs to the ecclesiastical court, I certainly cannot venture to describe a penal suit travelling through the consistory, the arches, and finally the delegates, as any luxury to the man who has to pursue it; certainly very far from it, looking at the expense and the vexation that may travel along with it. No man can expect a bishop to venture upon the use of such remedies, but in very enormous cases indeed. The constitution in theory supposes the governors of the church to have all necessary powers; but they are powers which can hardly be deemed to exist to any practicable effect. Give the governors of the church, not new and unknown powers, but prompt and commodious means of applying those they have, an awful responsibility will immediately arise; they will feel that the expectation of the public is upon them; that the public requires that the powers so given shall be used, and used for the purposes for which given. If they are not used, or not so used, it may give rise to a suspicion (which God avert) that the episcopal government of the church, high and sacred as its origin may be, is, in the present state of manners, less favourably adapted to the care of its interests and duties than the civil constitution of the country had hitherto supposed.

In the third place, that this enforcement of duties should be framed with as little vexation to its objects as it is consistent with its efficacy, without any unnecessary harshness or restraint, still less with disrespect and degradations; with all decent attention to the situation of the order in the state, and to the personal convenience of individuals. Their profession is in all countries of most important use to society; and its general utility depends upon its general estimation. In this country it is an eminent order of the state; it has always stood by the state with firmness, and in no times more meritoriously than in the present. The individuals are, in a large proportion of them, men of learned, and many of them of elegant education. Literature, both useful and ornamental, has been in no country so largely indebted to its clergy. Many of them are taken from among the best and most respected families of our country; and it is on all accounts, religious, moral, and political, anxiously to be wished that the families of our gentry should continue to supply a large proportion of our clergy. Such men are not the subjects of an extreme and overstrained legislation. Something must be trusted to their own sense of duty, something allowed to their personal convenience. They are to be governed, it is true, lenibus imperiis, by an authority efficacious in its results, but mild in its forms, and just in its indulgences. May I add, that whilst we have seen, in other countries, christianity suffering in the persons of the oppressed clergy, it imposes a peculiar obligation upon us to treat our own with kindness and respect, and to beware of degrading religion by an apparent degradation of its ministers. If there has been an undue laxity in this matter, let the legislature signify firmly that they should generally repair to their benefices; but not as men stigmatised and relegated, carrying their resentments to their solitudes, and from whom, after unkind treatment, a cheerful and ardent performance of duty, can hardly be expected. Surely, Sir, it is upon such subjects more than any others, that one ounce of sweet spontaneous duty is worth whole pounds of compelled performance.

Whether these principles, on which I have endeavoured to construct this bill, are just, or the provisions well adapted to carry them into effect, is for the House to judge. I shall state briefly its general provisions, both on the part of the public and on the part of the clergy, referring, for farther and more minute detail, to the bill itself, which I shall move for leave to have printed, for the use of the members during the recess.—On the part of the public, I propose to guard against what the House appeared to consider as the abuses of clergymen's farming, and to enforce the duty of residence in a double manner more effectually, by enabling the bishops to exert the authority which the constitution has given them, and by giving the common prosecutor, where he is permitted to act, an increased reward for his diligence. On the part of the clergy there is offered, 1st, An entire amnesty for past neglect, where no prosecution had been commenced; and, 2dly, Where there had been an exemption from farther prosecution, on payment of costs already incurred. 3dly, On the matter of farming, a liberty given in the cases where they were injuriously prohibited by the ancient statute. 4thly, On the matter of residence, to give a fair and reasonable allowance of time to the clergyman for the occasions of private life, free from the doggings of any informer, though still subject to the superintendence of his proper superior—to allow an ipso facto exemption from all penalties, for clergymen bearing certain offices during the times required for the duties of those offices; to restore the power to bishops to grant licences for absence, in certain enumerated and expressed cases, which licences shall protect from the common prosecutor; and, in other cases, which cannot be specifically foreseen, or provided for, to allow the concurrence and consent of the metropolitan to have that effect.

Sir, these are the outlines of the proposed bill. I have only to add, that having felt the difficulties of the subject in undertaking this matter, I have not felt my sense of its difficulties diminished by having contended with them. The subject has deep foundations in legal and ecclesiastical antiquity; it has wide and diffusive bearings in the present system of life and manners, and certainly a very serious influence upon the good order of society, as well as the comfort of individuals. I could have wished that it had fallen into other hands, particularly those to which is confided the care of the great establishments of the empire; for unquestionably, in a country which, with a most fortunate wisdom, makes its religion an essential part of its civil polity, the establishments of religion are amongst the greatest. Far be from me the vanity of supposing that any bill which I can construct, on a subject so loaded with practical difficulties, can find a ready acceptance amongst the various opinions which prevail upon it. For I must honestly confess, that since it has been devolved upon me, I have rarely conversed with any gentleman who did not favour me with an opinion, that was not directly the reverse of the last opinion I had been favoured with upon the subject. All I have to say is, that if, with the improvements the bill shall receive from the wisdom of the House, it should finally succeed, I shall be glad to have been the instrument of introducing it to its notice. If it should fail, I shall write satisfeci upon my own mind and conscience, under the conviction that I have, with fair intentions, pursued a most desirable object, and only failed under difficulties, to which humble talents are very unequal. Sir, I move, that leave be given to bring in a Bill, “to amend and render more effectual the Act of Henry 8th.”

Mr. Dickinson seconded the motion, and was sure, from the high authority of the mover, that the measure proposed would be found beneficial to the country. Mr. Simeon wished that an interval should be allowed between the first and second reading of the bill. Sir W. Scott said, that he wished to have the blanks filled up, and then to allow the bill to stand over the holidays. The motion was then agreed to.

Debate on Sir Francis Burdett's Motion for an Inquiry into the Conduct of the late Administration.] April 12. Sir Francis

Burdett rose, to bring forward his promised motion for an Inquiry into the Conduct of the late Administration, and spoke as follows:—Sir; the time is at length arrived, when laying aside conjecture and uncertainty, we are enabled to form a just estimate of the professions, principles, and conduct, of those men who have, for these nine years past, and still do (for it is the same junto), exercise the powers of government in this country. Now we may be permitted to make up our accounts of blood and treasure, and to show those who have a right to inspect them, what has been received in return for the dreadful expenditure of both. Now, we may be allowed to take a retrospect of the conduct of ministers and of the objects avowed; first, for engaging us in, and afterwards for continuing, the contest. I say, of the objects avowed; because, in the variance between the avowed and the real objects, consists principally their guilt. But, above all, I wish to call the attention of the House, and of the public at large, to the many material and mischievous alterations of the laws, and manifold acts of aggression, against the constitution of the country. In taking this retrospect which I propose, the origin of the war, so repeatedly discussed within these walls and agitated without, naturally presents itself first to our view; and though it has been decided by ministers, and their notoriously-corrupt adherents, that this war was just and unavoidable in its commencement, and necessary in its prosecution; yet I may now be allowed to appeal, from decisions obtained by corruption, falsehood, and delusion, to the sober judgment of this House and of the public at large, who have by this time, it is to be hoped, recovered a sufficient portion of common understanding to enable them to distinguish between truth and falsehood, justice and injustice, necessity and free choice. To prove that this war had not its origin in any such unavoidable necessity, but that it was sought for and provoked by his majesty's ministers, it will be sufficient to recall to the recollection of the House, the conduct of the ministers of this country towards France, previous to the commencement of actual hostility; we shall then find, that after the revolution of the 10th of August, 1792, our ambassador was recalled from Paris; that the French ambassador resident in this country was refused to be acknowledged—that an alien bill was passed, the first object of which was, the French ambassador himself—and that an embargo was laid on all ships in our ports freighted with grain for France, at that time certainly under severe pressure from scarcity, and threatened with the horrors of famine. Every one of which acts was contrary to the law of nations at peace, and in direct violation of a specific treaty between this country and France. These acts of hostility, together with our other warlike preparations (such as embodying the militia, calling together parliament in an unusual manner, augmenting our forces by sea and land, and, though last not least, the publication of lord Auckland's Memorial to the States General, a composition which, for folly, vulgar unmeaning abuse, and insolence, has scarcely a parallel), could not fail to excite something more than doubt in the government of France, as to the sincerity of the professions of neutrality made by the ministers of this country, and of their determination to abstain from interfering in the interior concerns of that; and these apprehensions, on the part of the government of France, could not but be greatly increased, by the recent recollection of similar professions made by the emperor of Germany, then in strict alliance with us, at the very time when he had planned an invasion of the French territory, and even up to the very moment of his entrance upon it, in pursuance of the treaty of Pilnitz; of which infamous transaction our court could not be ignorant, and, in all probability, was a party concerned.

What, then, was the conduct of the French government during this period? Notwithstanding the recall of lord Gower from Paris, they did not recall their own ambassador; they expressed, with the utmost moderation, their uneasiness at these acts of hostility on the part of England; they deprecated a rupture with England; they offered explanation of any part of their conduct which might give rise to it; I might almost say, they entreated ministers to submit to discussion and negotiation whatever might be the cause of difference between this country and that. What answer did ministers make to language so temperate? That of men predetermined upon hostility! They added insulting language to their former acts of aggression; they refused to give or take any explanation, or to enter upon the work of negotiation at all. Hitherto negotiation used to precede; cannon, the emblem of war, the ultima ratio regum, was wont to follow. Our ministers have reversed that march; the artillery of their vengeance, with which they undertake to punish guilty nations, leads the van. Negotiation brings up the rear, whilst war, dreadful war, that time of harvest to kings and ministers, of famine, pestilence, and misery to the people, fills up the space between. At length the French government declared—not war against England—but, after stating the conduct of the ministers of this country, and enumerating these acts of hostility, that the French republic was at war with the king of England. I have been the more particular with respect to the origin of the war, because, stopping short of a first principle, generally tends to confusion; and because, on the possibility or impossibility of avoiding so dreadful an evil as war, depends much of the guilt of those transactions to which it gives rise.

This, then, having been the mode of originating the war, let us next consider who were our allies? Austria and Prussia, those crowned plunderers, who came with their hands dyed in blood, and reeking from the massacres of Warsaw, after having dethroned the king of Poland and partitioned that territory, marched, in pursuance of the treaty of Pilnitz, to invade and partition the territory of France. These were the tyrants with whom ministers advised his majesty to form a triumvirate.

Such being the origin, and with such allies, let us next consider what were the avowed objects of the war. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed, or I should scarcely expect to be credited, to have effaced from the memory of those who hear me that the first wretched pretext for openly joining the coalition against France, was on behalf of our allies, the Dutch, to prevent the opening of the navigation of the Scheldt, a pretext indeed treated at the time by a man who is gone wild into his grave, with the contempt it unquestionably deserved. Mr. Burke did at the outset rend with a boisterous hand the veil of ministerial artifice and hypocrisy, and I can show no reason, unless that the people had no eyes, why they did not at that time discover the cheat. Once engaged in the war the grand difficulty was got over, and it was easy to find pretexts for its continuance, and the minions of arbitrary power and corruption in this country were so dazzled with the first successes of the leagued despots against the liberty of France, that this war for the Scheldt was soon by them swelled into a war for religion, social order and civil society; by which they mean despotism, unconditional submission on the part of every people to every government, and in the height of their delirium nothing would satisfy them, but marching to Paris, according to the duke of Brunswick's infamous and contemptible manifesto, the re-establishment of the Bourbon family and the Bastile, and the blood of those who had asserted, as we did in the case of the Stuarts, the right of the people to choose their own government. This was that French principle which it behoved all regular governments, per fas et nefas, to crush; hence all that zeal for the Bourbon family, which otherwise would have been as much neglected as our deserted ally, the family of Orange: hence all those pretended terrors for the dethronement of a king, which otherwise would no more have alarmed them than the dethronement of the king of Poland;—hence all those horrors for the murder, as they termed it, of a prince, which otherwise would no more have affected them than the assassination of their late allies the emperors Peter and Paul; hence all that malignity which characterised this political crusade, which rendered in their eyes, a whole people worthy of extermination, which dispensed, whilst they were victorious, with the rules of civilized war, and authorized in their opinion the attempt to starve five and twenty millions of people. In vain did that most able member of this House, warn ministers and the nation of the danger from the very nature of this contest,—in vain did he caution them against the danger of establishing by this war, a great military republic in the heart of Europe,—in vain did he confute their puerile but specious arguments, founded on the supposed consequence of issuing French assignats,—in vain did he expose the wild folly and madness of attempting to conquer France, and the impossibility, unless France was conquered, of her submitting to any interference of foreign powers in her interior concerns: terror, corruption, and the din of war silenced the voice of reason and experience, and France forced into a contest, from which she had no retreat, no choice but victory, or the re-imposition of the Bourbon family, armed with new terrors from vengeance, having no alternative but to conquer or be conquered, exerted under these circumstances, a furious energy, of which under any other she must have been incapable, overcame all difficulties, bore down all obstacles, and surrounded by the leagued despots like a wild beast, with the hunters spears, and treated as such, goaded to madness and driven to despair, committed acts of desperation which were afterwards made use of by those who had really caused them, to excite the hatred of every country in Europe against her. Victorious in her turn she threatened the threatener, oppressed the oppressor, and having in the struggle wrested Belgium from the Emperor, the recovery of Belgium became the next avowed and certainly a more national and important, if it had ever been the real object of the war. Again did the able statesman before alluded to exert his unrivalled abilities to prevent a continuation of the calamities of war on the score of Belgium; not, I believe I may venture to say, that he undervalued that possession, or thought it a slight acquisition to France, but because he was convinced that, like the Scheldt, was merely a pretext, whilst the same secret objects and motives which induced the ministers to commence, also actuated them in the prosecution of the war, and which rendered every hope groundless of its ending in any less unfortunate issue. What then, Sir, was the language of the right hon. gentleman who now sits behind the ostensible minister, and who has since defended, and as most people think, negotiated this peace? That to leave France in possession of so extensive a line of sea coast as Belgium would afford her, was dangerous to the maritime strength of Great Britain; that it was impossible for this country to make peace with honor or safety leaving that conquest to France. Yet now the right hon. gentleman says, that a peace is concluded both safe and honourable, leaving that conquest to France, leaving her not only in possession of such an extensive line of coast as Belgium affords her, but in possession of almost all the ports of Europe from the Elbe to the Adriatic. The same right hon. gentleman with the same consistency, after having plunged us deeper into continental politics than at any former period, after having exhausted mines of wealth and shed oceans of blood in continental warfare, now tells you, that he has discovered the true policy of England is, to have nothing to do with the affairs of the continent. This, Sir, I know was the opinion held by some of our wisest statesmen of old,—their maxim was to guard the narrow seas, and not to become principals in continental wars, but it always treated, up to the present time, by the right hon. gentleman, as a short-sighted, narrow, illiberal policy, altogether unsuited to the present circumstances of Great Britain and of Europe.

Continuing the war then, upon the pretence of the recovery of Belgium, after a number of triumphs and victories on the part of France, Holland, for whose protection she, however, deprecating our interference, we undertook the war, fell under the dominion of France, and the deliverance of Holland from the Jacobin power of France became a favourite theme of ministerial declamation, and afforded in her turn a still more important avowed object for the continuance of the war. To doubt of the infallibility of the success of the expedition fitted out for the deliverance of Holland, was to expose oneself to that insolence with which, since corruption has attained its present alarming height, all men have been treated who have ventured to differ in opinion with the minister; and it was said, that the slightest knowledge of human nature was sufficient to convince every man in his senses of its infallible success. Now, Sir, not to enter into a detail of expeditions, which would be endless, and which will properly come hereafter, when the House shall have agreed to the inquiry which I mean to propose, suffice it to say, that expedition, after the loss of a number of brave men, who deserved more honourable graves—after having exposed a gallant army to disgrace, and placed it in a situation of difficulty no courage could surmount, terminated not in the deliverance of Holland, but in the deliverance of our own army by a most mortifying convention.—Having failed in this infallible attempt to rescue our allies, the Dutch, who fought most gallantly against us, unsuccessful in all their intermediate projects, baffled in every quarter, destructive to every country that listened to their counsels, or admitted their interference, still shifting the ground of war to any thing and every thing for the purpose of delusion, positive of success in the gross of projects which had all failed in the detail, yet calling for confidence with a voice loud in proportion to defeat, and obtaining that confidence to an unexampled extent, having found themselves unable by continuing the war to protect Switzerland, to make good their guarantee to the king of Sardinia, to restore the king of Naples or the pope, to protect Holland, procure the cession of Belgium, or even obtain the paltry object of preventing the free navigation of the Scheldt, then rising in a just climax of madness and folly, they were to make a grand effort for the deliverance of all Europe. These were the avowed objects for which ministers formed combination upon combination, conjured up conspiracy upon conspiracy, and flung, with an unsparing hand, the wealth of Englishmen amongst the minions of every court, civilized or barbarous, Christian or Mahometan, throughout Europe. Sir, they have delivered Europe, as they did Holland, not out of, but into the hands of France, and are now unable to deliver themselves and us from the dangers with which we are threatened by that gigantic power, their folly and wickedness have created.

I agree perfectly with those persons who have opposed this peace, not in opposing the peace, but in all those doubts, anxieties and apprehensions which they have expressed as to the future prospects of this country, which do appear to me gloomy beyond all former example. The dangers are so many and so great, for we are reduced to a condition when even peace is insecure, that it requires no penetration to discover them, it is sufficient to have eyes and to open them. But the question is, who brought the country into this situation? to whose counsels are our present embarrassments owing? To the very men who now get up and tell you what themselves have done, predict the probable and fatal consequences, and advise you to pursue the same destructive career.

As to the fact that France, bounded by the Rhine, the Alps, the Pyrenees and the Ocean, comprehending a population of between forty and fifty million of people, commanding almost all the coasts and ports of the continent of Europe, with all her colonies restored, and great colonial addition, with Holland, Switzerland, her dependent republics in Italy, her dependent ally Spain, terminating a career of unexampled glory with still more solid acquisitions, full of military enterprize, talent, and experience, and having, after the old Roman fashion, by war acquired great and new resources for future warfare, that this is a situation of extreme peril, difficulty and danger to England is too obvious to need being pointed out to any man. And what has England got to balance this monstrous power and aggrandizement of France? Ceylon and Trinidad—a little of the plunder of her own allies. Thus terminates a war for religion, social order, and civil society! This is our indemnity for the past, and security for the future! This is the return that we have to make to the people of England for all their sufferings—for all the expenditure of their blood and treasure! If the ministers have been out in their general calculations with respect to the great objects of the war, they have been no less out in all their calculations of the inferior objects, and failed no less conspicuously in the detail. So many expeditions, so various, so expensive, and so unsuccessful, are unparalleled in the history of this country. The expedition to Quiberon, Dunkirk, Toulon, Corsica, Ostend, Holland, Ferrol, Cadiz, Egypt, all have failed, with one single exception, and that too a melancholy work of supererogation, and the failures in many instances attended with signal disgrace, and not one has been inquired into.

It has been often said, and will perhaps again be said, as a sort of apology for all this failure and disaster, that this war was unlike all former wars—that the French revolution was unlike any thing that ever appeared in the world—that it was sub generis, and in short that the whole circumstances of the world were altogether different from what they had ever been before. Now, Sir, there appears to me to be no more difference between the scenes we have witnessed, and those which all history presents to our view, than there is between Shakspeare's dramas now and formerly, because they are represented upon a larger theatre. So far from there being any thing new in this war, it is the old struggle for rights and liberties against arbitrary power, which ever has been and ever will be as long as there are base and corrupt men, and men who love freedom and virtue. It was the struggle in which the first Christians were engaged. It was the struggle in which the people of this country have been so repeatedly engaged, when finally driven to it by a long pursued course of injustice, an arbitrary king, or a corrupt minister. It was the struggle in which one of the Stuarts lost his head, another his crown, and which finally banished that family the land. As to the supposed novelty of this war, both ancient and modern history afford sufficient examples of wars of a similar nature to this. The Roman history affords a striking and parallel instance, and certainly of no very modern date; when Rome expelled her Tarquins, they with their followers like the Bourbons and the French emigrants, went about to all the neighbouring states to form a coalition against the new republic; they too made use of the same arguments to induce kings to join the confederacy against Rome, which have since been made use of to induce them to join the league against France. In the speech of Tarquin's ambassador to Porsenna king of Etruria, we shall find the pith and marrow of all Mr. Burke's more dilated eloquence upon the French revolution. He advised Porsenna to war against the Romans "ne orientem morem pellendi reges inultum sineret. Satis libertatem ipsam habere dulcedinis. Nisi quantâ vi civitates eam expetant, tanta regna reges defendant, æquari summa infimis: nihil excelsum, nihil quod supra cetera emineat, in civitatibus fore. Adesse finem regnis, rei inter deos hominesque pulcherrimæ." Here was levelling and republicanism—the destruction of the Corinthian pillar of polished society, the swinish multitude triumphant, and the common cause of kings. These were the motives that brought Porsenna to the gates of Rome—these were the motives that brought the allied despots of Europe to the frontiers of France; and Rome, like France, having no choice but victory or the re-imposition of the Tarquins, like her, was forced to energy and exertions of which she was thought incapable—that war too, like this, by forcing those exertions, laid the foundation of the future grandeur of the people attempted to be oppressed.

That France does bid fair to become mistress of the world is a most melancholy truth. She bids fair to realize the opinion of a very noble political author, who in comparing what he calls the health of ancient jurisprudence, by which he means republican institutions, with the modern or Gothic policy, upon which the modern kingdoms of Europe are founded, and which he thinks are mouldering away at their foundations, and becoming every day more and more unfit for the altered circumstances of the world, on which account, he says, the people of all countries are growing uneasy under them, he adds these remarkable words; "The nations of Europe are tumbling and tossing on the bed of sickness, and that nation which shall first recover the health of ancient jurisprudence, and if you will have my opinion, it will be France will give law to, subdue and govern the rest."—Whether France shall ever recover the perfect health of ancient jurisprudence, and remain one and indivisible, or whether she shall be torn again by factions, split and divide, depends at all events, upon circumstances out of our power to control; much, probably upon that extraordinary man now at the head of her affairs; if he should prove as great a statesman and legislator, as he has proved himself a great general and dextrous politician; that is, if he should have the ability and virtue to establish in France a well-regulated free state, she probably will remain the mistress of the world; on the other hand, if he should prove a mere man of talents, an ambitious self-seeker, she possibly may not, but again split and divide, and be no longer formidable to Europe.—In the whole of this contest two things strike me as remarkable, and as characterizing ominously the contending parties; the constancy with which France has adhered to her favourite principles, viz. to make separate peace with each of the powers coalesced against her, and not to allow any of them, especially this country, to pollute, as they term it, that is to retain possession of an inch of the territory of the republic; and on our part, the abandonment one after another, of every avowed object of the war.

But now ministers tell us they have made a safe and honourable peace. How a peace can be safe which is not honourable, I am at a loss to conceive; or how a peace can be honourable by which every object of the war is abandoned, which leaves your enemy in a state of unexampled aggrandizement, and ends in the plunder of your own ruined allies is also beyond my comprehension. But say, for the sake of argument, this is a safe and honourable peace, what stronger accusation can be brought against the authors and supporters of the war? I take a peace of that description to be the only legitimate object of war, and he who can remain in peace with safety and honour, yet goes to war, or prolongs war when a safe and honourable peace might be obtained, deserves to be considered as an enemy to mankind. But does any man believe there was a single moment of the present contest, from its commencement to its termination, in which such a peace as this might not have been obtained. If this is a safe and honourable peace, why go to war at all?—why was the treaty of Paris broken off?—why was Belgium made a sine qua non?—why was the treaty of Lisle broken off?—why stand about delivering in ultimatums in the first instance?—about a peace in which all is given up on the one side, and all retained on the other, there never can be a dispute. But, above all, why was the overture made by Buonaparté two years ago, treated with such insolence and contempt? Is there a man now who does not regret the folly which dictated that letter signed by lord Grenville, in answer to the overture made by Buonaparté? Is there a man, besides the late minister himself, who at once defends this peace, and that refusal even to treat? Does any man believe that at that time such a peace as this might not have been obtained? If it had, how much public and private misfortune would have been saved? The monstrous expense of the Egyptian expedition would have been prevented; the brave army of Egypt would not have its ranks thinned by a barren and fruitless conquest, the great and good Abercrombie, who uniting the virtues of the citizen with the courage and abilities of the soldier, was indeed the very reverse of that army he refused to command in Ireland, and only formidable to the enemies of his country, we should not have now to lament. Under what circumstances of advantage would this country at that time have treated? When, after a long career of disaster, the tide of fortune for a moment turned in our favour, and afforded ministers an opportunity of extricating the country in a great measure from the difficulties in which they had involved it; when the reverses of the French arms in Italy, the brilliant victory of Aboukir which dazzled the eyes of all Europe with the splendor of our naval glory, the abandonment of the Egyptian expedition on the part of Buonaparté, above all, his newly acquired power, and the unsettled state of the interior of France, all combined to place this country on a vantage ground, which a very little indeed before, the most sanguine mind could not have indulged a hope of obtaining: here was a golden moment which wisdom would have seized with avidity, and which folly, wickedness, and presumption threw away. But little things make little men proud, and our ministers, inflated with a little temporary success, began to indulge in their former dreams of marching to Paris, punishing the regicides, and reinstating the Bourbons on the throne. But how are the mighty fallen! The right hon. gentleman after all his gigantic and unjustifiable projects against France, he who, while foolishly confident of success, was for "bellum usque ad internecionem" with the French republic, is now content to receive from "the child and champion of Jacobinism" and puppet of its folly, as indemnity for the past and security for the future, Ceylon and Trinidad! I think I may fairly call upon those persons who have supported the late minister, and whom he deluded with far other promises and vaunts than these; they have most reason to complain, and should be the first to join with me in voting for an inquiry into his conduct.

There is another feature, and a very prominent one too, in the conduct of the late administration, too important to be passed over in silence.—I mean their conduct towards neutral powers, and which raised such a storm in the north as nothing but the most unlooked-for accident could have dispelled. Unlooked for I mean by the generality of mankind, for I know not what to call unlooked for by our late ministers, or uncalculated upon, since I have heard them in this House calculate upon the private assassination of Buonaparté. Sir, I do not mean to weary you with a long discussion of what is called the law of nations, which every body knows is a mere chimera, and at all times the law of the strongest; I mean only to impeach the wisdom and propriety of the conduct of ministers in stirring that question, which the discussion of former ministers had carefully avoided, especially at that time. And what was that time? A time when you had famine in England, martial law in Ireland, and we were left singly in the war with France, who had not only by her valour defeated the combination of all Europe against her, but also by her wisdom converted some of the most formidable of her enemies to combine with her against you. Against this formidable combination, with exhausted finances, famine, and martial law in the land, did ministers risk the very existence of this country upon the neutral question. From these difficulties and dangers the assassination of the emperor Paul relieved us for the time; but it is impossible not to see that the conduct of ministers on this occasion has sown the seeds of future discord throughout Europe, and that the lamentable victory, as we call it, of Copenhagen, which appears to me to have been an evident failure, is likely to produce consequences very different indeed from those which ministers expected, viz. the forcing neutral nations to acknowledge our right of search; on the contrary, no one who pays the least attention to what is passing in Europe can avoid seeing that this question is more unsettled than ever; that France, in all her treaties with foreign states, in all her commercial transactions, wherever it can be brought into notice, ostentatiously sets herself forward as the defender and protector of the rights of neutrals. And if ever you shall again venture to go to war with France, which I very much doubt, the ministers have so cast down the country, every maritime state in Europe will range on her side against you upon this single principle only, and that France, notwithstanding her revolution and her doctrine of rights, unpalatable as they are to the old governments of Europe, is nevertheless upon the whole considered as more tolerable than the domineering insolence of Great Britain. Unfortunately, we have had too much power, considering the little wisdom we had to wield it. I suppose it will be said, as it has been said before, that the navy and commerce of England depended upon bringing this question to an issue. First I answer that it is not brought to an issue, but is more unsettled than before; but moreover that we have had so many false and idle assertions and opinions from ministers, that it is high time to proceed to investigation. What one opinion of their's in the whole course of this calamitous war has not been advanced with arrogance, and uniformly belied by experience? They asserted this war would be a short and successful war; one campaign in their opinion would be sufficient to counteract the French revolution, to punish the regicides, and reinstate the Bourbons. In their opinion the march to Paris was no such difficult undertaking. They demonstrated to us very early in the war that France must be ruined by the issue of assignats.

She was in the gulph of bankruptcy, and totally incapable of much longer continuing the contest. In their opinion, the first coalition they had formed against France was invincible and indissoluble, cemented with English gold, and the common cause of kings, yet when this invincible and indissoluble body was vanquished and dissolved, our ministers, untaught even by the severe discipline of experience, told the same story with the same confidence of their second coalition with the magnanimous emperor Paul—he was the right hon. gentleman's magnus Apollo, the model which he held out to princes, the perpetual theme of his panegyric, he, we were told, came into the field as God's own soldier, whose armour, conscience buckled on; his was a noble gratuitous effort in the cause of religion and social order; and yet for a barren rock in the Mediterranean, why he, even he fell off as vilely as the rest. Sir, these false and arrogant assertions and predictions, uniformly contradicted by experience, which have brought the country into its present perilous condition, though they were not, in my opinion, at the time sufficient grounds of confidence in these men, are undoubtedly now good parliamentary grounds of inquiry into the conduct of these false prophets and tricking impostors. As the ministers deluded former parliaments into the war, by pretending objects, all of which have been yielded by the peace; and (as he now contends) without prejudice to the honour or safety of the country; so did he no less strangely delude them and corrupt them to support him in subverting the constitution under the pretence of resisting innovation and change. The fundamental laws have been altered; every constitutional land-mark removed; all has been taken away except abuses and corruptions, which have been shamefully augmented in the midst of general and national distress; whilst with the one hand the minister has heaped abuse upon abuse, burthen upon burthen upon the back of the people, with the other he has taken from them every thing valuable in the constitution, and which could render even their former burthens tolerable or fit to be endured. I will venture to say there is no condition or situation in the country, from the highest to the lowest, considered individually, as private citizens, or collectively as constituted authorities, which has not been materially altered. The situation of the king, the situation of the queen, the situation of the prince of Wales, whose rights have been as little respected as those of any other class, and who has been treated with scandalous insult and indignity; the situation of both Houses of parliament, of the judges, the laws, the magistracy, the militia, the Bank, the city of London, the East Indies, the West Indies, Scotland, Ireland, the condition of the people at large,—all has been totally altered under the pretence of resisting innovation and change. To effect this change was the real and ultimate object of the war. “Mysounding steps,” thought he, “will not be heard amidst the din of war.” It was against the liberties and properties, the laws and constitution, manners, customs, habits, and character of Englishmen, that ministers contended, it was against the very existence of the Irish, as a people that they conspired and levied war. And in this war upon our people at home, it must be confessed, their success has been as complete as their failure and disappointment abroad.

Having detailed their failures and defeats, the painful task remains of enumerating their triumphs and their victories. The liberty of the press has been violated, by laying printers and publishers under new and unconstitutional restraints, placing them entirely at the mercy of government. He must be a bold man who will venture to put pen to paper, especially since the punishment of libel has been altered and a second conviction made transportation to Botany Bay. Libel is the easiest of all charges to be brought against any man; a man deaf and dumb, who can neither write nor read, may be guilty of libel: a sign post is a libel; a scare crow set up in a garden is a libel, motions of our hands or fingers are libels.—A man may be put in peril, without that provision which the constitution had made to prevent men being brought into danger of trial without reasonable ground,—the intervention of a grand jury, or in cases of private libel an affidavit filed as to the fact. Add to this, the other abuse of introducing Special Juries in criminal cases, at first instituted for the mere purpose of determining upon merchants account by merchants, according to the spirit of the law; and we know how these juries are chosen, I may almost say picked out, by the master of the crown office. So that in the case of libel, a man is exposed to the expense and danger of trial at the will of the crown, prosecuted by the crown, before a jury chosen by the crown, and by judges dependent upon the crown for large salaries upon retiring from office. Star chamber sentences have been pronounced for the most trifling political offences, and men convicted of libel have had judgment hanging over their heads for years, to the disgrace of the administration of justice, and let fall to crush them when they became obnoxious to ministers. The judges too are in the unconstitutional habit of remanding to prison convicted persons to be brought up for judgment on the last day of term, and frequently in the term following, by which means it is possible they may receive instruction from the court as to the sentences they shall pronounce. And for the first time a most dangerous precedent has been established of granting a new trial in a criminal case, an abuse which has hitherto been confined to cases of a civil nature; an abuse which converts the substantial protection of trial by jury into a mere shadow, which violates the great ruling principle of our criminal law that a man shall not be put in danger twice for the same offence, and which sets the judge above the law. And to compleat the whole, the attorney-general has dared to threaten juries, and talk to them of a writ of attain.—The freedom of speech has been destroyed, and above fifty persons forbid to meet to discuss public grievances under penalty of death by military execution.—The trial by jury in multiplied instances, is almost all where taxes are concerned, and where the dispute being for property between the subject and the crown, there is most need of its protection, has been taken away; and the arbitrary jurisdiction of justices and commissioners substituted in its place. Landed property has been confiscated to an immense amount, under the specious name of a sale of the land tax. This is the last expedient of a spendthrift profligate government, but no new scheme. Other countries have followed the same course, and been ruined by it. But what is the meaning of selling a tax? What is a tax? A tax is no property. What has a man purchased by it? Nothing, but the probability of an additional tax. Having purchased this, a new tax will be laid, which in its turn may be sold, as they call it, that is the landed proprietor may be called upon to advance sixteen or seventeen, or eighteen years taxes at once, and if he refuse to be so cheated, deluded, and robbed as to purchase his own property, the government puts in a co-proprietor with him, having a prior claim upon his estate. A new land tax will then be laid, this may again be sold, and new proprietors put in upon him, so that in a course of years, by the simple operation of what is called the sale of the land tax, a gentleman of landed property may find himself in possession of nothing of his own estate but the title deeds.

The income tax has created an inquisitorial power of the most partial, offensive, and cruel nature. The whole transactions of a life may be inquired into, family affairs laid open, and an Englishman, like a culprit, summoned to attend commissioners, compelled to wait like a lacquey in their anti-chamber from day to day until they are ready to institute their inquisition into his property; put to his oath, after all perhaps disbelieved, surcharged and stigmatized as perjured, without any redress from or appeal to a jury of his country. And it is worth remarking too, that a little before the introduction of this unprincipled scheme of plunder, the law of perjury was altered, and the punishment made transportation to Botany Bay. Sir, the repeal of this tax is not sufficient remedy for its infamy; its principle must be stigmatized and branded.

Add to this the innumerable wanton, harassing and disproportioned penalties to support our overgrown system of taxation, converting England into an Excise office, and one part of the people into spies and informers, to prey upon the other. The whole practice relating to custody has been changed, about which the wise and humane spirit of the old law of England was so scrupulously nice, as well it might, for upon that chiefly depends all the protection of those at the best ill-protected and unfortunate creatures, prisoners, who even with all that precaution must inevitably be left too much at the discretion of gaolers. Now, however, all protection is withdrawn, close custody and the infamous practice of changing from custody to custody, and of sending men to be imprisoned in distant places, one of the heaviest grievances complained of under the Stuarts, reintroduced contrary to the most sacred fundamental laws of the constitution.

The treason laws, too, have been altered, because the old law of Edward 3rd was too clear and distinct. They were bungling traitors, it was said, who could not avoid the operation of a law so well understood. Therefore they made new laws to ensnare and entrap men's lives, introducing the horrible and atrocious doctrine of constructive and complicated treason. Meetings for parliamentary reform may be construed treason. Under the old law they had tried it without success. It was too plain, and former wicked attempts had been worn out by adjudication. Therefore, said ministers, we must have new laws, under which there have been no decisions, where the judge may range with discretion, wide as his conscience will permit, where there are no legal land-marks, no boundaries to direct or control; then we shall see who will dare to complain of any grievance, or even hint at reform. And whilst they make new laws, introducing the atrocious doctrine of constructive treason, they also make the judges who are to construe them, dependent upon the crown for large salaries when they retire from office.

It was an accusation brought against Caligula, that he wrote his laws so small, and hung them up so high, that the people could scarcely read them; but our ministers go much farther—they make laws that every man can read, but that no man can understand. They have erected bastiles, they have chosen their military posts, and encircled the land with barracks in order, to use their own expression, “to make the soldiers deaf, if they could not make the people dumb.” They have upon all occasions called in the military force, and neglected and degraded the civil power in the hands of the citizens.—They have organized a system of spies, undermining the morality, corrupting the integrity of the nation, poisoning every source of social happiness, destroying all confidence between man and man; and thus have they triumphed over the manners, habits, customs, and character of Englishmen.—They have contrived to destroy all sense of shame and honour amongst public men; so that the people can no longer place any dependence upon professions ever so public; for the same man who is loud in professions of patriotism and reform to-day, shall have no longer the slightest difficulty to recant to-morrow, leaving his most solemn pledges to the public, and his pawned honour un-redeemed, with only modestly confessing, that to-day he is grown wiser than he was yesterday. So that all the ties of honest fellowship are dissolved, private honour, private friendship, public principle, all borne down by the overwhelming tide of corruption, which sets full in for despotism at home, which must assuredly produce final destruction from abroad.

But our ministers have not only taken away the old laws of the land, and substituted new ones, in violation of every fundamental principle of the constitution, but they have transgressed even these, and acted, to use their own expression, with "a vigour beyond the law." They have new-modelled the police upon the plan of the old despotism of France; they have created a lieutenant de police, with an immense salary under the title of Third Secretary of State, contrary to law. They have selected the lowest and the meanest creatures, whom they have invested with the sacred authority of the magistracy, needy men, depending upon pensions for bread; and having extended the power of these men beyond all former bounds, they have placed their secret and and murderous dungeons under the direction and management of these pensioned justices. They have, without even the form of the previous consent of parliament, bringing thereby this House into contempt and degradation, sent the money of the people out, and brought German mercenaries into the kingdom, rightly judging them fitter instruments than English soldiers for their designs.

Year after year have they suspended the Habeas Corpus act; and thus armed, they have issued general warrants; arrested indiscriminately, and then selected such persons, not as they had any information against, but as they suspected they should be able to extort information from. Knowing what they deserved, they could not believe but that all men were conspiring against them. They have refused to give copies of the warrants for arrest and commitment to the persons whom they have arrested; and the government agent, when applied to, has declared frankly that he would rather pay the legal penalties than give up any such copies. Having chosen their victims, they commenced their inquisition, the process of which was varied, according to the supposed temper and disposition of the prisoner. Some were loaded with irons, and plunged at once into all the horrors of Coldbath-fields; others undergo a different treatment; they are sent to messengers houses, where they are indulged with food and fire, comfortably lodged; the messenger's business being to pump his prisoner, and perpetually to represent to him the terrors of Coldbath-fields and governor Aris, hoping good naturedly that he will escape them by giving information, or, as they term it "singing out." In this state of preparation the prisoner is brought up to be examined, when the first question asked by the dignified magistrate, who presides at these inquisitorial proceedings, is, in the cant phrase of a thief-taker, whether the prisoner will sing out or not? Most of these unfortunate men, having no song gratifying to the ear of the worthy magistrate, and preferring cold and hunger to giving false information, are then sent to Coldbath-fields, and recommended to the care of governor Aris. This perhaps may serve to explain to the public the mystery of that invisible shield which hangs over this monster of protected cruelty, notwithstanding his acknowledged enormities, and the universal indignation of the country, all of which have only led, as I am informed, to an augmentation of his salary of an additional hundred a year. But those enormities are too great to be treated of here incidentally, or to be made part of any other question; they shall again be brought before this House, and the public, by themselves.—Thrust then into a solitary cell in this prison, where thirst, and hunger, and every species of cruelty is practised and endured, unpitied and unseen, exposed even to personal violence; and having suffered it in several instances from the brutal ferocity of Aris; cut off from every consolation which the most inhuman have seldom denied their victims, even wives and children excluded; in this close, cruel, illegal custody have ministers kept men, without charge, without knowing their accusers, without daring to bring a man to trial. At length, some at the end of two, some at the end of three, one has been imprisoned the greater part of seven years, with ruined fortunes, broken health, broken hearts almost, are they permitted to rejoin, witness, and partake the miseries of their starving families. To crown all, ministers have prevailed upon this House to reject the petitions of men they have thus treated, and to pass, without any inquiry, a bill of indemnity for these ministers and gaolers. A plain proof which of the two broke the law, the accused, or the accusers. This indemnity bill is the most fatal measure which has yet been adopted; it is the final blow, holds up the constitution to contempt and scorn, makes the much-talked-of responsibility of ministers a thing rather to be laughed at than feared; and, to render it altogether as ludicrous as it is wicked and profligate, the present ostensible minister, at the same time that he passes this bill of indemnity for his predecessor, creator, and patron, tells us, he means, by pursuing the same system, to stand in need of a similar bill, and hopes his successor will do as much for him when he is to go out of office. Why, Sir, this bill of indemnity of itself requires another bill of indemnity; and so ministers may wish us to go on, passing indemnity upon indemnity for every species of atrocity, till at length we have brought ourselves into such general abhorrence, that the people of England, like the people of Ireland, shall be glad to get rid of us at all events, to be eased of the burthen of the parliament. We may then be ordered, like the Irish parliament, to do one act of suicidal justice upon ourselves, and to terminate our own existence. But, Sir, this is not merely a bill of indemnity; had it been so, it would have been sufficient to have secured ministers, after a strict inquiry into their conduct, against the legal damages which might have been awarded; so the law would have kept its course; but this would by no means have answered the purpose, which was, not so much to indemnify ministers, as to prevent the tale from being told; to prevent their infamy from coming out: therefore it was necessary to reject petitions, stating the horrid facts of which themselves were ashamed; therefore it was necessary to clear your gallery when these petitions were read; therefore it was necessary to bar up the doors of the courts of justice, in order to prevent any well-authenticated account of their conduct coming before the public.

Before I quit this subject, I beg leave once more to repeat the case of these men, of whose treatment I complain; and let no man be so weak and childish as to imagine his life can be a moment safe, or depends upon any better security than the discretion of the executive, if corruption has attained such a height that ministers can commit such acts with impunity; if such is the wretched state of the representation, that the House of Commons, which, according to the constitution, should be the jealous observer and controller of the acts of the executive, the protector and guardian of the people and the laws, can be prevailed upon to indemnify ministers without any inquiry into or explanation of such conduct. Here are men taken up, kept in abhorred close custody, without charge, without accusers, without trial, bankrupt in fortune and health, their petitions rejected, the course of justice turned aside; and all this flagrant violation of the laws, constitution, common sense, and common humanity, to cover and conceal the foul infamy of ministers. Upon this one act I might fairly rest my demand for an inquiry. That they have broken the law, is not a matter of opinion or doubt; here is their own confession of their guilt. Or, is the breach of law no guilt in those who are intrusted with the guardianship of the laws? And shall they be protected in the actual violation, whilst the people are tormented upon suspicion? I own, Sir, I did not think all that haughtiness we have witnessed, that disdain they pretended of shrinking from responsibility, volunteering one for another more than an equal share, when the day of inquiry should arrive—I did not think it would have ended in a full confession of their guilt, and pleading a pardon in court. I expected that they would have boldly relied for their defence upon the necessity of the case; that they would have proved to us the reality of all those deep-laid plots and conspiracies, which they assured us existed, though at the time they demanded confidence, because it was unsafe to unfold to us their knowledge upon the subject. Sir, I have a right to expect, at this time, that the contents of those green boxes and green bags, entrusted before to their own chosen secret committees, should now be produced to this House at large; for now we find all these alarms prove to be mere cheat, trick and delusion, to answer ministerial ends; and these dangerous men, as they were falsely pretended to be, let loose upon the public, bailed some of them by the very Bow-street runners who apprehended them, as if the object was to turn the law into ridicule and contempt.

Sir, we have heard much of the blessings of our happy constitution; but look at the real situation of the country; 550 millions of debt—barracks and bastiles—the Habeas Corpus act absolutely destroyed; for the frequency, long continuance, and facility of its suspension, has totally annihilated the confidence of the subject—an army of spies and informers—an inquisition of property—an inquisition of political opinion—a shackled and corrupted press—a gagged and beggared people—pensioned justices—eventually salaried judges—vague laws—threatened juries—an executive magistrate not accountable—a degraded aristocracy—a confiding parliament, and irresponsible and indemnified ministers. What is there in this system so admirable, to recompense the people of England for the immense sacrifices they are called upon daily and hourly to make for its support.

Sir, the situation of this country is, God knows, deplorable enough; but if we turn our eyes to Ireland, we shall find the despotism completed there, of which the foundations deep and broad are laid here. Painful as is the recital of the woful measures pursued by ministers in Ireland, they are too important to be passed over, or to be lightly touched on. They must be fully exposed to the view of this House, and of the people of England, who, I am sorry to say, are either wholly ignorant of the transactions that have taken place in that ill-fated country, or, what is worse, have received a false account of them, propagated with uncommon assiduity by ministers and their agents. To remove this prejudice, and to enable the House to form an impartial opinion of the conduct of ministers, it will be necessary to take ground as far back as the cause which gave rise to these events. At the conclusion of the American war (a war undertaken precisely on the same principles as that against France), out of 12,000 men, composing the standing army of Ireland, 9,000 were transported across the Atlantic to fight the battles of England in America; and Ireland, left to herself, exhibited the grand spectacle of a volunteer army, self-raised, self-paid, self-clothed, self-armed, not subject to martial law, a debating army, choosing its own officers, canvassing public measures, submitting to no other articles of war than public opinion, to no other mutiny bill than private honour. Then, too, France threatened invasion, but received no encouragement, because the people, though mal-treated, hoped the time of their deliverance was at hand, and that an honest parliament, such as they believed then sat, would redress their grievances, which were listened to with attention, and discussed with temper and moderation. There were no laws passed to prevent public meetings, or to throw obstacles in the way of petitions; the Habeas Corpus act was not suspended; there were no burnings, rapes, or massacres; military tribunals did not usurp the place of courts of justice; free quarters were unheard-of; torture was unknown. There were no Indemnity bills, government and its agents having committed none of those crimes which have since driven the people to madness. These were the reasons why France, if ever she had entertained an idea of a descent on Ireland, had not the temerity to put it in execution, well knowing that a nation so defended by citizen soldiers was invincible, and that discomfiture and shame must have attended the undertaking. And that war ended without any such attempt having been made by France, and that parliament closed its labours, after having effected the settlement of 1782, of which we have lately heard so much. A very short time, however, had elapsed before the Irish people perceived that the owners of the representation, for it was then, too, private property, were the only gainers; that the nation had only exchanged the direct legalized control of the English parliament, exercised at a trifling charge, for the indirect corrupt management of the British minister, worked at an enormous cost; and that the system, always radically bad was rendered still more vicious, by holding out a greater temptation to the parliament, from the increased wages of corruption, to betray the interests of Ireland, which have unfortunately, from a short-sighted policy, been always thought incompatible with the interests of this country. The people were quickly convinced by the multiplication of places, the appointment of monopolist natives to fill them, the formation of a national debt, the establishment of a national bank, which at first pleased the vanity of the inconsiderate, were, in fact, stores gathered from the people, and swept into the granaries of the English minister, to be distributed by the hands of his factor, known by the name of secretary to a lord lieutenant, for the purpose of corrupting the self-constituted representative; which supplies so to be distributed were so abundant, that the price of a seat for one election only, rose from 800*l.* to 2,000*l.* in the Commons' House, and in the Upper House, from little or nothing to three, four, and five thousand pounds. The people, at first gratified by the sound of an independent parliament, found, to their cost, it was of them the parliament was independent, and wholly dependent upon the will of the British cabinet.

Thus deluded, the people of Ireland, taught by the eloquence of the late minister, were convinced of the absolute necessity of reform; and, as I have been told, and to the honour of those persons be it spoken, many of the proprietors of boroughs were convinced of that necessity, and offered voluntarily to relinquish their unconstitutional and usurped power. But the right hon. gentleman having in the mean time become prime minister of England, strengthened by troops returned from America, and supported by a majority of the owners of the representation, whose fortunes and whose families were made by this system, resisted every movement towards that reform to which he before led the way. But though the right hon. gentleman had changed his sentiments with his situation, though he had suffered his interest to extinguish his principles, though he might have been very anxious to throw the veil of oblivion over the speeches of the thatched house orator; those speeches, replete with common sense and truth, had made too deep an impression to be easily effaced: on the contrary, the more rapid were his strides through the mire of corruption, the more deeply were his former sentiments engraved on the minds of the people, whom every day's experience more and more confirmed in the necessity of reform; towards the attainment of which desirable end, considerable progress had been made, when it was suddenly arrested by those who, having monopolized the power of the country, were against every species of real and wholesome reform. Though the progress of reform was thus arrested, the principle was never for a moment abandoned; and in this state of corruption on the part of the British minister, of bare-faced, unblushing venality on the part of the Irish parliament, and of anxious hope and expectation on the part of the people, did things remain from the year 1783 till the year 1791, when the people determined to use every exertion to obtain a fair representation, which the right hon. gentleman had told them ought to be the express image of the people. To effect this purpose, it was necessary to embrace every description of persons, and to avoid all religious prejudices, the rock on which reform had hitherto split. To effect this, some of the most enlightened and strenuous advocates of reform composed a test, conceived in the following terms: "In the awful presence of God, I declare that I will, as far as in me lies, endeavour to promote a brotherhood of affection and union amongst Irishmen of every religious persuasion; and that I will persevere in my endeavours to procure a full, equal, and adequate representation of all the people in Ireland in parliament." Thus the work of reconciliation and union was in rapid progress; many societies of the coalesced sects, better known by the name of United Irishmen, were formed, and every thing wore an aspect favourable to peace, mutual affection and reform. The parliament having itself, in 1793, taken up the subject, seemed to evince so much firmness in the entertainment of it, that no fewer than eleven committees of the House of Commons sat in the session of that year, for the purpose of taking the state of the representation into consideration. These were alarming measures; Irishmen united were not to be endured; and the right hon. gentleman, who had studied reform, one may suppose, only with a view of learning the most efficacious mode of counteracting it, here took his stand, threw down the gauntlet of defiance to the Irish people, and commanded the independent parliament to pass, not a resolution for reform, but the notorious Convention bill, the object of which was, to quash the united societies, and to prevent all political meetings. From this time the meetings which had hitherto been held openly were convened privately; became numerous in proportion to the means taken to obstruct them, and perseveringly maintained their principles of union and reform. Attempts at reform without union would not have alarmed: religious bigotry would have easily frustrated them: it was the union of Irishmen that struck terror to the soul of ministers, because, by the disunion of the Protestant, the Catholic and the Presbyterian, they were enabled to hold Ireland in a state of abject slavery. Recourse therefore was had to the disunion of the sects, and the papering and racking system was adopted, which expelled from their habitations thousands of families, by a process the most atrocious. A paper was pasted against the doors of the cottages of the Catholics commanding the inhabitants to quit in five or ten days, and to proceed to the province of Connaught, or they should be sent to hell; and this was the revival, after a century, of that faction known under the name of Orange-men. These mandates not being at first complied with, the fanatics who had issued them repaired to the houses of the unfortunate Catholics, ousted the whole family, and racked and set fire to the miserable hovel and its contents. Such transactions could not fail to attract notice. Many of the authors of them were committed to prison; and his majesty's attorney-general was sent to the theatre where these tragedies had been acted, to prosecute the offenders who were all acquitted, except one, and he was pardoned. After this farce, which served as a manifesto to every ruffian agent of government; after such a pardon, which may be considered as an act of outlawry against the whole Catholic body, it is not to be wondered at, if those Catholics who had not yet been papered and racked, should, dreading a repetition of the same system, and having no protection from law, proceed to deprive the Orange-men, who were the authors of these proceedings, of their arms, themselves having been kept disarmed.

This proceeding answered the purpose of ministers; it afforded an opportunity of disuniting Irishmen of different persuasions; of protecting one sect, and of stirring it up to take vengeance on the other. But as the ordinary forms of law were tedious and uncertain, they determined to fling off the cumbrous load of statute, and let loose upon the people a deluded army, the officers of which were to serve as a magistracy, erected a military tribunal, where they sat, tried, sentenced, and condemned, without law, not a few individuals only, but whole tribes whom they hurried on board tenders. And this conspiracy of British ministers was not only indemnified, but an act was passed, in addition to their former acts, empowering magistrates to commit, according to law, similar outrages to those they had before perpetrated contrary to law. And by the operation of this law, which was not a dead letter, was the great body of an unarmed people put out of the protection of law, and consigned to the mercy of a licentious army. Thus having committed the parliament against the people, Ireland was invaded, upon pretence of supporting that parliament with troops of all descriptions, Scotch Fencibles,

English Fencibles, Ancient British, Hessians, and Hanoverians, were all let loose upon the people, committed such abominations of plunder, arson, rape, and massacre, that the whole island groaned beneath the weight. To the executive, backed by these auxiliaries, the parliament surrendered the country, and abolished the small remnant of law; and upon the representation of martial magistrates, that the country was in a state of disturbance, or likely to become so, martial law, as it was called, was set up, or rather all law was pulled down. Under cover of this, private enemies were proscribed in the name of public justice, all Ireland was proclaimed, and military execution closed the scene. Such was the state of the army, halloed on by ministers upon the people, that Abercromby, when placed at the head of it, declared it was formidable to every one except the enemy. When he accepted that appointment, little did he imagine the first order he should be required to issue would be for the distribution of the army at free quarters upon the people. And little did ministers, who dared to make that requisition, know of the good and gallant Abercromby; he was a soldier of honour, and had embraced the profession of arms, when the duty of a British officer was, to protect the lives of his fellow citizens, to contend against the foreign enemy, to soften the horrors of war by keeping those under his command within the strict bounds of discipline, and due subordination; instructing them not to practise cruelties, or shed unnecessary blood. These were the maxims Abercromby had learned; these he taught; these he practised: he disdained to be made the instrument of such a minister, for such a purpose, and resigned his appointment to an army of which he was not allowed the command. More compliance was easily found in those who succeeded the virtuous Abercromby; and the pack unkennelled, flushed in blood, prowled at free quarters over the face of the land, the object of which was, as avowed, to drive the people into premature insurrection. Still the people forbore to rise: a more active stimulus was employed; torture was introduced; triangles were erected in the very court yard of the vice regal palace; the cries and groans of the tortured assailed the ears of the viceroy, and as he rode through the gates of his castle, his horse's hoofs were bathed in the blood of the people. At length the unarmed people rose; thousands were killed in the field of battle, where no prisoners were made, no quarter given; and thousands were barbarously butchered afterwards in their huts, and in the fields. It was after the battle was over, that the horrors of war began. The excesses of the people I will not stop to consider; they are equally the disgrace of the government; suffice it to say, the worst passions of the human soul were called forth on every side: in the dreadful catalogue of crimes committed by the ministers and people, the people however have not to answer for the violation of women, or torture of men. The insurrection (an unequivocal proof to the minister of the cordial hatred of the people for their parliament), being put down, the time was arrived for the completion of his original design; and, as he had before conspired with the parliament against the people, he was now to conspire with the army against the parliament. That army which the Irish parliament foolishly imagined had invaded Ireland for the protection of its political power, was now to be turned against the parliament for its political extinction; that parliament upon which the minister was wont to lavish praises for its firmness, wisdom, and magnanimity; that independent parliament, which he said had by its energy preserved Ireland to the British empire; that parliament, which never ceased to revile and libel the Irish people, was now in its turn to be stigmatised; to be represented, by its former panegyrist, as a corrupt assembly, full of provincial ignorance, local prejudice, ungovernable passions, incompetent to legislate for that country: it had brought the nation, he said, to the brink of a precipice, and had endangered the British connexion itself. And all these acts which I have related, to the commission of which it had been excited by ministers, and which are recorded in blood in the chronicles of Ireland, were now produced as evidence of its guilt. And having given these acts in evidence, the minister put the parliament to the torture, as it had tortured the people, to confess. It did confess, and he sentenced the self-convicted traitor to die by its own felonious hand. And this act of compelled political suicide, he called their assent to a union. To effect this revolution was the Irish parliament excited by ministers to declare war against the people, and to wage that war in a manner the bare recollection of which makes humanity shudder.

Sir, I have gone so much into this detail, because it has been asserted, that Irish union and reform were generated by the French revolution; that the principle was a French principle; a new doctrine created by the French war. But facts speak for themselves, and every fact speaks the reverse of this assertion. The necessity of reform was felt by the Irish people during the American war. The motives to reform were strengthened by the reasoning and eloquence of the right hon. gentleman himself, before he became minister, and by the Letter of the duke of Richmond, before he was appointed master-general of the ordnance, to colonel Sharman, chairman of the celebrated meeting of the Irish volunteers at Dungannon, convened for the express purpose of reform. The question was again and again discussed in the House of Commons itself, and occupied the attention of all Ireland ten years before the French revolution. And what produced it? The very constitution of that parliament; representatives of their own property, and owners of the representation, plundering the nation; its matchless venality and corruption; its uniformly betraying the interests of Ireland to the British cabinet; its resistance to the moderate, just demands of the people. These were the reasons, growing out of the system and organization itself, that impressed on the minds of the people of Ireland the absolute necessity of reform. And who can deny those reasons to have been just? Their House of Commons has been proved to be private property; it has been paid for, bought and sold, and the bills for the purchase-money now lie upon your table. But the right hon. gentleman himself saw the necessity of reforming this corrupt and incompetent parliament. The people of Ireland and the minister only differed as to the species of reform. They were of opinion, that a native resident parliament, having the same feelings and the same interest with the people, and not representing their own private property; they were of opinion, that this was the true character of a constitutional House of Commons. But the right hon. gentleman, formerly the great reformer, was now of opinion, that a foreign parliament, composed of men, between whom and the people there existed no sympathy, no identity of interests, ignorant and regardless of their wishes, wants, and character, receiving information of that people through the medium of those very persons whom he represented as so full of prejudice, local animosity, heat and passion, as not to be fit to govern Ireland. This is the species of reform, according to the right hon. gentleman's opinion now, best suited to the people of that country; and to project this species of reform, projected by him at the time of the regency, has he strode over mountains of carcasses, and waded through oceans of blood.

Thus, then, have ministers, though they have failed in their foreign objects, been far from being altogether unsuccessful. Though they have failed in their attempt to conquer France, they have made a shameful conquest of the rights and liberties of England. They have flogged, tortured, and massacred the people of Ireland. They have bought the representation of that country, and made a complete revolution in the representation of this. This is their indemnity for the past, and security for the future. This compensates for every other disgrace, failure, and disaster. This is the reform which the right hon. gentleman promised us. He did indeed formerly promise us a hundred knights; but he did not at that time tell us he would bring them from Ireland.

Sir, when I reflect upon the enormities which have been committed in that country, I really feel ashamed of my species—ashamed of being a man! but when I consider that they have been supported by English power, I feel ashamed of my country. When I recollect that a British minister, in a British House of Commons, has dared to vindicate the use of torture, which even the Inquisition has at length, through shame, abandoned, the last of infamies seems to be an Englishman. The bloody monster Robespierre, who only inflicted death upon his victims, appears, by a comparison with him, to be an angel of mercy. No Sicilian tyrant, not one, nor all the twelve Cæsars together, none of the monsters who have hitherto appeared in human shape, and been held up to, and inherited the execration of mankind, ever exceeded the cruelties practised under the late ministers, which have covered Ireland with blood, and England with infamy and disgrace.

And can we permit this to be washed in Lethe and forgotten? Is not the time yet arrived, or is there no time for inquiry into such unprecedented conduct? And shall we allow ministers, by a miserable juggle and sham change of administration amongst their own creatures and partisans, to escape unquestioned? and the people of England and Ireland to be disgraced abroad and enslaved at home? Hitherto, failure abroad, and unconstitutional acts at home, have been deemed good parliamentary grounds of inquiry. It is high time to inquire into, and have defined, the real object of the late war. It is fit to inquire, if such a peace as the present is safe and honourable, why negotiation even was rejected before.

But, Sir, the whole situation of the country, external and internal (the latter infinitely more important), demands immediate inquiry. The scandalous imprisonments, the cruel tortures, the disaffection of Ireland, the distresses of the people of England, the monstrous corruptions, profligate expenditure, prisons, courts of justice (all the productions of that wicked administration), all cry aloud for inquiry.

This, Sir, is a melancholy picture of the situation of this country. A situation in many respects similar to that in which it stood at the end of the American war. At that time, the country was threatened with dangers unprecedented before, though trifling in comparison with the dangers and difficulties that threaten us now. Then too, as now, and as is natural after a wicked and unsuccessful war, there was, apparently, a division and difference of opinion amongst ministers; of whom the right hon. gentleman gave the following description:—"There is only one thing," said he, "in which they seem to agree, in their resolution to destroy the empire they were called upon to save; and this, I fear, they will accomplish before the indignation of a great and suffering people shall fall upon their heads in the punishment they deserve. May God grant that punishment be not so long delayed, as to involve within it a great and innocent family, who, though they can have had no share in the guilt, may, and most likely will, be doomed to suffer the consequences!"* So said the right hon. gentleman then. So say I now. At that time, he unquestionably, in my mind, spoke the language of patriotism and truth, and met with that support from the people of England, which that language undoubtedly deserved. And what was that language?

Justice for the past, by the punishment of those wicked ministers who had carried on that detestable war; and security to the people in future for their rights and liberties, by the only means by which justice and freedom can be secured to any nation upon earth—a fair representation of the people in parliament. That opinion of his, which was good then, is good now, or rather better now, confirmed as it is by woful experience. He then foretold the evils that would inevitably follow, if the course he then recommended was not pursued. He then said, and said truly, that no honest man could serve the country under so corrupt a system of representation; that if an administration was formed of the ablest and honestest men, with such a system of representation, they could not only do no good, but even with all their exertions, and all their endeavours, it would be impossible for them to avoid a recurrence of similar or greater misfortunes. The right hon. gentleman foretold all this, and is now in the singular predicament of being at once the teacher and example of the truth of his own doctrine. The right hon. gentleman, however, did not foretel us the full extent of the evils we were to endure. He only told us the evils that could not be avoided, even by an administration composed of the wisest and best men in the country. He did not tell us what himself could do. He did not tell us the extent of the calamities we were to suffer under an administration composed of the worst men in the country; under an administration, of which himself was the head, in conjunction with those very men whom he had before held up as the wickedest men in the country, and as fit objects of public indignation and public vengeance. Those evils we now feel; and I now tell the people of Great Britain and Ireland, as he told them at the close of the American war, that they have no choice between ruin and reform. I call upon the gentlemen of Great Britain and Ireland to stand forward at length in defence of the rights of the people at large. This is their natural position, the post of interest as well as honour; and let us all, before it becomes too late, set about reforming those abuses which disgust the country, and weigh the people to the earth. Consider, our next war with France will probably be carried on in Great Britain; and if you wish for energy and exertion, you must not be out of love with democracy. If you want virtue, you must give it motives. If you want patriotism, you must afford a patria, by a fair government, embracing and taking in the people, by restoring to the people their rights, and giving them security for their enjoyment, by a fair representation in this House. Thus, by uniting all classes in one common interest, you may defy the power of France, aggrandized as she is; or of the world, could it be placed in one giant arm; and, what is more, you may defy wicked, corrupt, and profligate ministers.

Sir, I am only an humble imitator of the right hon. gentleman. I follow the conduct he pursued at the end of the American war. His advice to the nation at the end of that war was wise, and, had it been followed, would have prevented the calamities of this. I now require on the part of the people, that justice which he then demanded. I demand inquiry, in order that punishment should follow guilt, as an example to ministers hereafter, and as the previous and necessary step to reform, which can alone secure the people in future. Sir, I have now performed my duty to the people, to the utmost of my power; and I have only to say, that if, after a war the most burthensome, bloody, and calamitous, this country ever was engaged in, ending in a peace which places it in a situation critical and perilous beyond all former example; if after the most flagrant and daring violation of the laws and constitution, no inquiry shall be granted into the conduct of those who have been intrusted with the administration, I shall indeed believe, that the destinies of France (a term much used of late in this House) do lead that country to universal empire, and this to be enslaved and destroyed by a set of the most rash, wicked, and unwise men that ever were entrusted with the affairs of a great nation. I therefore move, "That this House will resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to inquire into the conduct of the late Administration both at home and abroad during the war."

Mr. Sturt seconded the motion.

Earl Temple felt that an apology was due to the House, for taking notice of a speech, the most extravagant, be believed that ever was uttered within those walls. A speech with more of assumption and less of proof, never, he believed, was spoken—a speech fraught with arguments

(if arguments they could be called), which, though repeatedly urged year after year, and as often refuted, yet which, whenever they were offered, ought not to be suffered to pass unanswered. The hon. baronet's avowed object was, an inquiry into the conduct of the late administration, against whom he levelled the most unqualified abuse; but, notwithstanding the asperities thus cast on them, their conduct would bear the strictest examination. The hon. baronet had endeavoured to blend the measures of the former administration with those of the present; but in relation to the war, they ought to be kept distinct and separate. The present was not the fit opportunity for discussing the merits of the peace; and the measures of the war could only be discussed with reference to the administration when they went out of office in 1801; and whether they had acted in the conduct of the war in a manner justifiable or not, he thought the hon. baronet had completely failed in the proof of the charges which he urged against them. Before the hon. baronet proceeded to the accusation of his majesty's late ministers, for entering upon, and following up the war, he should first have called upon the House to rescind those resolutions by which their approbation was repeatedly expressed, year after year, to those measures so strenuously condemned by the hon. baronet; but to this the hon. baronet would find it no easy task to persuade the House. Lord Temple then entered generally into a defence of the late administration, and argued, that it had been repeatedly shown, that France, and not England, first commenced hostilities, but that, though this country did not begin, the aggressive conduct of France was such as must have forced us to commence hostilities, if France had not taken the lead. The hon. baronet had said, that we had failed in the objects of the war; but this he denied. The true object of the war was, to repel Jacobinical politics, and the attempts made by the intrigues of France to overturn all constitutions and governments, and particularly our own; and in both we had completely succeeded. We had protected our own colonies, and captured those of the enemy. We had been completely victorious in the East; and the exploits of our fleets and armies, so far as they depended upon his majesty's late ministers, had been everywhere honourable to the British name. If the hon. baronet was mistaken in his assertion, as to the motives, conduct, and consequences of the war, he was not less so in his description of the British constitution, which, so far from being of that stubborn and immutable nature under all exigencies, as the hon. baronet would insist, happily admitted of contraction or expansion, according to the exigencies of times and occasions; and could, on many occasions, derive strength from placing strong measures in the power of the executive. The hon. baronet's speech, fraught as it was with violence, and assertion unsupported by fact, might serve the purpose of a tavern harangue. His clamour about bastiles and arbitrary imprisonments was well calculated to rouse the spirit of a mob, and excite to popular commotion, but was ill fitted to the decorum or dignity of that House. The cry of No Bastile! was the artifice of those who first excited to the late revolution the people of Paris. They were told, that when that fortress was razed, their liberties would be secure. But what was the proof on its demolition? why that one solitary prisoner only was confined in it; and what the result? why so far was liberty from being secured by the demolition of the Bastile, that every church became a prison under the tyranny of the revolters. His lordship next adverted to the affairs of Ireland, and vindicated the conduct of the friends of government in this country, by stating the apparent symptoms of revolutionary spirit which were so strong in that country, and the declarations contained in the proclamations prepared by the Sheares, and the other leaders of the rebellion, to give no quarter to those who should oppose them. The imprisonment of suspected persons in this country was another topic for the hon. baronet's declamation; but he verily believed, that if the twenty-six friends of the people, so much the object of the hon. baronet's commiseration, had not been imprisoned, this country would have gone very near to be pushed into commotion and bloodshed. The hon. baronet's wish seemed to be, to impress the House with an idea, that, from the conclusion of the American war, the object of the Irish malcontents was only a parliamentary reform; but if the hon. baronet would only advert to the declaration made by Arthur O'Connor, the principal leader of the Irish rebellion, and of whose constitutional principles the hon. baronet at one time thought so highly he would find the idea of parliamentary reform laughed at as a mere joke, and that nothing short of revolution and a republic was their real object. With respect to our perseverance in the war with France, and the repeated failure of overtures set on foot for the restoration of peace, his majesty's ministers were equally blameless, and their conduct had been repeatedly approved by parliament. Negotiations on our part were never deferred, nor declined, but when the fugacity of ostensible power in the men who, from time to time, composed the revolutionary government of France, left no security whatever for the observance of any treaty, or the permanence of any peace which could be concluded. The last overtures at Lisle, on the ground of pacific negotiation, was for a naval armistice, which must have allowed to France the power of recruiting her navy, and left this country at the mercy of the naval coalition since attempted to be formed against her; but such a proposition could only be listened to with indignation. Parliament and the country at large with one voice approved the rejection of overtures on such a ground, and the result had eminently justified our refusal. When Buonaparté, with a rash and despotic hand, seized on the reins of government, and proposed overtures of peace, his majesty's ministers had too fresh in their recollection the short lived power of his predecessors, to warrant them in the hope that any peace suddenly concluded with him promised greater permanence. But when the people of France, tired of the horrors of the revolutionary conflict that had long torn their country, agreed to confirm his government, and such a degree of stability seemed to attach to it, as warranted a reliance upon a treaty of peace concluded with France, under his direction, overtures were accepted. He was one of those who did not approve the terms of the peace; yet it was pretty plain, that the confidence of his majesty's present ministers, who concluded the peace, was seconded by the confidence of the country, as was obvious from the promptitude of negotiating a loan for 25,000,000*l.* on terms peculiarly advantageous to the public. This was a true criterion that our wealth remained unimpaired. The hon. baronet, (continued the noble lord), has charged ministers with having abandoned the income tax, as being inefficacious and disgraceful to the country. It was a tax instituted for the prosecution of the war; and while it lasted, I never wished it to be relinquished. I consider it as the salvation of the country, by calling forth the energy and the resources of the people. As a war tax, I hope and trust, if any cause should arise to call for extraordinary exertion, that it will be again brought forward, because I think it well calculated for that purpose. The hon. baronet has denominated it a cruel and oppressive measure; but he will recollect, that it originated with the city of London. It was called for by the city, and by the commercial men, who brought it before parliament for its approbation. As to the conduct of a dear and noble relation of mine (lord Grenville) at the time to which the hon. baronet alludes, I shall say nothing; but I do, from the bottom of my heart, believe, that to the wise and upright conduct of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) we owe every blessing which we now enjoy, and the privilege of sitting here. The country has borne witness to his abilities, and posterity will do justice to his memory. I am convinced, that to be the object of the calumny of the hon. baronet and his friends, and of their slanderous rancour, is the proudest boast of his heart, satisfied as he must be of having well earned the gratitude and praise of his countrymen. On these grounds, I shall give my decided dissent to the motion.

Mr. Archdall begged to acknowledge the compliments which the hon. baronet had paid to the parliament of Ireland, as a cruel, and even as a suicidal body of men; as one of them, he would assure the hon. baronet, that they received all his compliments with the most sovereign acquiescence. As to the ministerial warfare levied against Ireland, it consisted in acts of concession, from the commencement of the war to the union of the parliaments—acts of repeated concession and disappointed conciliation. He then mentioned the different popular acts passed there, particularly the militia bill, to which he said Ireland chiefly owed its preservation at this moment; but which was not what the hon. baronet had recommended, a debating army; and the Roman Catholic bill, of which the Catholics had expressed an opinion, by publishing, that they should for ever remember with the most lively gratitude, the benefits which they had received during the earl of Westmorland's administration: all this war of ministry, the Irish people had happily survived, and found they were existing very well with them; yet lord Westmoreland was one of that ministry, under whose government more good laws had been made for Ireland, than in all the governments of all the lords lieutenant, from lord Wentworth down to lord Wentworth Fitzwilliam. After mentioning this last nobleman with great respect, he said, the next government was a government of self-defence; it was assailed by rebellion and civil war, and was obliged to repel force by force. Could the hon. baronet say, that commotion should go so far, and no farther, and that the hand which might raise a storm could be sure to allay it? As to the free-quartering of the army, he should not defend nor blame it. All he should say was, that it was not an act of the late ministry, but of the regretted character who was then the commander-in-chief, sir Ralph Abercromby. The House would determine what aggressions the late ministry had committed against the constitution, when they considered the union with Ireland—a measure, which, he trusted, would transmit to the latest posterity their names, as the best protectors of an united empire. He would close what he had to say with adverting for a moment to the right hon. gentleman who had been at the head of that ministry, against whom the motion was particularly directed; he adverted to that gentleman with those sensations which inferior minds must feel when they contemplate an object so far above them; but if after a long ministerial life of difficulties, which could only be exceeded by the spirit which surmounted them; if, after years of unceasing exertions and undiminished popularity, he chose to rest from the service of a crown which he had asserted, and a country which he had saved, rich at least in the consciousness of his character, and the patriotism of his labours; if after this some one should come forward to criminate his merits in the parliament which had witnessed them, even he would presume to speak what the right hon. gentleman need not condescend to speak for himself—that to this House it would be enough to say, as his illustrious father said before him, “You know these hands are clean;” and to his accuser it would not be too much to say, “Disce, puer, virtutem ex me, verumque laborem, Fortunam ab aliis”——

Mr. Jones said, it had been observed by the noble earl, that the speech of the hon. baronet was full of assumption without proof; but of all the speeches he had ever heard, the speech of the noble earl was of that very description. It was not easy to sit silent after hearing the panegyric which the noble earl had uttered in defence of his majesty's late ministers, and of the whole of their measures. Among other subjects of encomium was the income tax, which the noble earl expressed his hope would always be adopted as a war tax in any future contest. But a tax so detestable, he hoped would never again be adopted. By the blessing of God, he would bring forward a question, the decision upon which, he hoped, would brand this tax with some mark of eternal infamy. Was any man prepared to say, that an inquiry should not be instituted into the conduct of a ministry, who had dilapidated 258 millions of the public money, granted 583 pensions, and created 95 peers? If inquiry was resisted, the parliament of this country would soon be placed in the situation in which the hon. baronet had described the parliament of Ireland to have been; it would be compelled to commit an act of suicidal justice.

Lord Belgrave thought the motion of the hon. baronet should be converted into a practical compliment to his majesty's late ministers. He should say little with respect to the argument of the hon. baronet; but it appeared to him that, with the sentiments which actuated his mind, he ought to have proposed certain resolutions for the purpose of grounding on them an impeachment. The hon. baronet had not, however, been contented with censuring the conduct of the late ministers, but the present ministers, the parliament, the judges, the police magistrates, the governor of Cold Bath-fields prison, as well as other persons, had come in for a share of the censure. It was well that the speech of the hon. baronet had been made in that House; had it been made elsewhere, at least so far as it regarded the judges, it must have been treated with contempt, or prosecuted as a libel. He had been a member of the committee appointed to inquire into the economy of Cold Bath-fields prison, and he would confidently assert, that the moment the least remonstrance was made on the part of the prisoners, the strictest investigation was set on foot by government, and immediate relief, if necessary, afforded. He could not but think that governor Aris had been harshly treated in some speeches made in that House; for no individual had complained of oppression, except some of the mutineers.—Had the hon. baronet simply proposed the motion, he would not have moved any amendment, but as the hon. baronet had coupled it with a speech containing the strongest censure, he thought the House should express its decided opinion as to the conduct of the late ministers, to whom the country was, in his opinion, indebted for its salvation. He would, by way of amendment, accordingly propose, that all the words, after the word “that,” should be omitted; and that in the room of them should be inserted the words, “the thanks of this House be given to his majesty’s late ministers, for their wise and salutary conduct throughout the late war, by which they have maintained the national honour, and preserved the constitution.”

The Speaker said, that such an amendment was certainly consistent with the forms of parliament, but was extremely unusual.

Mr. Pitt said, he would not offer one word on the original motion, but he hoped he might be allowed to suggest, that the amendment proposed by his noble friend, though within the letter of the order of the House, was certainly against the general course of proceeding; and therefore it appeared to him better not to proceed on the amendment. The House had met with a vague and imperfect notice of some motion to be levelled against the late administration, but with no knowledge of the particular points of that motion, which manifested, as he thought, a want of that accommodation which the House at least might have expected. But his noble friend would recollect, that as to the amendment, there had been no notice whatever; it would therefore be an unusual course to pursue the amendment which his noble friend was inclined to propose; he hoped therefore, for the sake of the House, and of those to whom the amendment related, that he would not now bring it forward.

Lord Belgrave said, he should not have moved the amendment, had it not been for the speech of the hon. baronet; but after such a violent speech, it was necessary for him, in a manly manner, to express his opinion. He would, however, withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Ellison said, he was convinced the House was not to be led astray by “sound and fury signifying nothing.” No fact had been brought forward in support of the motion which could induce a grand jury to put a man on his trial. He had heard much of Bastiles and Cold Bath-fields, but he could not discover that any abuse of power existed. The motion appeared to him to be more directed against the majority of that House than against ministers; but he had always understood that the majority ought to govern the minority. The motion was brought forward at the very moment of peace, when, whilst the hon. baronet was asserting the country to be ruined, the people were displaying the greatest confidence in its resources.

Mr. Bouverie expressed his approbation of the motion. During the late contest much had been promised, but little had been performed. It was the indisputable right of the public to inquire how their affairs had been conducted during a contest in which so much blood and treasure had been expended, and it was the object of the motion to institute such an inquiry. If on the result of this inquiry ministers should appear to have acted for the public good, they would, no doubt, receive a proper tribute of approbation; and if the contrary should turn out to be the case, it was but just that they should meet the punishment they deserved.

Sir R. Buxton opposed the motion. He thought that, instead of gaining nothing by the war, we had gained our object. He admitted that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act was in some degree an infringement of the liberty of the subject; but the question was, whether that liberty was not to give way for a time to the safety of the country? There never was a war accompanied by rebellion, in which so few persons had suffered. It was surely better to pass a few temporary acts as a preventive, than to bring a number of persons to condign punishment.

Mr. Alexander said, that the speech of the hon. baronet was a charge of unqualified corruption on the parliament, and on the late ministers as the agents of that corruption. Nothing had been thrown out against those ministers which did not embrace the legislature and the government, and which did not equally tend to cast contempt upon all those persons by whom the government must be administered.

Sir W. Elford said, he had attended to the speech of the hon. baronet, and not one syllable in it appeared to him to apply to the late administration: the strictures were all censures on the parliament, for enacting those laws of which the hon. baronet had complained, and for supporting the war, and the other measures of that administration; and the latter part of his speech was a gross libel on the late Irish parliament, and a tender apology for the Irish rebels. He was so fully convinced of the merits of those who were the objects of the motion, that he wished the forms of the House would admit of the motion of thanks proposed by the noble lord being now made. He had long thought, that considering the unparalleled obligations which this country owed to his majesty's late ministers, some active proof of its gratitude ought long ago to have been manifested. When he saw those right hon. gentlemen retiring from office, not with what used to be called emphatically ministerial fortunes, not with that independence which their great talents would have procured for them, had they been exercised in any other way than in the service of their country, he should ever consider it as an eternal disgrace to the country, and to the House in particular, that no one had, before this time, moved an humble address to his majesty, to implore him to bestow some signal mark of his royal bounty on those gentlemen, which that House would make good.

The House divided :

So it passed in the negative. Lord Belgrave then gave notice of his intention to bring forward, after the recess, a motion of thanks to the late administration.

Debate in the Commons on the Militia Bill.] Mr. Secretary Yorke said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to amend and consolidate the militia laws, and to augment the number of the militia. His majesty's ministers had thought it necessary, at the conclusion of the definitive treaty, to pay every attention to the defensive system of the country. He entirely agreed with what had been observed on a late occasion, that peace was to be preserved by a mixture of conciliation and firmness. No principle could be more wise than this; but the benefit of it could only be derived from placing the country in a proper posture of defence. This was never more necessary than at present, when our nearest and most formidable neighbour had received a considerable accession of power, and when the principle of her government was essentially military. With these views, it was the intention of his majesty's confidential servants in the first place to put the navy in a good state; the establishment would not only be conducted with the strictest economy, but kept up in the very best manner. He was perfectly sure there was the same disposition in ministers to turn their attention to the ordnance. With respect to the army, it stood higher now than at any former period of the war. He was persuaded that every thing which could be done in that branch of the service was to be expected from the illustrious prince at the head of that department. It always appeared to him, however, that it was impossible to come to any definitive arrangement with respect to the army on a peace establishment, till the number and organization of the militia was concluded upon. This country was assailable in many points; and it was impossible to maintain a regular army equivalent to the defence of those points, without an enormous expense. It was therefore thought expedient, upon constitutional grounds, and those of economy, to propose an increase of the militia. The points to which he wished to call the attention of the House were, the formation of the militia laws, and the augmentation of the number of the militia. With respect to the former, he wished to take, as his basis, the act of the 26th of his present majesty; and as, since that period, not less than twelve acts had been passed relative to the militia of England, and five for Scotland, it was his intention to propose the consolidation of these laws, with such amendments as should appear necessary. With respect to the augmentation of the militia, it appeared to him never to have been sufficient in point of number. In the American war it was found necessary to augment the militia, then consisting of 32,000 men, by an additional 10,000. During the present war, in 1794, it was found necessary to augment the militia in the same way; afterwards, when the danger of the country increased, the militia was again considerably augmented, the whole amounting to 90,000 men. Every gentleman must see that to have recourse, on the emergency of the moment, to the measure of increasing the militia, must interfere with the regular service; while that increase could not, at such a moment, be effected without a considerable expense, and the ultimate effect of the measure would be much weakened. It appeared to him, therefore that the defence of the country ought to be taken upon a system of peace, leaving as little as possible to the emergency of the moment. He thought, that from the extent of the island of Great Britain, and the number of points which required to be defended, making every allowance for the co-operation of the navy, this powerful island ought to be able to put under arms, at the commencement of a war, for the purpose of defence, 100,000 men. He thought also, that we ought to be able, at such a moment, to lay our hands on 70,000 militia. In the northern part of the island, it was his intention to propose, that there should be a militia of from 10,000 to 12,000 men. It would be observed, that Scotland had, till of late years, produced no militia, though she had sent forth many hardy and excellent soldiers. It became a question, whether it would be most advisable to enrol the whole of the 60,000 men, of which it was proposed the militia should consist in England, at once, or to enrol only a part, and to enable his majesty to enrol the remainder in the hour of danger. The greatest advantages would result to the country from thus having 70,000 men with arms in their hands, ready in the moment of danger; and the expense would be comparatively small; as, from the best calculation he could make, it would not amount to more than 230,000*l.* for the militia of England, including the whole expense of officers and men. This expense, would, however, be lessened, if 40,000 men were raised in England, and 9,000 in Scotland; and his majesty was empowered to raise, by proclamation, the remaining 20,000 in England, and 3,000 in Scotland, making a communication of the circumstance to parliament. By these means, the militia would be much better filled up than it could possibly be by raising a great number on the emergency of the moment. With respect to the amendments that he intended to propose in the existing regulations, they would embrace the following objects: the powers of lieutenants—the specified quota—the mode of enrolment—substitutes—the organization of the regiments—the formation of the regimental staff—the training, exercising, and embodying of them. He should state the general outline. With respect to the powers of the lieutenants, they would remain the same. With respect to the specified quota, he proposed that one-third should be added to the number of those to be furnished by each county. He had endeavoured to procure accurate information from the returns made by the different counties of the relative proportion which ought to be furnished by each; but he had found those returns so inaccurate, as to be wholly useless for the purpose for which he wanted them. He should therefore propose, that the 40,000 men should be raised according to the old proportion for a limited time. The privy council would then be able to obtain correct and accurate returns, and might upon those data ascertain a quota which might remain for ten years: at the end of that period a new apportionment to take place. The House would see that this was only enforcing the original plan. With respect to the mode of enrolment, he intended to propose some material alterations. The first was, that no man should be enrolled without being examined by a surgeon: it was well known, that men were frequently enrolled who were actually unfit for service: there would be therefore a great saving, if, previous to enrolment, they were examined by the assistant surgeon of the regiment, or, if he was not near the spot, by some other surgeon of competent skill. The next regulation that he intended to propose was, that the men enrolled should be divided into classes; that in one class should be placed those who were unmarried, and under 30 years of age; in another, those who were married, but had no children; in another, those with one child: and so on; by this means, as all the classes need not be called out together, recourse might be had, in the first instance, to the youngest men, and those with the smallest families. With respect to substitutes, they should be taken from those who resided in the same county as those for whom they served. As to the organization of the regiments, each company should have a captain, and that field-officers should not have companies. With respect to the formation of the regimental staff, there should not be a paymaster to any corps which consisted of less than three companies; his object was, to prevent the great expense which arose, at present, from small corps having as large a staff as those consisting of much greater numbers. He also intended to propose, that there should not be a surgeon to any corps consisting of less than two companies, and that no person should be a surgeon to any corps of militia, until his skill had stood the test of an examination before competent judges; he proposed also, that they should be placed on the same footing as surgeons of infantry in the army. As to the non-commissioned officers, it was his intention to adhere to the 26th of his majesty, with respect to their number, being one serjeant and one corporal for every 30 men. But it was his intention to propose, that the serjeants, corporals, and drummers should be bound to reside near the place where the arms of the regiment were deposited; and that they should be under the care of the adjutant. It was intended that they should obtain a perfect knowledge of the exercise; by which means the men, when called out, would be easily taught, in the prescribed time during which they were to be out: whilst, if the serjeants and corporals were deficient in skill, when the men were called out to exercise, it was evident that a great delay must take place in the latter obtaining a knowledge of their exercise. He should propose also, that the pay of the serjeants, corporals, and drummers should be increased and made very near that of the same description of persons in the army: he should also propose, that if any non-commissioned officer was absent with the leave of his officer, he should receive his former rate of pay; if he was absent without leave, it would, of course, be forfeited. With respect to training and exercising, he intended to propose, that, instead of exercising two-thirds for 28 days, the whole should be exercised for 21 days. The expence of exercising the whole for 21 days, would be the same as exercising two-thirds for 28 days, and the former period would be sufficient for the purpose. When the supplementary militia were called out, 20 days was found sufficient to teach them their exercise, and in 21 days the militia would at least learn how to prime and load, and fire, and to march without falling down. As to the embodying, he proposed that the same power should be given to his majesty of sending the militia to any part of Great Britain as at present. It had been suggested that they might be suffered to go out of the kingdom, but he should not make any such proposition. He should confine himself to what had been before the practice, leaving the other consideration to the exigency of the moment. He had every reason to believe, that our brethren in the northern part of the kingdom were now perfectly satisfied with the mode of raising the militia, and that they would most readily, whenever called upon for that purpose, march to any part of Great Britain. He wished, however, to propose, that in case his majesty should not think it necessary to embody the whole, he should be empowered to call out any part of the militia, and to distribute them as he should think necessary. He had stated, that it was proposed to augment the militia of England to 60,000, and that of Scotland to 12,000, making altogether 72,000. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill, "to amend the laws relating to the Militia in England, and for augmenting the Militia."

Mr. Sheridan said:—I return the right hon. gentleman my thanks for the laudable pains he has taken in this business, and entirely concur in the greatest part of what he has proposed. It will, no doubt, be pleasing to behold every possible reduction made which circumstances will admit of; but great attention must be paid to our position, now that we are under the painful necessity of measuring the greatly augmented strength of our formidable rival. When I reflect on the late important accession to the power of our neighbour, divesting myself of any thing suspicious or mistrustful, I cannot but rejoice in the representation made us by the right hon. gentleman, of the present state of the militia; for I could not have viewed, without regret, the incroachment which, from time to time, threatened to destroy that most excellent system of defence. I entirely approve of the plan for consolidating the laws; and when it shall once be established, I hope it will not be broken in upon, as it has been during this war, for momentary expedition; and that gentlemen who have spent their lives in training, forming, and acquiring the love and attachment of their men, may not find themselves, on a sudden turned into drill-serjeants.

Leave was given. The bill was afterwards brought in, and passed without opposition.

Debate in the Commons on the Bank Restriction Continuance Bill.] April 9. Mr. Chancellor Addington said:—Sir, I rise to move for leave to bring in a bill to continue, for a time to be limited, the Restrictions on Payments in Cash by the Bank of England. I am aware, that it is impossible to submit, without explanation, a motion which is to have the effect of imposing any restraint with regard to the ordinary functions of such an establishment as the Bank; but I am convinced, that the measure cannot furnish a pretence to the most timid man in the House, to suppose the Bank does not possess within itself the most ample means of satisfying the full extent of the demands which may be made upon it, by the payment of its notes in specie. Sir, I was asked on a former day, whether I had any intention of moving for a preliminary inquiry; I said I had not; and the ground upon which I so said was, that I did not conceive the measure I had to propose was one which called for such a proceeding. In 1797, when this House was called upon to confirm the order of council imposing a restriction on the payments of the Bank, a committee was appointed for purposes far different from what are rendered necessary by the present shape in which the measure is brought forward. The object of that committee was to inquire into the solvency of the Bank, and into the existence and causes of the necessity which had produced the order of council; but the grounds on which I rest the present proposition are notorious. It cannot be necessary for me to inform the House, that the rate of exchange between this country and foreign parts is disadvantageous to ourselves—that the export trade has been for some months at a stand, that while the rate of exchange is disadvantageous to us, an augmentation of the circulating cash would create a trade highly injurious to the commerce of this country. For several months past there has been a trade carrying on for purchase of guineas with a view to exportation. It is on these grounds, that I submit to the House the expediency of continuing the restriction with regard to the cash payments of the Bank. There is another consideration that presses strongly on my mind. It is, that the entire command which we have experienced for some time past over all foreign markets, cannot be expected to continue in the same degree. Competition must exist; and it is important that, at the period of commencing that competition, every facility should be given to the merchants of this country. By continuing the restriction on the Bank for some time longer, the accommodation afforded to merchants by the Bank, with respect to discount, will be continued. In addition to these reasons the House will reflect upon the inconvenience which would unavoidably result from letting loose such a proportion of the coin of the country as would be circulated by taking off the restriction. I am not aware of any inconvenience that can possibly arise from continuing it. During three or four years of difficulty, the credit of the Bank has undergone no diminution. Bank notes have been every where received cheerfully and readily; and there are two circumstances on which the House will be disposed to lay particular stress: at the time when it was thought expedient to increase the circulating medium, and the Bank were allowed by act of parliament to call in the notes of 1*l.* and 2*l.* and pay them in specie, notes to the amount of 800,000*l.* were called in, and the individuals holding them were entitled to payment in cash; but of that sum, upwards of 400,000*l.* was received in paper in preference to money. A similar proof was given last year of the confidence reposed by the public in the credit and stability of the Bank. I am entitled from these two circumstances to state, that there can be no just cause to doubt the credit of the Bank; and that to continue the restriction will rather have a tendency to raise, than to depress it. I know that there is a diversity of opinion with respect to the mode in which the Bank ought to be permitted to renew its money payments. Some are desirous that the Bank should pay in cash for notes of small denomination; but till there is an abundant supply of cash by opening the Bank entirely, it is extremely convenient to afford circulation to 1*l.* and 2*l.* notes; by the payment of them in specie, a general anxiety would be introduced of obtaining cash at the Bank: notes of 1000*l.* and 500*l.* would be changed for notes of 1*l.* and 2*l.* in order that they might be immediately changed again for cash. If a restraint was to be imposed with respect to the number of notes of small denomination, they would be driven out of circulation altogether; and there would be no small notes but those issued by bankers. I would ask the House, whether it would be convenient to have such notes only through the medium of country bankers? I mean not to throw the slightest discredit on that class, but only to infer, that it would not be an act of prudence for the House to withhold from the Bank the right of issuing small notes, in order that it might be exclusively enjoyed by country bankers. It is not necessary for me to go more at large into the grounds of the measure I propose. It will be prudent to wait till we are enabled to judge of the effects of the peace—till our commercial relations are formed on the continent—till we know what are the political and commercial relations in which different countries stand with reference to each other, before we take a step, which, if it should turn out to be hastily taken, would be productive of inconvenience. I therefore, Sir, conclude by moving, "That the different acts of parliament by which that restriction had been enforced from time to time, for the last four years, be read." Which being done pro formâ, he moved, "That leave be given to bring in a bill to continue, for a time to be limited, the Restrictions contained in the said acts, on the Payment in Cash by the Bank."

Mr. Jones said, it was now five years since this measure was first adopted, and whatever reason there might have been at that period for sanctioning it, no reason was shown now for prolonging it. The very mention of it was a word of terror. He knew the effect it would have on the whole kingdom; Englishmen had feelings, and preferred the king's picture to assignats. Guineas ought to supersede the necessity of that kind of necromancy, a paper currency. He did not suppose that the Bank was unable to meet the claims upon it; but if the Bank was solvent, he desired some other reasons than those urged by the chancellor of the exchequer. If no other reasons were urged, he must conclude, that there existed some mystery in the matter, which ministers either could not or would not disclose. When he was desirous, some time ago, of ascertaining what were the profits of the directors, he was told they had none; how that could be reconciled with the triumphal accounts of their increasing wealth as a corporate body, was a solecism that he could by no means reconcile to his understanding. He could not bear to hear these inconsistencies without entertaining suspicions. Since this restriction had taken place, the forgeries of bank-notes had increased to such an alarming extent, as to require no less than seventy clerks to be employed in merely detecting them; and, within this very year, between thirty and forty persons had been executed for the crime. If this forging trade was therefore to be created, or rather extended by this law, he had more than a volume of argument against it. But it had become fashionable to call this paper currency "a circulating medium," the ingenious and wise substitute for current coin. He desired any person acquainted with the circumstances of the day, to reflect what must be the effect of this circulating medium. By the extent of its forgeries, no individual would be safe in negotiating with the Bank, if out of 20 or 30 two or one pound notes, three or four happened to be counterfeit. If the holder carried them to the Bank, there he would obtain no redress. Foreigners, as well as Englishmen, were hurt at this shutting of the Bank, and the injury it would occasion to the confidence between merchants was not to be calculated. It was a measure fraught with infinite ill. The swarm of country banks, which, like locusts, spread all over the kingdom, to the number of 458, were fit subject for taxation.

Sir R. Peel said, that in addition to the circumstance of foreign relations, which the hon. gentleman stated to be the sole reason why the Bank should withhold the payment of her specie just now, there were other causes which powerfully proved the necessity of it. The course of exchange was at this moment against us all over Europe. Again, since the war commenced, the trade of the country had increased threefold, and no resource of art or nature could equalize our bullion with it. The wealth of the nation he might estimate at 300 millions; and there was no possibility, as indeed there was no necessity, for having a cash currency to an equal amount; besides the impossibility there would also be the inconvenience, and the loss attending, whilst, as is the case at present, foreign gold is of so much more value than British. Upon the fullest consideration of the subject, seeing that no injury was done to the community, that none was heard of, that no petitions had appeared against it, that the credit of the Bank, instead of being diminished, had increased, he must support the motion. It was the continuation of a measure wisely and well imagined, and executed by the late administration.

General Gascoyne, in defence of the measure, stated that, so far from its having a tendency to shake the credit of the Bank, it increased and protected it; in Liverpool, bank paper was preferred to cash, and its small notes taken there rather than specie. When the country banks in Lancaster had failed for about two millions of money, the public in that quarter naturally looked to the Bank of England, and their confidence had not only not been abused, but had become so great, that in exchanging a Bank of England note of 100*l.* 200*l.* or 500*l.* when the question was put, whether the party would have cash or small notes, they generally preferred the latter; and to such an extent had this confidence prevailed, that there was not now a country bank within forty miles of that town.

Dr. Laurence said, the hon. gentleman had brought it forward as an argument against this measure, that several persons had forfeited their lives for forging Bank-notes; but had they never heard of persons being hanged for counterfeiting the coin of the kingdom? The argument was the same in one case as in the other. He confessed he could not agree altogether with the argument used by the hon. baronet, as he thought it went beyond the intention of the present measure. The restriction did not affect the credit of the Bank; but was imposed to prevent the injurious consequences of a general alarm, and to provide against the possibility of any failure in the immediate resources of the Bank, to answer the extraordinary demands in consequence of that alarm. The restriction arose from parliament, and not from the Bank. The question was, whether this restriction ought now to be continued? The argument of the hon. baronet, that the trading interest of the country required an extensive paper circulation, would go to an unlimited continuance of this restriction. To this he could never agree; but when it was considered, that our export trade during the interval between the preliminary and the definitive treaty had been unfavourable, and that foreigners possessed large sums of money in this country, together with other circumstances, it would be rash to take off the restriction at the present moment. He wished, however, that they should reserve to themselves the power of taking off the restriction from time to time as circumstances might arise to justify such a measure.

Mr. Tierney said, that notwithstanding all he had heard, his original opinion remained unaltered. He would, however, now confine his objections to the mode of renewing the restriction; being satisfied that, though the restriction itself was an evil, it was an evil not suddenly to be remedied. Though he thought the renewal of cash payments extremely desirable, he was averse to precipitating it; and he would continue the restriction as likely to be attended with less mischief. But he was extremely unwilling that it should be continued without a committee, to inquire into the causes which rendered such a measure necessary, and to record them on the Journals, for the satisfaction of the House and the country. He agreed with the learned doctor, that the state of the exchange was a bad rule to go by, as it was liable to much abuse. It was what some gentlemen called the substantial trade of the country, but what he called mere speculation. He would allow the restriction to continue in force until six weeks after the commencement of the next session; but in the mean time, he wished to give the Bank a power to be used at its discretion, if a favourable change of circumstances should occur in the course of the summer, to open the payment in part, and put the country, as far as might be, on its proper footing. If any other war should arise, the country would lament the day when the restriction was imposed. He would not say that the credit of the Bank was impaired by it; but it had introduced a present vice into our money dealings, and would hereafter be attended with much evil.

Mr. Manning, in answer to the suggestion, that there ought to be a committee of inquiry now as well as at the time when the restriction was first laid on, observed, that there was this material difference between the cases; the restriction now moved for was only to have effect for a few months; whereas that originally imposed in 1797, was for the whole duration of the war, had it lasted half a century. As to the forgeries on the Bank, he utterly denied that they were to the extent represented.

Mr. Boyd wished to see an account of the state of the debts of the Bank, and its assets. These could be productive of no inconvenience to that body. It was a question, whether the restriction of cash payments had not increased the circulating medium more than was first intended, but whatever his private opinion might be, he would not now oppose the measure.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

April 21. The bill being committed, Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he should now state the grounds on which he should propose to fill up the blanks, specifying the duration of this bill and the continuance of the restriction, with "the 1st of March, 1803." It was stated by him the other day, that, from the new situation in which this country would be placed on the return of peace, it was advisable that the restriction of the money payments of the Bank should continue. It was not in consequence of any doubt or apprehension, or even reluctance of the Bank, but solely on the ground of political expediency, arising out of the situation of this country, with reference to its export trade, the course of exchange, and the commercial relations of foreign nations to each other, that this measure was proposed. On the solidity of the Bank, there was now no question. On the disposition of the Bank to pay in specie, he was also entitled to entertain no doubt, since the Bank had manifested a readiness to do so. It was, however, thought necessary to continue this restriction for a while. As to the necessity of inquiring into the causes of such necessity, and of its being founded on the report of a committee, he had to observe, that, upon the inconvenience of such a course of proceeding, much might be said; but besides the inconvenience, he doubted the practicability of that course; for if a committee were appointed, it would embrace such a train of examination as could not be gone over in any reasonable time. The only point upon which there appeared to be a question was, the duration of the measure; and this he thought should be governed by the probable end of the causes which produced it. Our export trade had been long, as it were, at a stand; we might entertain a reasonable expectation that in a short time it would find its proper channel; so that afterwards we might feel the effect of an advantageous export trade, the full advantages of which, however, we could not expect for ten or twelve months. Nor could we, in much less time, expect to have the full benefit of those other changes which he looked for in the course of exchange, &c. nor could those commercial relations of foreign states properly find their level in a much shorter time; so that, under all the circumstances, it did not appear to him unwise to adopt that time for the continuance of the restriction. He wished it to be understood, that this restriction was continued on the ground of political expediency, a measure judged of by the House of Commons, not by the Bank of England. Viewing this as a political measure, he would say it was fit that the House should determine how long this restriction should continue, and not put it in the power of the Bank to resume its money payments at its own will, and without any legislative limitation. He had nothing more to do at present than to propose that this blank be filled up with the words, "the 1st day of March 1803."

Mr. Tierney said, that for the sake of appearances, if for nothing else, it was necessary that the Bank should resume its payments as soon as possible. The chancellor of the exchequer had argued, that this was entirely a measure of a political nature: he could not, however, admire this policy. The two former committees had judged it expedient; but it was agreed that it ought to cease a month after the conclusion of peace. A month had now elapsed, and it was moved still to continue the restriction, without a single substantial reason assigned. He wished the right hon. gentleman would show how the restriction on the Bank would operate as a remedy for the dangers apprehended, or how it would not rather have a contrary effect. It appeared strange, that peace and war were equally an argument for continuing the restriction. Inconveniences might arise from suddenly resuming cash payments; but much more was to be dreaded from the minister thus interfering with the usual payments of the Bank, especially in such a peremptory manner. He contended, that the operation of the exchange would be felt sooner than March. He did not mean even to give the slightest hint against the credit of the Bank, or the wisdom of those who conducted it; but he wished, for the sake of our credit, that its payments should be resumed as quickly as possible. Some might privately think it desirable that the Bank should never commence its payments again; but no Englishman would venture publicly to express such a wish. He therefore thought a clause should be introduced into the bill, to give the directors a discretionary power of resuming cash payments.

The motion was agreed to. The bill passed its other stages without opposition.

Debate in the Commons on the Imports and Exports Duties Bill.] April 27. On the order of the day for going into a committee of the whole House, upon the bill "for granting to his majesty certain duties on goods imported or exported, and on tonnage of ships and vessels,"

General Gascoyne objected to the continuance of these duties, as a system of impost which would be productive of serious consequences to the trade of this country. In the first instance, the duties under this bill, oppressive as they would be to Great Britain, would be still more so when it was known that they were not to extend to Ireland, as the Irish merchant would have a bonus decidedly superior to the English one. Why an exemption so partial should take place, he was at a loss to conceive; but certainly it was one not stipulated for under the act of union, nor was it one which could be nominally or virtually deduced from that act; but the immediate consequence of it would be, to enable the Irish merchant considerably to undersell the English one; for, under its operation, a merchant at Cork would be able to undersell a merchant in London, in the article of coffee alone, 8s. in the hundred weight. The shipping trade of England stood in need of protection and encouragement; but, under this act, it would be depressed. At this moment there were four foreign for one British vessel employed in the imports and exports of this country; and from this circumstance, a mischief against which we should most cautiously guard, and which had obtained through the war, would by this act be considerably promoted; namely, the increase and improvement of foreign seamen, by their being employed in the trade of this country. There were many articles of considerable import and consumption in this country, the imposts on which under this bill would be greater than the freight; the article of tallow, for instance: on the other hand, there were many articles of export which would be materially damped by this impost; and one in particular, namely, rock salt. This trade would be most considerably injured by the bill; and of the shipping belonging to Liverpool, thirty out of every hundred were now lying idle. Surely it would have been but decorous to the mercantile interests to have gone into a committee for the purpose of inquiring into the state of British shipping before a measure of such magnitude was perpetuated. Upon the shipping trade of this country it would operate as a double impost; for it would not only fall upon their tonnage in imports and exports, but upon the importation of the raw materials of which they are made. Now that war had ceased, and we were once more to enter into commercial emulation with the other nations of Europe, surely our trade should not be shackled with imposts that it was so ill able to bear!

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that no principle could be more just than that those who had gained by the burthens of the nation, should also bear a proportion of them; and it could not be denied, that the commercial world had been gainers by the war. So great security had been given to trade during the war, that only a moderate insurance was required; and the convoy duty became at last a direct tax on trade, and it was cheerfully borne. The question then was, whether circumstances had so changed as to render it expedient to remove this tax? If such a change could not be proved to have taken place, it was surely improper to take it off when so great an expenditure was to be provided for. No objection had formerly been made to this tax, when imposed during the war in the shape of convoy duty: no objection could be made to it, as, during its operation, trade, instead of declining, had wonderfully increased. From the returns made last session, it appeared, that, on an average of six years preceding 1793, our imports had amounted to 190,000,000*l.* per annum; whereas in 1801 they amounted to 240,000,000*l.* Our exports taken at the same periods had increased from 6 to 17,000,000*l.*; the increase in number of our ships amounted to 2,798, and the increase of tonnage to 365,000. During this increase, the present tax operated, and yet it still continued up to 1801. It then remained to be considered, whether our export and import trade was likely to be diminished by this duty. Different opinions might be entertained about the future state of our trade; but, for his own part, he was convinced that the footing gained by the commerce of Great Britain was so solid, that it could not fail to maintain its ground for a long course of years. The indisputable superiority of our manufactures, the greatness of our capital, the credit we gave, and the good faith we observed, must prevent any power in the universe from entering into a competition with us. With regard to that nation to which our jealousies and apprehensions were particularly directed, the difficulty lately experienced to procure ships for a most important expedition, was a proof that she could not, for many years to come, enter into a competition with us.—But the hon. gentleman expressed great dissatisfaction on account of the indulgencies shown to Ireland; and thought that this exemption in favour of Ireland would operate to the disadvantage of Great Britain. But there was a great dissimilarity between the two countries at present. Would to God they were both alike! he hoped the time was approaching when there would be an end of that dissimilarity. There was, however, a circumstance to which he would call the attention of the House. He meant the state of the linen trade; and, as Ireland was not charged with import duties on the raw material, he thought it due to the manufacturers of Great Britain, that they should experience a similar advantage; but he would call on the hon. gentleman to say, whether Ireland had any material advantage beyond its due proportion? In the export of linen, flax, &c. the regulation which was applied to Ireland, was applied also to Great Britain. He was, indeed, unable to state a manufacture, or branch of trade, in which Ireland was benefited in any considerable degree to the disadvantage of Great Britain. The hon. gentleman said, the measure was an instance of unusual partiality; that this tax had continued, and was to be made to continue on Great Britain, while Ireland was free from it. But let not the hon. gentleman imagine it was intended at all events, and under all possible circumstances, to continue this duty exclusively on the trade of Great Britain. He wished the measure to be considered as a measure of experiment. If, upon trial, it should be found injurious to the trade of Great Britain, he would say, let it be abandoned altogether. If, on the contrary, it should be found beneficial, and if the trade of Ireland should increase, as he confidently trusted it would, then it would be proper, in his opinion, to try the same experiment on the trade of Ireland. He would therefore say, that this measure was an experimental measure, both to Great Britain and to Ireland:—experimental to Great Britain, as applying to its trade now, and at the same time waiting for that increase in the trade of Ireland, when it might be made applicable to that country. If Ireland continued as it was, then he should not think it proper to apply this measure to its trade; but if it advanced in trade, and approached to that of Great Britain, it ought to participate in the burthens necessarily imposed on that of Great Britain.—The hon. gentleman said, that there now was, and for some time had been a considerable disproportion of foreign instead of British ships employed in our trade. That was perfectly true, and it arose from this cause—the trade of this country had increased with such rapidity that it was impossible to supply its demands without calling in the aid of foreign ships; but did it follow from thence that British shipping was not to find employment? Did it follow, because, during the war, the extent of our trade was such that our own shipping was not enough for it, that therefore the trade would be carried on in foreign ships in preference to ours? By no means; nor was the fact of our having employed foreign shipping at all discouraging; on the contrary, it proved the vast increase of our trade. So that, instead of the comment of the hon. gentleman, that our shipping would decline, he thought it was good ground of confidence in an increasing trade, and still greater prosperity. The hon. gentleman had lamented the present stagnation in our export trade. This he admitted: from causes that were onerous to us, there certainly had been of late a stagnation in several parts of that trade; but it was to be remembered that, during the negotiation, our merchants followed a circuitous route, which occasioned much of this inconvenience, and they were under the necessity of doing so; but this afforded a good reason for apprehending that, as the course was now different, the effect would be different also.—He would not now state the terms on which relief was intended to be afforded to our merchants in respect to the operation of this duty, because that belonged properly to the committee; but he thought the regulations could not fail to be satisfactory. What he wished to be kept constantly in view was, that this was an experimental measure; and as far as the subjects of imports and exports were concerned, the House would recollect that notice had been already given of a measure to be proposed in the next session for consolidating the duties of customs, and then every article might again become the subject of discussion.

Sir R. Peel said, that the measure might be injurious in a way that was not immediately obvious. It would be recollected, that our commerce had flourished and been carried to a vast extent during the war, when it encountered no competition: a change had now taken place; a considerable debt had been incurred in consequence of that war, which necessarily imposed an additional expense on every article of manufacture, which must be charged upon the purchaser. We could now meet our competitors in foreign markets on the grounds of merit and cheapness only; and if the consumer could meet with cheaper articles he would, very probably prefer them. He trusted the House would consider well before they sanctioned a measure, the operation of which might be injurious to our own foreign trade. It had been observed, that the course of exchange was against us; and it could not be otherwise, unless we could send our goods at a cheaper rate to foreign markets. With respect to the convoy duty, he had highly approved of it at the time when it was imposed, but he did conceive that it would cease at the end of the war, and that other duties, if necessary, would then be imposed, more suitable to the circumstances of the country. His principal objection, however, was to the partial operation of the tax. It had been formerly laid down as a principle, that the advantages given to the manufactures of Ireland should be equally extended to those of this country. Some of the manufactures of Ireland had been nursed with peculiar care: the linen manufacture had thrown this country out of all competition, and the cotton manufacture of that country seemed likely to rival the article manufactured in Great Britain. He lamented that the right hon. gentleman who had framed the union had not been able to render that measure so complete as he wished, in consequence of circumstances which he could not control. Ireland possessed, however, at present, advantages which this country did not; and he thought there was a sufficient reason why the burdens of this country should also be burdens on that. A considerable injury might otherwise arise; and Ireland, having the advantages which she possessed, had no right to complain. He would venture to say, that 1,000l. employed in Ireland in the export trade, would produce greater returns than the same sum employed in the same way in this country. He was much mistaken if the present measure did not trench upon the 6th article of the Union. He did not deny that it might have been an object to better the condition of Ireland; but it certainly never could have been in contemplation to place England in a worse situation than it was before. There were reasons why the convoy duty should not extend to Ireland at the time it was imposed, as that country was then labouring under domestic troubles, and incapable of commercial exertion; but he trusted the House would maturely reflect before they sanctioned the present measure.

Mr. Corry said, that the trade of this country having flourished under the operation of this tax, he thought there was no ground of apprehension, that it would now suffer by its continuation. With regard to Ireland, he wished to say a few words on what was called the colony compact. By that act Great Britain granted to Ireland the privilege of trading to her colonies under certain conditions, which Ireland accepted. But, whatever that compact was, he contended that it was merged in the act of Union, by which there was a complete junction of the sovereignties of the two countries. The parliament of Ireland then became completely united with that of this country, and entered into a co-enjoyment and became jointly possessed of the sovereignty of these colonies. They were therefore no longer bound by the compact which the two parties had entered into, as, those two parties having become one, their rights were necessarily the same; and he trusted that it was impossible to give any interpretation to the act of Union, that would not admit the rights of Ireland to trade to the British colonies. The hon. baronet had referred to an article of the Union relative to the equal rights of both parties; but the article referred to, related wholly to the rights of trade; the present measure was a subject of taxation which was totally and entirely different. Let the article of the Union respecting taxation be referred to. What was the import of that article? It was to be lamented that the union between the two countries could not be entirely completed; but it unfortunately happened that their exchequers remained distinct, and consequently the taxation of the two countries. Ireland was neither able to bear the burdens of this country, nor was she called upon to do it. It was for the judgment of the House to decide in what manner taxes should be imposed; but that it was necessary to extend the present tax to Ireland, he wholly denied; that it was expedient he could not allow.

Lord Sheffield said, that these duties, if laid only on this country, must operate as a bounty in favour of the shipping and manufactures of Ireland, and in disfavour of those of Great Britain. It had been urged that Scotland at the time of the union and since, had been indulged with particular exemptions; but they related only to internal consumption, and arose from the inferiority of climate. The exemptions now proposed affected external commerce, and went infinitely beyond what seemed to be intended. We were told that Ireland was not to be taxed in the same proportion as Great Britain, to which he entirely agreed; but taxes which operated as regulations or checks to external commerce, must be the same in both countries, otherwise the union might prove a ruinous bargain to Great Britain. The convoy tax could not be compared to that now proposed. It was only intended to exist during the war, when the trade of the world passed through this country, and no other shipping was safe. The case was now widely different; a great proportion of our shipping and seamen were discharged, and there never was a moment when it was more necessary to encourage them. He deeply regretted the dereliction which on so many occasions, took place in respect to that navigation system which had been the foundation of our safety, power, and commerce. He could not approve of the bill as an experimental measure; he was sure it would prove the worst of precedents.

Lord Castlereagh said, that this might be considered either as a measure of commercial regulation, or of taxation. It would be recollected, that the system alluded to by the hon. baronet would only last twenty years; but, not to go so far as that period, there was no necessity for making any distinction between the two countries, so far as this could be considered as a commercial regulation. He could not see, however, that it was necessary to extend this tax to Ireland. Great Britain found it expedient, in consequence of the expenses incurred by the late war, to have recourse to a certain tax; and the chancellor of the exchequer chose that which he considered as the least productive of evil. But if the burdens of Ireland were not co-extensive with those of Great Britain, it was not just to call upon Ireland to adopt the same system of taxation. Ireland ought not to be called upon to contribute to the tax, if she could raise the supplies in a mode more convenient to herself. One great objection to the extension of this tax to Ireland was, that it would be inoperative. The duty would not apply to the trade between Great Britain and Ireland, but only to the foreign trade of Ireland, which was not above a ninth or tenth of the foreign trade of Great Britain. It would be in the power of the House to extend the tax to Ireland whenever they thought it expedient.

Mr. Dent said, it was true, the merchants had paid this tax cheerfully, but it was from a full understanding that it would be taken off upon the conclusion of peace. When the House were about to lay such a burthen upon our commerce, they ought to consider, that most of our manufactures were forbidden in France; and information had recently been received, that a ship laden with British manufactures had lately been obliged to leave one of the French ports. He believed, that France had suffered so much by the commercial treaty of 1786, that she was not willing to make another commercial treaty.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that it would have been impossible to have renewed with France the old commercial treaty that subsisted before the war. The many regulations which had been imposed in this country, particularly with regard to wine, must render it impossible that that treaty could be renewed in the same form. Besides, there were other objections to it of a decisive nature. That treaty could not be renewed without our giving up a system which he hoped never would be abandoned, he meant the alien laws. Another consequence of our renewing that treaty would be, that we must acknowledge the principles of the armed neutrality, at least as far as related to France. It was true, that our giving up that principle with regard to France was no reason for giving it up to other countries. Yet after the confederacy which had been formed against us this war, and the principles asserted by the powers composing that confederacy, he was of opinion that we ought to adhere to our old principles, and not to concede it to any power whatever.

Dr. Laurence said, that the arguments which had been advanced to show, that Ireland ought to be exempted from this tax, appeared to him by no means conclusive; because this could not be considered merely as a measure of taxation; it certainly was a commercial regulation. He then entered into an examination of the effect which this tax would have upon our own trade, and contended that, in many instances, it would operate most disadvantageously. The tax would be more severely felt in this country, because there would be no such tax in other countries, and consequently it would add to the difficulties we should have to contend with before we could meet our rivals in foreign markets.

Mr. Wilberforce said, it was undoubtedly true, that during the war the shipping of this country had been very considerably increased; but it should be recollected, that the war furnished employment for a great number of ships, particularly for the transport service, and consequently enabled the owners to bear this tax much better than they could in a time of peace. He was unwilling to propose any general deduction from the amount of the tax; but he wished to propose to reduce the duty in some cases, and to increase it in others, so as to make the produce the same.

The House then went into the Committee.

Copy of the Definitive Treaty of Peace.]

April 29. Lord Hawkesbury presented, by his Majesty's command, the following Copy of the DEFINITIVE TREATY OF PEACE between his Britannic Majesty and the French Republic, his Catholic Majesty, the Batavian Republic; Signed at Amiens the 27th Day of March 1802.

His majesty the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the first consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, being animated with an equal desire to put an end to the calamities of war, have laid the foundation of peace in the preliminary articles signed at London the 1st of October 1801 (ninth Vendémiaire, year ten :) And as by the fifteenth article of the said preliminaries it has been stipulated that plenipotentiaries should be named on each side, who should proceed to Amiens for the purpose of concluding a definitive treaty, in concert with the allies of the contracting powers: his majesty the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland has named for his plenipotentiary the marquis Cornwallis, knight of the most illustrious order of the Garter, privy counsellor to his majesty, general of his armies, &c.; the first consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, the citizen Joseph Buonaparté, counsellor of state; his majesty the king of Spain and of the Indies, and the government of the Batavian republic, have named for their plenipotentiaries, viz. his Catholic majesty, Don Joseph Nicolas de Azara, his counsellor of state, knight Great Cross of the order of Charles 3rd, his said majesty's ambassador extraordinary to the French republic, &c.; and the government of the Batavian republic, Roger John Schimmelpenninck, their ambassador extraordinary to the French republic; who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers, which are transcribed at the end of the present treaty, have agreed upon the following Articles:—

ART. 1. There shall be peace, friendship, and good understanding, between his majesty the king of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, his heirs and successors, on the one part; and the French republic his majesty the king of Spain, his heirs and successors, and the Batavian republic, on the other part. The contracting parties shall give the greatest attention to maintain, between themselves and their states, a perfect harmony, and without allowing on either side any kind of hostilities, by sea or by land, to be committed for any cause, or under any pretence whatsoever. They shall carefully avoid every thing which might hereafter affect the union happily re-established, and they shall not afford any assistance or protection, directly or indirectly, to those who should cause prejudice to any of them.

ART. 2. All the prisoners taken on either side, as well by land as by sea, and the hostages carried away or given during the war, and to this day, shall be restored without ransom in six weeks at latest, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, and on paying the debts which they have contracted during their captivity. Each contracting party shall respectively discharge the advances which have been made by any of the contracting parties for the subsistence and maintenance of the prisoners in the country where they have been detained. For this purpose a commission shall be appointed by agreement, which shall be specially charged to ascertain and regulate the compensation which may be due to either of the contracting powers. The time and place where the commissioners, who shall be charged with the execution of this article, shall assemble, shall also be fixed upon by agreement; and the said commissioners shall take into account the expenses occasioned, not only by the prisoners of the respective nations, but also by the foreign troops, who, before they were made prisoners, were in the pay, or at the disposal, of any of the contracting parties.

ART. 3. His Britannic majesty restores to the French republic and her allies, namely, his Catholic majesty and the Batavian republic, all the possessions and colonies which belonged to them respectively, and which had been occupied or conquered by the British forces in the course of the war, with the exception of the island of Trinidad, and the Dutch possessions in the island of Ceylon.

ART. 4. His Catholic majesty cedes and guarantees, in full right and sovereignty, to his Britannic majesty, the island of Trinidad.

ART. 5. The Batavian republic cedes and guarantees, in full right and sovereignty, to his Britannic majesty, all the possessions and establishments in the island of Ceylon, which belonged before the war, to the republic of the United Provinces, or to their East India company.

ART. 6. The Cape of Good Hope remains in full sovereignty to the Batavian republic, as it was before the war. The ships of every description belonging to the other contracting parties, shall have the right to put in there and to purchase such supplies as they may stand in need of as heretofore without paying any other duties than those to which the ships of the Batavian republic are subjected.

ART. 7. The territories and possessions of her most faithful majesty are maintained in their integrity, such as they were previous to the commencement of the war. Nevertheless, the limits of French and Portuguese Guiana shall be determined by the river Arawari, which falls into the ocean below the North Cape, near the isle Neuve and the island of Penitence, about a degree and one third of north latitude. These limits shall follow the course of the river Arawari, from that of its mouths which is at the greatest distance from the North Cape to its source, and thence in a direct line from its source to the river Branco towards the West. The northern bank of the river Arawari, from its mouth to its source, and the lands which are situated to the north of the line of the limits above fixed, shall consequently belong in full sovereignty to the French republic. The southern bank of the said river from its source, and all the lands to the southward of the said line of demarkation, shall belong to her most faithful majesty. The navigation of the river Arawari shall be common to both nations. The arrangements which have taken place between the courts of Madrid and of Lisbon, for the settlement of their frontiers in Europe, shall, however, be executed conformably to the treaty of Badajoz.

ART. 8. The territories, possessions, and rights of the Ottoman Porte, are hereby maintained in their integrity, such as they were previous to the war.

ART. 9. The republic of the Seven Islands is hereby acknowledged.

ART. 10. The islands of Malta, Gozo, and Comino, shall be restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, and shall be held by it upon the same conditions on which the order held them previous to the war, and under the following stipulations:

1. The knights of the order, whose langues shall continue to subsist after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, are invited to return to Malta as soon as that exchange shall have taken place. They shall there form a general chapter, and shall proceed to the election of a grand master, to be chosen from amongst the natives of those nations which preserve langues, if no such election shall have been already made since the exchange of the ratifications of the preliminary articles of peace. It is understood, that an election which shall have been made subsequent to that period, shall alone be considered as valid to the exclusion of every other which shall have taken place at any time previous to the said period.

2. The governments of Great Britain and of the French republic, being desirous of placing the order of St. John and the island of Malta in a state of entire independence on each of those powers, do agree that there shall be henceforth no English nor French langues, and that no individual belonging to either of the said powers shall be admissible into the order.

3. A Maltese langue shall be established, to be supported out of the land revenues and commercial duties of the island. There shall be dignities with appointments, and an Auberge appropriated to this langue. No proofs of nobility shall be necessary for the admission of knights into the said langue. They shall be competent to hold every office, and to enjoy every privilege, in the like manner as the knights of the other langues. The municipal, revenue, civil, judicial, and other offices under the government of the island, shall be filled at least in the proportion of one-half by native inhabitants of Malta, Gozo, and Comino.

4. The forces of his Britannic majesty shall evacuate the island and its dependencies within three months after the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if it can be done. At that period the island shall be delivered up to the order in the state in which it now is, provided that the grand master, or commissioners fully empowered, according to the statutes of the order, be upon the island to receive possession, and that the force to be furnished by his Sicilian majesty, as hereafter stipulated, be arrived there.

5. The garrison of the island shall, at all times, consist at least one half of native Maltese; and the order shall have the liberty of recruiting for the remainder of the garrison from the natives of those countries only that shall continue to possess Langues. The native Maltese troops shall be officered by Maltese; and the supreme command of the garrison, as well as the appointment of the officers shall be vested in the grand master of the order, and he shall not be at liberty to divest himself of it, even for a time, except in favour of a knight of the order, and in consequence of the opinion of the council of the order.

6. The independence of the islands of Malta, Gozo, and Comino, as well as the present arrangement, shall be under the protection and guarantee of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia.

7. The perpetual neutrality of the order, and of the island of Malta and its dependencies, is hereby declared.

8. The ports of Malta shall be open to the commerce and navigation of all nations who shall pay equal and moderate duties. These duties shall be applied to the support of the Maltese langue, in the manner specified in paragraph 3, to that of the civil and military establishments of the island, and to that of a Lazaretto open to all flags.

9. The Barbary states are excepted from the provisions of the two preceding paragraphs, until, by means of an arrangement to be made by the contracting parties, the system of hostility which subsists between the said Barbary states, the order of St. John, and the powers possessing langues, or taking part in the formation of them, shall be terminated.

10. The order shall be governed, both in spiritual and temporal matters by the same statutes that were in force at the time when the knights quitted the island, so far as the same shall not be derogated from by the present treaty.

11. The stipulations contained in paragraphs 3, 5, 7, 8, and 10, shall be converted into laws and perpetual statutes of the order, in the customary manner. And the grand master (or, if he should not be in the island at the time of its restitution to the order, his representative) as well as his successors, shall be bound to make oath to observe them punctually.

12. His Sicilian majesty shall be invited to furnish two thousand men, natives of his dominions, to serve as a garrison for the several fortresses upon the island. This force shall remain there for one year from the period of the restitution of the island to the knights; after the expiration of which term, if the order of St. John shall not, in the opinion of the guaranteeing powers, have raised a sufficient force to garrison the island and its dependencies, in the manner proposed in paragraph 5, the Neapolitan troops shall remain until they shall be relieved by another force judged to be sufficient by the said powers.

13. The several powers specified in paragraph 6, viz. Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia, shall be invited to accede to the present arrangement.

ART. 11. The French forces shall evacuate the kingdom of Naples, and the Roman territory. The English forces shall, in like manner, evacuate Porto Ferrajo, and generally all the ports and islands which they may occupy in the Mediterranean, or in the Adriatic.

ART. 12. The evacuations, cessions, and res-tutions, stipulated for by the present treaty, except where otherwise expressly provided for, shall take place in Europe within one month, in the continent and seas of America and of Africa within three months, and in the continent and seas of Asia within six months after the ratification of the present definitive treaty.

ART. 13. In all the cases of restitution agreed upon by the present treaty, the fortifications shall be delivered up in the state in which they may have been at the time of the signature of the preliminary treaty; and all the works which shall have been constructed since the occupation shall remain untouched.

It is farther agreed, that in all the cases of cession stipulated, there shall be allowed to the inhabitants, of whatever condition or nation they may be, a term of three years to be computed from the notification of this present treaty, for the purpose of disposing of their property acquired and possessed either before or during the war, in which term of three years they may have the free exercise of their religion and enjoyment of their property.

The same privilege is granted in the countries restored to all those, whether inhabitants or others, who shall have made therein any establishments whatsoever during the time when those countries were in the possession of Great Britain.

With respect to the inhabitants of the countries restored or ceded, it is agreed that none of them shall be prosecuted, disturbed or molested in their persons or properties, under any pretext, on account of their conduct or political opinions, or of their attachment to any of the contracting powers, nor on any other account, except that of debts contracted to individuals, or on account of acts posterior to the present treaty.

ART. 14. All sequestrations imposed by any of the parties on the funded property, revenues, or debts, of whatever description, belonging to any of the contracting powers, or to their subjects or citizens, shall be taken off immediately after the signature of this definitive treaty. The decision of all claims brought forward by individuals, the subjects or citizens of any of the contracting powers respectively, against individuals subjects or citizens of any of the others, for rights, debts, property, or effects whatsoever, which, according to received usages, and the law of nations, ought to revive at the period of peace, shall be heard and decided before competent tribunals; and in all cases prompt and ample justice shall be administered in the countries where the claims are made.

ART. 15. The fisheries on the coast of Newfoundland, and of the adjacent islands, and of the gulph of St. Lawrence, are replaced on the same footing on which they were previous to the war. The French fishermen, and the inhabitants of St. Pierre, and Miquelon, shall have the privilege of cutting such wood as they may stand in need of, in the bays of Fortune and Despair, for the space of one year from the date of the notification of the present treaty.

ART. 16. In order to prevent all causes of complaint and dispute which may arise on account of prizes which may have been made at sea, after the signature of the preliminary articles, it is reciprocally agreed that the vessels and effects which may have been taken in the British channel, and in the North sea, after the space of twelve days, to be computed from the exchange of the ratifications of the said preliminary articles, shall be restored on each side; that the term shall be one month from the British channel and the North seas, as far as the Canary islands, inclusively, whether in the ocean or in the mediterranean; two months from the said Canary islands as far as the equator; and lastly, five months in all other parts of the world, without any exception, or any more particular description of time or place.

ART. 17. The ambassadors, ministers, and other agents of the contracting powers shall enjoy respectively in the states of the said powers, the same rank, privileges, prerogatives, and immunities, which public agents of the same class enjoyed previous to the war.

ART. 18. The branch of the house of Nassau, which was established in the republic, formerly called the republic of the United provinces, and now the Batavian republic, having suffered losses there as well in private property as in consequence of the change of constitution adopted in that country, an adequate compensation shall be procured for the said branch of the House of Nassau for the said losses.

ART. 19. The present definitive treaty of peace is declared common to the sublime Ottoman Porte, the ally of his Britannic majesty, and the Sublime Porte shall be invited to transmit its act of accession thereto in the shortest delay possible.

ART. 20. It is agreed that the contracting parties shall, on requisitions made by them respectively, or by their ministers or persons or officers duly authorised to make the same, deliver up to justice persons accused of crimes of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, committed within the jurisdiction of the requiring party, provided that this shall be done only when the evidence of the criminality shall be so authenticated as that the laws of the country where the person so accused shall be found would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed. The expenses of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition. It is understood that this article does not regard in any manner crimes of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, committed antecedently to the conclusion of this definitive treaty.

ART. 21. The contracting parties promise to observe sincerely and bonâ fide all the articles contained in the present treaty; and they will not suffer the same to be infringed, directly or indirectly, by their respective subjects or citizens, and the said contracting parties generally and reciprocally guarantee to each other all the stipulations of the present treaty.

ART. 22. The present treaty shall be ratified by the contracting parties in thirty days, or sooner if possible, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in due form at Paris.

In witness whereof, we the underwritten plenipotentiaries, have signed with our hands, and in virtue of our respective full powers, the present definitive treaty, and have caused our respective seals to be affixed thereto. Done at Amiens, the 27th day of March, 1802, the sixth Germinal, year Ten of the French Republic.

Separate Article.—It is agreed, that the omission of some titles, which may have taken place in the present treaty, shall not be prejudicial to the powers or to the persons concerned.

It is farther agreed, that the English and French languages made use of in all the copies of the present treaty shall not form an example which may be alleged or quoted as a precedent, or in any manner prejudice the contracting powers whose languages have not been used; and that for the future what has been observed, and ought to be observed, with regard to, and on the part of powers who are in the practice and possession of giving and receiving copies of like treaties in any other language, shall be conformed with; the present treaty having, nevertheless, the same force and virtue as if the aforesaid practice had been therein observed.

In witness whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries of his Britannic majesty, of the French republic, of his Catholic majesty, and of the Batavian republic, have signed the present Separate Article, and have caused our respective seals to be affixed thereto. Done at Amiens the 27th day of March, 1802, the sixth Germinal, year Ten of the French Republic.

Lord Hawkesbury, on moving "That the said Treaty do lie on the table, to be perused by the members of the House," said, it was the wish of ministers to adhere to the usage observed on former occasions of this kind, and as there was no instance where any proceeding had been instituted respecting a definitive treaty, after a preliminary treaty, which had received the approbation of the House, it was not their intention to propose that any such proceeding should now take place. He was aware, however, that it was competent to every member to bring the subject under the consideration of the House, on the ground of a specific objection to any part of it, of its being inconsistent with the preliminaries, or of any change of circumstances which might have taken place from the time that these preliminaries were agreed upon, and to submit a regular motion for that purpose. There was, he believed, an intention to submit such a motion to the consideration of the House, and he assured the House, his majesty's ministers were ready to meet it, to explain the whole, or any part of their conduct, and to state fully, fairly, and explicitly, the reasons which induced them to advise his majesty to conclude the definitive treaty.—Mr. Windham said, he would, on Monday, shortly state the reasons which would induce him to move, that the definitive treaty be taken into consideration on a future day.—Lord Grenville gave a similar notice in the House of Peers.

Debate on Mr. Windham's Motion for appointing a day to consider the Definitive Treaty of Peace.] May 3. Mr. Windham said:—Sir, I do not rise to solicit the House to come now to any final decision upon the merits of the definitive treaty of peace, but simply to move a day for taking it into consideration. His majesty's ministers think that no discussion is necessary, the preliminaries having met with the approbation of the House, and they have declined to introduce any motion respecting it. Whether this be an invariable custom, or one that would be "more honoured in the breach than the observance," I shall not stay to inquire. If there be precedents that do not render any such proceeding necessary, they must be founded upon the presumption that, by its approbation of the preliminary treaty, the House has sanctioned the definitive. Now, I think that it is quite the contrary in the present case. I think that the question is completely open, and that there may be perfectly good grounds for giving a different judgment upon the definitive treaty, from that which the preliminaries have received. At the same time, however, that ministers have declared that they see no necessity for farther discussion, they have also expressed a wish, that, if any such be to take place, it may be a full and complete, not a partial discussion. If by this they mean that the subject should be taken up upon all its grounds, and with a full view of the subject in all its points, bearings, and relations, in that wish I heartily concur. If, on the contrary, by deprecating a partial discussion, it be meant that the whole discussion should take place on the same day; if it be meant to crowd all the points of this comprehensive business into a single sitting, and without full information to assist the judgment in its inquiry into the merits of each, I cannot agree; because it cannot be done with justice to a question of so great magnitude. In the circumstances under which I now present myself, I am, mutatis mutandis, like a counsel in an opening speech, in which I am to touch on a variety of papers and matters, the complete knowledge of which can only be disclosed in the proofs produced in the progress of the trial: but whether ministers will give all these accounts and papers is what will make all the difference possible in the final discussion. This is a subject upon which I have already expressed my sentiments; and sorry should I be to have it supposed, that, if we were met to pass a final judgment upon it, I should touch so slightly as I mean now to do upon many points of moment, and express so feebly the deep anxiety and apprehensions which I entertain of the treaty, as of the grave digging for our greatness, and an abyss opening at our feet to swallow us up. The best order in which to consider this subject, will, I think, be under the four following heads: I shall first take the circumstances which did exist, but were not known in this country, previous to the preliminaries. Secondly, those points which took place in the interval between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty. Thirdly, the variation of certain points in the definitive from their state in the preliminaries; and, fourthly, those points in the definitive which do not exist in any shape in the preliminaries, yet may not be considered as a departure from them. As to the first class, namely, the circumstances which did exist, but were not known, before the preliminaries, there are three principal ones: 1, the cession of the isle of Elba; 2, the limit of French Guiana; and, 3, the cession of Louisiana. The cession of the isle of Elba has been already mentioned; and when the necessary papers shall be laid before the House, it will be the proper time to enter into it fully. I shall now touch on the manner of the cession only, leaving it to the House to judge the value of the acquisition to the French as an excellent station, an important harbour, and an impregnable fortress. The argument by which our assent is sought to be obtained for this advantage given to the French is, the immensity of objects of equal if not greater value, which destroys its single importance; that is, we are told, why continue the war for the sake of the isle of Elba, when so many points of greater value have been surrendered? Without dwelling then on its value, I shall consider the manner, which is, in my mind, more important than the thing itself. There is in it such tricking, such chicanery, as requires constant explanation; and the more it is examined, the more odious is the light in which it appears. The House will recollect that, by the treaty of Luneville, by which a transfer was made of the duchy of Tuscany, it was expressly stipulated that Porto Ferrajo should remain as it was before, attached to the dukedom of Tuscany. Now, what do the French? they have recourse to that sort of calculation by which an algebraist would proceed to exterminate a quantity that he wished to get rid of; they transfer it to another person, they leave it with the duke of Tuscany; but, as if they were playing a game of chess, they remove the duke and put a king in his place. They take a king of the house of Spain, and having placed him in the duke's stead, they negotiate with the court of Spain, that it shall not remain with Tuscany, but be transferred to France. This was not known at the time when the preliminaries were signed. It comes out then, that the real state of Porto Ferrajo was artfully concealed; that, instead of being a station in the hands of the duke of Tuscany, or against the French, it was to be transferred to France, to facilitate her attack upon Naples, or any other ally that we might have in that quarter in a future war. Surely nobody will say that these circumstances, if the thing stood single, are not such as put the case upon a new footing, and leave it a res integra open to discussion.—Now, Sir, passing over this, we proceed to the next point, which is much the same in manner, but greater in magnitude: I mean the boundary assigned to French Guiana. I shall consider it as the former, not so much with regard to its importance, as to the consequences attending it, which I contend were a gross breach of good faith. When the preliminaries were signed, we were given to understand by them, that the dominions of Portugal were to be maintained in their integrity. Therefore, when the treaty of Madrid came out, which violated them, there was a general outcry and alarm. We were told, that it would be given up. As for myself, I could not understand that the French would have made this excursion into the Portuguese territory, purely for the purpose of giving it up again. It seems, however, they did so, as his majesty's ministers take credit for making them give it up and take another. A few leagues of wilderness, in one place or another, are no great object. The question is, the command which it gives them of the Mississippi, and that they have as much by the one as by the other. Either boundary is equally a breach of faith; they should have gone to the treaty of Utrecht; for, to impose a new boundary upon us is equally a fraud as if they had retained the former. As to the treaty of Badajos, which has been referred to on this subject, there is no such paper before the House, and therefore I leave it out of my consideration. What I complain of is the fraudulent exchange. It has been said of a peace that it was only a change of war; the French mode of plain dealing may be perhaps a substitution of one fraud for another.—The next point in this rising climax of frauds is the cession of Louisiana. By this acquisition the French are established in a space as unbounded as the view it opens, whether North or South. What a present have we made in it to the Americans! We have placed a serpent at their feet, by which they will be ultimately devoured. We have put them in that state in which they must become willing slaves under the dominion of France. We all know something of human nature. We know that men detest the instrument less than the cause, and turn their resentment upon those whom they can make to feel it most. They will not of course hesitate between us and the French, and thus we shall eventually forfeit the friendship of America by the aggrandizement of the French in that quarter. As to the wealth which this establishment opens to them, it has no limits but their will. On the continent of South America, there is no power that can resist them: there are the sources of the wealth of the world. But if gentlemen do not feel the consequence of their passing into the hands of the French, it would be in vain for me to impress them with an idea of their importance.

I have now got through the three principal points, which, though not known in this country, existed at the time of the preliminary treaty. There is not one of them that does not call for a revision of the preliminaries. Now, Sir, under the next head of things, namely, those which happened in the interval between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, the catalogue is not numerous; but what it wants in number it makes up in magnitude. It consists of the Italian republic; and the naval and military force sent out from France and now established in the West Indies. The first is the question of a new kingdom (for whether kingdom or presidentship differs but little in the language of the present day) in the heart of Italy. I say, that if such a situation of things had happened without the act or interference of either party, it was competent to a minister to say, here comes a change upon which we did not calculate, therefore it is quite a new case. I say farther, that the history of Europe furnishes us with precedents which show that such a change would have been the cause of a war; but what will be said, when it appears that this was done during the interval of the preliminaries, and by one of the contracting parties? It is not that this is not felt as a good cause of war; but the fact is, Europe is so altered that no interested power dare attempt to question it. What must Austria think, when she sees the Cisalpine republic, which she might have originally regarded as a barrier against France, is now a barrier to France for her destruction? We know what Austria feels; but she feels her danger too much to venture upon any steps for redress. The second point bears less upon the present question; but it is of extreme importance, and may hereafter prove a measure of serious inquiry. The way in which I look at it is, the establishment of the French power in the West Indies earlier than it would otherwise have taken place; and which, if it had not taken place so early, would not perhaps have ever been established at all. This is of the more importance when we consider what expectation has been formed of the chances and events which time might produce in the uncertain and unprecedented state of things which the world has so long presented. We do not know what effect delay might have had, or what advantages it might not have given us. We are therefore in a situation in which we should not otherwise have been; for, whatever may be said of the policy of the measure on our part, nobody will contend that by it we were not giving, before the conclusion of the peace, a helping hand to that which, during the war, we had expended so many millions of money, and sacrificed so many lives to destroy.

The third head is that which relates to those points on which the definitive treaty is a departure from the preliminaries. Under this head I shall notice, first, the article respecting prisoners. We all know that there was a large debt due to us by France on this account; and we heard of islands that were to be mortgaged for its payment. The result is that there is no such mortgage, and that the debt is as bad as can be, while we were not able, I suppose, to compel better terms. It became therefore necessary to exercise our diplomatic skill, to discover some plausible way of getting rid of the demand, in the execution of which, I wish, however, our plenipotentiaries had devised some mode that would have reflected less ridicule and disgrace upon the country. As an expedient against the payment for the French prisoners, the French are to set off the demands which they have for the maintenance of the prisoners belonging to our allies in their hands; that is, the expense of clothing and supporting the Russian prisoners. We all remember what a parade was made of the attention paid to the Russian prisoners, and that it was represented by the French government as a compliment paid to the emperor Paul; so that we are made to pay for that very clothing and maintenance which were the lure to decoy that sovereign from our alliance. The next point is the cession of Malta. By the preliminaries this island was not to belong to France or England; but to be restored to the order under the protection of a third power, generally supposed to be Russia. It was originally conceived that Malta was not to be given up; but that would not now be a proper matter for discussion. We shall take it simply upon the condition of the preliminaries. Instead, however, of providing for Malta in the spirit of the preliminaries, a covered way has been devised, by which England is completely ousted, and France put into possession. That such at least will be the result I have no doubt. The first consideration that occurs is, how the order is to be supported. We know that the internal revenue of Malta does not exceed 30,000*l.*, a sum not more than equal to the support of the grand master, the various charitable institutions, and the supply of grain. These three objects absorb all the revenue of every description which the island affords; so that for guards, garrison, and the defence of the place, there will be no provision at all. Of the revenues that formerly belonged to the order, those in France, Bavaria, and different parts of Germany, have been confiscated, and those which lay in Spain are on the eve of being so, making in the whole, at least four-fifths of its ancient revenue. Thus situated, the order must soon fall for want of support. I shall not dwell upon the disgraceful mode of modelling it upon the French regular or noble democratic form. It is not of this I complain, but of putting it under the protection of powers under the influence of France; for what is the Neapolitan garrison in fact, but a French garrison? But, supposing it not now under the influence of France; how is that influence provided against by the article which removes the hands of the Neapolitan government? The plan is, that we shall evacuate the island in three months. This stipulation is peremptory. Then comes another clause, enjoining that it shall be delivered up generally; but not attaching to the former clause, and saying to the order. Next comes another clause still more material, which says that the neutrality of the order is proclaimed. What is meant by this neutrality is difficult to understand, and may be variously interpreted. It may be neutrality to say, that ships of war to any number belonging to the neutral nation may come in, or that they shall be all alike excluded. A third way may also be conceived: I mean the admission of an equal number of ships of all nations. Now see the effect of this neutrality in the event of a future war. In such a war, France would have for her allies certainly more maritime powers than England; she would at least have Spain and Holland, while we should probably not have one. Supposing the number of vessels of each power admissible at Malta to be six, France would have there eighteen ships for our six, and so in the same proportion whatever should be the number. Had this stipulation been in the preliminaries, surely it would have been canvassed and set right in the definitive treaty. The next point is the Cape of Good Hope. France has been always mistress of a happy knack of expression; and I do not find that the revolution has changed her style. She has stipulated, that it shall be delivered over in full sovereignty to Holland. Now, there is nothing to bind Holland from making it over to France, and putting a French garrison in it the moment she shall receive it. When, then, we consider how the word "sovereignty" was used in the case of Tuscany and the isle of Elba, we cannot suppose that it was intended to be a mere idle term in the definitive treaty. On the contrary, this industrious use of it affords a lively persuasion that the same will be the result with regard to the Cape.—I shall now pass on to things occurring in the definitive treaty, and which make no part whatever of the preliminaries. The first is one of a gigantic nature, the total absence of all previous treaties. It is the first instance of the kind. It opens to a world of conjecture. It is argued, that we shall gain as much as we shall lose by it; but how this is to happen I am at a loss to comprehend. It may be supposed that the renewal of these treaties would have embroiled us with the continent: But I do not know what those obligations are that would have out-weighed the benefits of the treaties; because these treaties were not made for France, but against her, and for the protection of the other powers. The non-revival of these treaties leaves us, however, with respect to other countries, just in the same situation in which we stood before; so that by this diplomatic analysis, France only is relieved. But, as was said at Lisle, Why get rid of the treaties all in a lump? We were not in the situation of a man with his hand limited to a minute. Surely seven months would have afforded time to make a selection of what should remain and what should be cancelled. There are other points of this class that touch us more nearly. There is one particular part of the empire for which we feel a lively interest, an interest that must be increased in proportion to the loss of so many other acquisitions, and to which we must cling as the last wreck of our empire, I mean our East India possessions.

The treaties of 1783 and 1787, the two great epochs of our rights in that quarter, are given up. We are left without the advantages, whatever they may be, of these compacts, and our right is placed upon its original foundation. Now, let that right be ever so good (for I do not dispute its validity), it is material to consider what rights, or rather claims, the French exercised before 1783. Our present state is, therefore, that state of litigation in which we were previous to the treaty of that year. By that treaty we put a guard upon our right; yet such was the force with which the French preferred their claims, that a ship was sunk in the Ganges, and we were on the point of hostilities when the convention of 1787 took place. We are now in that situation in which an attorney might say to his client, "You have a good right of action, go to law:" but if I had a security in my hands, confirming my right and removing my adversary's, I should not be well advised were I to break off the seal, and throw it in the fire, that I might afterwards go to trial where the arbitrator is the sword, and the court a field of battle. We are now left to our right of action; and perhaps the first news from India will be the notice for going to trial. The French were never backward in asserting their claims; and that they should be less forward now I have no reason to suppose. There are other rights of minor importance abandoned, rights which taken singly are of great magnitude, but which sink into nothing in the neighbourhood of the towering heights that surround them. As to the importance of the privilege of cutting logwood in the Bay of Honduras, we read of nothing but quarrels between France and Spain about it. We do not pretend to a right of sovereignty in that quarter. We hold the right by convention, and France will, no doubt, re-assert her pretensions. What these pretensions are it does not appear; but this state of ignorance and uncertainty shows the necessity for calling for papers, and giving the most mature consideration to the subject. The gum trade is another, which we exercise by convention; and I should not forget the right claimed by the Dutch to trade in the Eastern seas. We know the jealousy of Holland in that particular; we know the credit our minister took for the settlement of 1784 on that point; but how this right is to be exercised in future, what precautions have been taken for its security, and whether they are to come from above or from below, does not appear. Among the other points that come next, without contravening the preliminaries, is the House of Orange. When we talk of all the territories and acquisitions which we have surrendered, we are told of those wonder-working things, credit and capital. I wish we could transfer the word "credit" from the 'change, to credit of another kind, to a high sense of honour, to national spirit and immunity from insults; but of all those qualities that made us great, we are now divesting ourselves, as if they were functi officio, and their sole object was, to procure us money. France may have ill-treated other powers under her protection; but she has shown that she will not suffer another to abuse them. The dog, though beaten by his master, will fly forward in that master's defence; and we do know powers that, though crouching under France, will be bold and vigorous in her cause, that will fight like Janissaries in the pay of their master. One of them, we are aware, has not waited for the wax to be cold upon the treaty, before it has evinced this temper and disposition. That power, which never spares an enemy, will make all powers to range upon its side. In the case of France, there is no instance of the contrary. Even in the evacuation of Alexandria she acted upon that principle. I wish I could say the same for this country, with respect to the House of Orange. In our abandonment of that prince, no provision has been made for the loss of his private property, or his Stadtholderian authority. It might have been expected, that some indemnification would have been secured for the sacrifice of his patrimony and power; but we have not only done nothing, but the manner in which he has been treated forms the most ridiculous feature of the treaty. The very day we were stipulating a provision, on that very day, and in that very room, and at the very table at Amiens, did the French and Dutch plenipotentiaries sign a defeazance. Our stipulations stated generally, that he was to have an indemnity; but the stipulation of the Dutch minister Schimmelpenninck states, that it shall not be in Holland, the only place in which it could be obtained. So much for the good faith of France in the case of the prince of Orange! See now the king of Sardinia. We could be under no fear of reviving treaties with him; his kingdom was gone, unless, indeed, we might fear to see him come like the ghost that "drew Priam's curtains in the dead of night." It seems as if all sense of national honour was lost; but, though the feeling may be lost to us, it is not so with the by-standers. These things are of consequence, and are founded in reason. I want to know what value France sets upon subjecting us to indignity? I want to know what she and other nations think of our submitting to it? The sentiments of Holland I do know, from a curious paper which she lately published. If these sacrifices were made by us from magnanimity, it would be another thing; but they are known to be made against our will. If I wanted a voucher for all this, I find one in a French paper received this day, and which, if translated, I would have read as part of my speech.* In it the writer

* Mr. Windham alluded to the following article, which appeared on the 25th of April, in the political department of a literary and political miscellany, called the Mercure de France, published every ten days, under the immediate patronage of the French Government:

"TREATY OF AMIENS.

"France, reconciled with all other governments, will never be able to disarm the animosity of those men who are irritated by the spectacle of her greatness, and blinded by the splendor of her glory. When, six months ago, they saw her, in fifteen days, conclude four treaties of peace, and restore tranquillity to sea and land, stunned by so much success, they attempted to contest the brilliant terms of the peace with England. They opened up a most extensive range to the lovers of conjectures. They pretended that secret articles balanced the advantages of the public stipulations. Time has shown that there were no secret conditions. Resting on, I know not what, expressions of the English ministers in parliament, they contended that the merit of this peace could not be decided by the preliminaries; that we should wait for the definitive treaty, and then the superiority of Great Britain would be seen.—The definitive treaty has at length been signed, and it is found to be more advantageous, more glorious to France, than the Preliminaries.

"At the time when this first Convention appeared, it was criticised on different grounds. Men considered the benefit which England might derive from the cinnamon forests of Ceylon, and particularly from the superb port of Trincomalée, the true bulwark of India, commanding the Malabar and Coromandel, and all the Archipelago of that Ocean. It was calculated too, not what Trinidad was worth, but what it might be rendered by the talks of Malta as of a place that by the terms of the treaty, must eventually belong to France, and reasons upon several other points in the same disadvantageous line for England. Now, the necessary information upon all these points is only to be had from papers, of which there are none upon the table. Without such papers the real case cannot be known. We cannot know, without them, whether the cordial drop of peace, which we take into our stomachs, may not be something of a deleterious quality that must destroy us. Let us then consider, while we have time, and at least examine the cup in which it has been administered. I move therefore, "That this House will, upon the 18th instant, take into consideration the Definitive Treaty of Peace between his Britannic Majesty and the French Republic, his Catholic Majesty, the Batavian Reskilful industry of the English, less interested, perhaps, about the produce of their own sort than eager to monopolize all the commerce of the Oronoquo, and the countries adjacent. In addition to these estimates, so flattering for England, were adduced the riches she was to acquire in the Mysore, conquered during the war of the revolution; and people were inclined to believe that the English had carried to the utmost extent of their wishes, their naval and commercial greatness.

"With this situation of England was opposed that of France, aggrandized by Belgium, Savoy, Piedmont, and part of Germany; disposing without control of Holland, Switzerland, and Italy; fortifying herself in the Mediterranean, by the acquisition of Porto Ferrajo; opening in the North a river famous for its ancient commerce, and a port destined, by its situation, to become the emporium of Europe; recovering Martinique, enriched by English capital; obtaining the Spanish part of St. Domingo; establishing herself in Louisiana, and regaining her settlements in India. Between these two pictures of two states which may cease to be enemies, but never to be rivals, it was not difficult to pronounce which of the two had gained most by the war. It was demonstrated that France had obtained an irresistible preponderance upon the Continent; and that in suffering her maritime power to fall off, she had not lost the elements of it, which consist in her population and her territory.

"Such was the aspect of things which the preliminaries offered; and as they have formed the basis of the Treaty of Amiens, it may be said that the latter was tried by anticipation. Let us now examine whether it does not secure some new advantages to France and her Allies; whether it does not contain certain great features sufficient to render it remarkable in history. The French public, signed at Amiens, the 27th of March 1802."

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he had but one objection to the motion. He apprehended he need say but little in vindication of the course pursued by his were justly alarmed at what was due to England for advances made for the maintenance of more than 20,000 prisoners. The 2nd Article of the Treaty of Amiens diminishes the debt of France. It is agreed that, in the account of the respective advances, shall be stated not only the expenses of all the prisoners of the two nations, but also those of the foreign troops which, before being taken prisoners, were in the pay and at the disposal of either of the contracting parties. Thus the expenses laid out upon the 7,000 prisoners given back to Russia will be stated in deduction from that which France owes to England. The 7th Article secures to France in Guiana an aggrandisement which the 6th Article of the Preliminaries left at least doubtful, as it guaranteed to Portugal the integrity of her possessions. In the conditions relative to Malta, that important fortress, which the friends of England had so often assigned to her, every thing is favourable to France both in the provisional regulations and the definitive arrangements. As long as the island is Neapolitan it will be French; and to make it cease to be so will require the concurrence of all the great powers. If at one day the Maltese Langue should become dominant, the position, the wants, the temper, the nature of that Langue would bring it under the influence of the French government.

"Such then are several positive conventions which render the Treaty preferable in point of advantage for France to the Preliminaries. But it is not what the Treaty expresses that is most advantageous; it is particularly what it does not express, which ought to form the subject of joy to the French and their allies. In all former negotiations, England had insisted on the renewal of ancient treaties, ascending upwards as far as that of Westphalia. With a scrupulous attention did she always enumerate them, date by date, and also give them new force. Every body knows that almost all their treaties were onerous to the maritime powers of the continent, and that they even contained stipulations humiliating for the allies of France. There were coasts in which the Dutch were obliged, in sign of submission, to lower their flag to that of England. This shameful homage had never been contested without producing a war. The reigns of Cromwell and Charles 2nd afford examples of this truth. This species of vassalage is abolished; and, what is more important to commerce, the abrogation of ancient treaties has removed the fatiguing inconveniences which they occasioned to France and her majesty's government relative to the treaty of peace, in not moving any thing upon it themselves. He did not hold it to be consistent with his duty to depart from an established practice in that particular, which practice did not war-allies in their navigation, in the administration of their colonies, in their whole commercial system.

"If we were, then, to compare the advantages enjoyed by the English in their relations with the continental powers, with the difficulties opposed to the latter by the famous Act of Navigation, we should not any longer be surprised at the degradation into which their marine had fallen even before the war. We should be rather astonished that the English navy had not borne down every thing. The Treaty of Amiens removes all irregularity, all oppression, all restraint. The old law is destroyed; a new public law commences. The French and their allies have gained their naval independence: they will have the sense to make use of it; they will not fall into the snare of a new treaty of commerce; and they may one day have their act of navigation! It is this which distinguishes the Treaty of Amiens from all the old transactions of the same kind. It is this that would render it so advantageous for France, even though it did not put the last seal to that increase of continental power which renders her so formidable, and which already obliges England to swell her expenditure by augmenting her militia.

"There are likewise other features which characterize the Treaty of Amiens, and which will serve to signalize the present epoch. The new Constitution of Malta, happy for France, as I have already remarked, is of itself a political phenomenon, which doubtless would excite much astonishment, if the faculty of astonishment were not in some sort worn out. It is an alliance of aristocracy and democracy, of ancient opinions and of new ideas, of chivalry and philosophy. It is a coalition of two political systems, which had kindled the most cruel war, just as in the Treaty of Westphalia, we see an accommodation between two religions which had been the provocation, or the pretext for long and fatal dissensions. If some years ago there had been a state whose chivalrous spirit could have been supposed capable of excluding all access to the revolutionary principle Malta would, beyond all doubt, have been pitched upon as that state: and yet it is at Malta, that the revolutionary spirit establishes itself after it is weakened every where else! . . . To add to the whimsical air of these combinations, England has contributed, as well as France, to maintain it there. It appears certain at least, that having received from the inhabitants of Malta several plans of a republic, the English have given effect to the rant a motion from government, in that House, upon the subject of a definitive treaty; he had pursued the usual course, and he trusted the House would approve it. Having said this, he would now assure the House he felt great satisfaction at the motion now made, in substance; because it afforded ministers an opportunity of entering into a complete justification of every part of their conduct during the late negotiation at Amiens, and the advice they gave to his majesty to conclude the definitive treaty. His right hon. friend had said, that Porto Ferrajo was surrendered to the French, and he had stated this to be in contradiction of the express stipulations of the treaty of Luneville. This was an act that was not done by his majesty's ministers; the surrender of the grand duchy of Tuscany was a concession made by a sovereign power, fully competent to make such a concession. His right hon. friend had laid some stress on the French territory in Guiana. He had referred to a conversation which took place in that House upon the subject of the treaties of Madrid and of Badajos; it was then stated, that the French territory in this part of the globe was to be limited by the treaty of Badajos, and not by that of Madrid; and it was made a subject of discontent by some gentlemen on that account, and a good deal of stress was laid upon the difference between the two, that of Madrid being more favourable to Portugal than that of Badajos; and, in fact, propositions of these islanders in the Treaty of Amiens. Thus democratic principles have found protection from the power that went to war to oppose them!

"But the organization of this new republic and its future figure cannot have any considerable interest, except for France and England. There is in the Treaty a single line respecting the States of Barbary, which produces a more extensive, a more general interest for all Europe. It intimates the design of putting an end to the system of hostilities which subsists between civilized governments and those governments of Africa which the supineness of the former could alone have raised to the rank of powers. Religion formerly endeavoured to repair in this respect the negligence of policy. At length policy cultivates the duty of protection. Its happy intentions are not perhaps very easily realized, but they cannot fall into oblivion. The signal is given. It adds to the importance of the Treaty of Amiens. It honours the negotiators whose work that Treaty is, and the government whose confidence they have justified."

the Portuguese government expressed, in terms the most explicit, that they should think themselves too fortunate, if we could be instrumental in procuring for them the terms specified, and the boundaries as stipulated by the treaty of Madrid. His right hon. friend had said, that the French insisted on the treaty of Badajos, for the mere purpose of making a merit of abandoning that treaty. The fact was, that this country anticipating the pressure likely to be felt by that country before the knowledge of the signing the preliminary treaty, and the concessions likely to be made in consequence of that pressure, made an express stipulation that the limits of the French possessions in Guiana should be as agreed upon by the treaty of Madrid, but that the European boundary should be fixed by the treaty of Badajos.—His right hon. friend had laid great stress, and very justly, on the establishment on the part of France in Louisiana. He had also said, that the French power would now put into danger the whole of the continent of South America. He was ready to agree, that the interest of Europe were materially connected with the interest of America, both North and South; but his right hon. friend could not say, that if the French had not the extent of territory there which they now possess, they could not, if St. Domingo were tranquil, and affairs at rest with them in that quarter, by a large military force, become formidable to either North or South America, provided the subjects of these states were disposed to offer to them no resistance, and had no inclination to maintain their independence, and provided Great Britain and the rest of the European states were to be indifferent spectators of the scene. Certainly this acquisition of Louisiana was very important to France, and would be looked on with regret by those who wished their dominion limited; but that was no conclusive argument to the point stated by his right hon. friend, that this possession will give them the power over the whole of that part of the globe.—Another point which had been stated by his right hon. friend was, that new matter had arisen since the time of signing the preliminaries. Upon this head, his right hon. friend had recurred to the state of the Italian republic, and the armament which had been sent to St. Domingo. With regard to the first he could only say, it could not but be regarded with anxiety by those who thought the power of France too great, or who felt for the independence of the rest of Europe, but this brought the matter back again to the consideration of the preliminaries of peace, the principle of which parliament had recognized. Did his right hon. friend mean to say, that the renewal of the war would have been proper, on account of the objects to which he adverted as having taken place between the signing of the preliminaries and the conclusion of the definitive treaty? He believed not; and if his right hon. friend thought otherwise, he was confident the good sense of the House and the feeling of the public would go in a contrary direction. His right hon. friend had said, that some of the occurrences between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty were such as would at any other time than the present have roused all Europe. Be that as it might, the fact was, that the different states of Europe did not appear to be alarmed, but had sanctioned the very proceedings of which his right hon. friend complained so much. His right hon. friend had laid great stress on the sailing of the armament for St. Domingo. Now, upon considering this matter, in all its bearings, was this armament and its sailing really matter of regret to us? Looking at the state of the West India Islands, he was confident that, whether they were viewed in a national way, or upon the narrower field of individual interest, the usurpation of the Black government was the most formidable of all apprehensions for the safety of those possessions; that, had ministers prevented the sailing of that armament which went to St. Domingo, it would hereafter be matter of sincere regret by the public, and of deep reproach to his majesty's ministers.—The third point alluded to, was that of the departure from the preliminaries; but he should be glad if his right hon. friend would show him where the departure was to be found. He had objected to the expense of paying for the troops of the emperor of Russia. But, was it not proper that those troops which were in the pay and service of the British government, should not, in this case, be considered in the same situation as any of our own would be if prisoners of war in another country?—With respect to Malta, he very much doubted whether the arrangement was not one which was in contemplation by the late administration. He had, however, the satisfaction to know that the Maltese themselves were grateful to Great Britain for the terms procured them. With regard to the word sovereignty, if it was an improper one to be inserted in the definitive treaty, his majesty's ministers had no excuse; for he believed the word was adopted, not by the French, but by the British government: with regard to the application of it, which was to the Cape, it did not apply to the commerce, but to the shipping; and it was extended to the other contracting parties, namely, Spain and Holland. The policy of this measure might appear a matter of doubt perhaps to some; but he would aver that those who had the best means of forming a correct opinion upon the subject, thought that no disadvantage was likely to result to Great Britain from the change that was adopted in this respect.—His right hon. friend had said, that the treaty did not renew any of those commercial arrangements which it had been customary to renew. Great pains had been taken to set off the supposed disadvantages to us of these omissions. He could at present only say, that if the principle upon which the treaty was agreed to was erroneous, it was, without any plea or excuse, erroneous on the part of his majesty's ministers; for this admission was advisedly so settled. His majesty's ministers were thoroughly convinced, that, under the present state of Europe, they took a part which was best adapted to the real interests of Europe in general, and his majesty's dominions in particular, by abstaining from the renewal of any treaties of commerce. It had been industriously circulated, that a proposition was made by his majesty's government upon this subject, but that it was rejected by France, and that we submitted our wish to their determination. No such proposition was brought forward by either party. His right hon. friend had spoken with peculiar anxiety on the subject of the treaties of 1783 and 1787. Without entering into a justification of ministers, he felt a perfect confidence that they had conducted themselves properly in this particular. His right hon. friend had said, that by the treaty of 1783, the rights of France, in certain commercial points, were surrendered, and those of Great Britain established; and this was carried farther to our advantage, after some ineffectual disputes on the part of France, by the convention of 1787. All he should say at present on that topic was, that no rights whatever, on the part of Great Britain, were surrendered by this treaty. The question of right, as determined either by the treaty of 1783, or the convention of 1787, did not mix itself in the discussion of the present treaty. The rights, therefore, whatever they were, stood untouched. The treaty of 1783, and the convention of 1787, were commercial arrangements; and as to the question of right, whatever it was, it remained untouched. Great Britain had established rights that were anomalous in their nature from those of any other in respect to her India possessions; but, as far as related to Great Britain and France, none of these rights would be affected by any omissions in the present treaty. On the subject of the Bay of Honduras, his right hon. friend had not been so ample as he expected he would have been. We had, for a long series of years, by an established practice, entitled ourselves to very valuable privileges, which we had exercised uninterruptedly during war, as well as enjoyed during peace; and this was not disputed by that power which was most interested in making a case against us. His right hon. friend had closed his comments by a reference to the case of the prince of Orange; it had been said, that that prince was not described in the treaty by his title of prince of Orange. Now, he was not to inform his right hon. friend, that such title had never been recognized by any government of France since the head of that illustrious house had been placed on the throne of Great Britain. His right hon. friend had said, that no effectual stipulation was made with that prince for the loss of his property: this was an objection that might have been made to the preliminaries, and, unquestionably, it was a very important subject. Certainly, the terms were not so favourable for that illustrious family as he could have wished; but the treaty contained terms for adequate compensation; for it is said, that for losses suffered as well in private property as by the change of constitution adopted in that country, an adequate compensation should be procured for the house of Nassau.—The only objection he had to the motion, applied to the day on which it was proposed to bring it forward. He did not know the use of delay in this case. Did his right hon. friend mean to prevent any of the provisions of the treaty from being carried into effect? If he had any specific object besides that of a general censure upon the treaty, let him state it. Did he mean to prevent restitution being made according to the provisions of the treaty? If he did, let him state it. But it was an object, in the prosecution of which, he believed, his right hon. friend would not be countenanced in that House. He wished explanation, he said; let him ask it, and if it was reasonable he would obtain it. He wished for papers; let him state which they were, and with the leave of that House he should have them; but he could not think that so long a delay as was now proposed was necessary previous to the discussion of the subject: he could not help feeling that delay might be productive of very considerable inconvenience; and that of keeping the minds of the public in suspense was not a slight one. Wishing, however, that a full discussion should take place, he should propose; that, instead of the 18th, the 11th of May be inserted in the motion.

Mr. Thomas Grenville expressed the utmost astonishment, that the right hon. gentleman should consider fourteen days too long a period for obtaining information. It was impossible to have given any attention to the succinct statement of his right hon. friend, without being convinced that so great and so important were the objects demanding consideration, that the period originally proposed was barely sufficient for that purpose. Was it possible to reflect for a moment on that one feature of the treaty, the total omission of the renewal of all former treaties, and yet maintain that an interval of fourteen days was more than sufficient to prepare the House for the discussion of a point of such extensive importance to our commercial relations? The House had been asked to suspend their judgment till information was procured; but how was information to be procured in the time which he had specified?

Lord Hawkesbury said, that on a subject which was so important in its nature, though it was undoubtedly proper that sufficient time should be given for the consideration of it previous to its discussion, he could not but think the debate ought not to be unnecessarily suspended. What reason, then, could be given for the delay which was now proposed? His right hon. friend had divided the subject into four heads, but, in his opinion, it might more properly be divided into two; first, whether the alterations which had taken place, whether known or not, since the signing of the preliminaries, ought to have induced ministers to have refused to sign the definitive treaty, on the same terms as the preliminaries. The second head was, the defects, whether of omission or commission, in the definitive treaty. As to the first of these heads, whether these events which were notorious, such as the first consul of France having accepted the presidency of the Italian republic, the surrender of the isle of Elba to France, and the cession of Louisiana by Spain, ought or ought not to have induced ministers to conclude the definitive treaty with France, was a question for future discussion. But it should be recollected, that they were not now known to us for the first time, they had been publicly known for many months; and therefore he was sure that there was no person who had not fully considered this question, and formed his opinion upon it. With regard to the defects of the definitive treaty, he begged to observe, that the custom of France being different from ours upon these subjects, the definitive treaty had been for some time known by the public; and therefore his right hon. friend must have made up his mind with regard to the information which he wanted. Under these circumstances, he could not conceive any reason why the discussion should be delayed. With regard to the information which his right hon. friend said would be necessary previous to the discussion of this subject, it was impossible for ministers to know whether it would be consistent with their duty to grant it, until the nature of the information was known.

Mr. Windham said, that one piece of information which he should require would be, to know the effect which the non-renewal of the treaties of commerce would have upon our Eastern trade. This would certainly require some time. The same observation applied as to the business of Honduras. Then with regard to treaties, some of them were certainly before the House, others were before the public, but not in an authentic way; and there were some which he had never seen. But he was not then prepared to state specifically the different papers which it might be necessary to produce previous to the discussion upon this subject.

Mr. Pitt said, that if the House fixed the shorter day which had been proposed for the discussion of this question, it would be necessary to have much information; and therefore, if his right hon. friend was not now prepared to state distinctly the papers which he wanted, he hoped he would by to-morrow be enabled to put his motion in a precise shape, because it could only be a question of form; for no person could have heard the speech of his right hon. friend without being convinced that it was not made without ample information upon the subject. He was convinced that his right hon. friend would not wish, after the doubts he had stated, that any unnecessary interval of suspense should take place before the opinion of parliament was taken upon the question. It was not his intention to anticipate the discussion; but there was one point to which he could not avoid alluding for a moment. He could not but rejoice that, upon this point, his right hon. friend had not represented our rights as doubtful, though he had spoken of the claims of those who were lately our enemies. He alluded to what his right hon. friend had said about India, one of the great limbs of the power of this country, and one of the great sources of that wealth and commerce which had raised her to her present exalted state, and had assisted in carrying us through that eventful contest which had just ended. When the question came under discussion, it would be found that there was not only no ground for solid, but no pretence even for contentious argument, or plausible cavil; and, therefore, after what he had heard stated, he could not but count the moments till the subject should be investigated, which he hoped required nothing but an impartial discussion to remove all uneasiness from the public mind, because it would prove that there existed a determination in peace to maintain those rights which we had secured and strengthened by war. His right hon. friend had talked of the necessity of producing several treaties; but some of them could not, in point of form, be laid on the table of the House; and with regard to others, it could not be supposed proper to lay before the House the treaties of Westphalia, Ryswick, Utrecht, &c. If gentlemen had not considered all those treaties already, certainly neither a week nor a fortnight would be sufficient to prepare them for the discussion of this question. But in order to ascertain the state of Europe immediately previous to, during, and since the war, the only information that could be given must be in the discussion of the question. With regard to the apprehensions, that in consequence of the non-renewal of treaties, particularly that of 1787, the French would establish the pretensions which they had advanced previous to 1787: it would be necessary, in the first place, to ascertain what these pretensions were, and upon what ground they rested. If it should turn out that those pretensions, be they what they might, had no foundation, then, undoubtedly, an inquiry into the subject would be useless. The first question was, whether we were of opinion, that in point of fact our late enemies had no such pretensions, and whether we knew enough of our own rights to say that those which we had maintained in war should not be conceded in peace? He knew enough of those pretensions to state, that they arose out of two foundations, but principally out of the treaty of 1783, which was now done away. As far as they arose out of grants from the Great Mogul (of whom we were in fact the substitutes), these grants must be done away by war as well as treaties. The grants of former Moguls certainly could not be more binding upon us than our own treaties. Voluntary grants could not be more binding than positive treaties. It would be to be considered also, whether what his right hon. friend had said about Honduras might not also be done away by general reasoning? He would not, however, enter into the discussion of these points at present.

The Amendment was then carried.

Debate on Lord Grenville's Motion for appointing a Day to consider the Definitive Treaty of Peace.] May 4th. The order of the day being read,

Lord Grenville observed, that having already given his opinion on the preliminary articles of peace, he thought it his duty to abstain from making any observations on some very material transactions which had occurred in the interval of the negotiations for a definitive treaty. This was a rule, which, from personal motives, he had prescribed to himself; but he should have been far from censuring any noble lord who might have adopted a different mode of conduct. When, however, the definitive treaty was concluded, and the contents of it made known to the public, he thought it the precise moment when he was peculiarly called upon to direct the attention of ministers to the subject of an omission, which appeared to him of great consequence, of not stipulating for the renewal of all or most of the treaties before subsisting between this country and those nations with which we had lately been at war. The time that would elapse between the conclusion and the final ratification might have sufficed for some arrangement on that subject; but whether his majesty's ministers availed themselves of that delay or not, he had yet to learn. He understood that, though there never was a subject which more highly interested the welfare of the country, it was not the intention of ministers to submit the treaty to the House by any specific motion; and he acknowledged there might be some excuse for such a proceeding, if the treaty was in fact no more than a detailed execution of the articles of the preliminaries, upon which they had come to an approving vote already. In order, therefore, to lay a ground for his motion, it would be proper for him to show the variations between them, the alterations in some parts, the contradictions in others, and the omissions upon the whole. The first consideration which presented itself was that which he hoped would be ever deemed of most essential importance in the councils of this country, he meant the regard had to national honour and to national faith. This was a consideration, in his mind, of much more moment than any other which could arise on such a subject. Loss of territory might be regained, commerce might be revived, and industry encouraged and invigorated; but honour and faith, once forfeited, could never be repaired but imperfectly, and only by a long series of conduct manifesting an adherence to a different system. Upon this principle he could not but condemn the manner in which the integrity of Portugal had been sported with. We should never forget that, through the whole course of the war, that country had adhered to us with a firmness that shamed the fidelity of much more powerful nations; and he would undertake to assert, without the fear of contradiction, that whatever Portugal had lost in consequence of the war, was solely sacrificed to its attachment to the interest of this country. It was not by any general engagement and guarantee, but by a special and distinct treaty, that British faith was pledged to bring Portugal whole and unimpaired out of the war, instead of which, this peace left that integrity to depend on what was left to Portugal in Europe by the treaty of Badajoz, and the territory which it lost, which was of little value in itself, deeply affected the interests of Great Britain, as it left for ever imprinted in the minds of the Portuguese people, that the guarantee and protection of England were not to be relied on. The treaty alluded to also put it out of the power of Portugal any longer to carry the commercial treaty into effect. He would not for the present speak of the value of that treaty to this country, but observe that it was such, in the opinion of Portugal, that, for its maintenance, that country at one period of the war put its very existence to the hazard. If such was the care we took of them in Europe, still less did we protect their possessions in the Indies. By the treaty of Amiens, the boundaries of France in Guiana were circumscribed to the course of the river Ariwari; but this gave the French an entire command of the Amazon river at its source, the command below of the whole Portuguese trade, and the command equally, in time of war, of our Indian navigation. The next object of attention, in regard to British faith, was, the condition of a family, with its adherents, to which we were bound by every tie of friendship and alliance, who were now wandering in foreign parts as exiles, and uncertain of being ever enabled to return to their native country: he alluded to the house of Orange. The interests of that illustrious family were entirely neglected in the preliminaries; and he believed, however desirous they might be of peace, the preliminaries would never have been approved of, if ministers had not declared that the honour and good faith of this country required that a compensation should be made to the prince of Orange. His lordship then enumerated the various kinds of property which the house of Orange heretofore possessed in Holland. He denied that the house of Orange had been elevated by the republic of the United Provinces, which, on the other hand, was itself erected by that House, whose princes held great possessions, not indeed in full sovereignty, nor much short of it, long before the republic started into existence. The dignities of the house of Orange, it was true, had not been formerly recognized by the old government of France; but that was no reason why we should now consent to sink their title into the branch of the house of Nassau, established in the republic of the United Provinces, and only stipulate that it should have a compensation, without providing in what it should consist, or when, or where, or by whom, it was meant to be made. As to its adherents, they were not even alluded to, but seemed to be considered as unworthy of notice, while we saw France stipulating for the security of every Jacobin, in all the nations of Europe, and claiming and obtaining from this country a traitor (Napper Tandy), who appeared in hostile and rebellious arms in Ireland. All these were consequences of the improper construction of those who were to conduct the negotiations at Amiens. France introduced the plenipotentiaries of its two allies into the congress, while those of Portugal and Naples were excluded; probably because they were interested in the result, but more probably because they were the friends and allies of England. By these means it happened, that while lord Cornwallis was putting his signature to the peace, containing the condition of an indemnity to the house of Nassau, the French and Dutch ministers were, without his knowledge and consent, drawing up an agreement at the other end of the table, stipulating that the compensation should not be made at the expense of what was now called the Batavian republic—an act of perfidy and duplicity which he must reprobate in the strongest language. Speaking of the stipulation for each country paying the debts of the prisoners taken on either side, he animadverted on the provisions which included the foreign troops taken while in the pay of each nation. Even in this article so much a matter of form all the advantage was on the side of France. A number of Russian troops had been taken at a time, when they were at our disposal, which in consequence of different political arrangements were afterwards clothed armed and regimented at Brussels, for the purpose of being employed to attack this country. He thought nothing could be more humiliating in us than to be obliged to defray expenses incurred for such a purpose. The Cape of Good Hope according to the preliminaries, was to have been declared a free port, and now reverted in full sovereignty to the Batavian republic. This, in time of war, would make it completely a French port, supposing even that the condition of its being open to the ships of war of the other contracting parties should be complied with. We know the French system in this kind of neutrality to be, that ships of war, of an equal number from each country, should be admitted at the same time. Supposing then, that number to be two each; for two English men of war, the French, Spanish, and Batavian allies, would have six, which would oblige us, at the expense of 25 or 30 ships of the line, either to keep up a great fleet in those seas, or to send convoys with every trading fleet; and every regiment, outward or homeward must be escorted by a force equal to cope with the allies, and to prevent them from attacking our possessions in Hindostan. With regard to Malta, which some considered as not inferior in consequence to the Cape, we were led from the preliminaries to believe that it would be placed under the protection of some power capable of preserving it from the ambitious views of France: this power was probably meant to be Russia, whose weight and influence in Europe might probably have accomplished that end, and the more easily as it had the means of supplying at all times a sufficient force for its defence. This the court of Russia perhaps would not consent to, and the definitive treaty placed it completely under the influence of France. The knights for the future would be wholly unable to maintain it. Their order was partly military and partly religious, and composed entirely of Maltese nobles, who would rather undergo any hardship than associate with that Democratic langue which this treaty proposed, but most probably never could succeed in establishing. The revenues for their support were heretofore supplied from most of the other countries of Europe. These countries had their distinct langues, supported by benefices which could only be held by the knights, whose profession was honourable in their youth, and promised to reward them with considerable possessions when advanced to more mature years. At present, almost all these incentives were gone. The revenues were confiscated in France, on the left bank of the Rhine, and in Bavaria, which contained the richest possessions of the order. Something indeed would remain in Naples, as long as Naples continued any way independent. Something was also left them, the ecclesiastical states; but this, as well as the rest, was held by a very precarious tenure. The revenues of the island itself, partly territorial and partly commercial, were appropriated partly to maintain the splendor of the grand master, which could not be dispensed with; and partly to the support of religious establishments, to the expense of hospitals, and to furnishing a granary for the consumption of the island, which could not produce grain in any proportion to the number of the inhabitants. So that by applying it now to the maintenance of a new democratic langue and the defence of the works, this plunder of the alms-houses would be found wholly inadequate. A Neapolitan force was spoken of for that purpose; but the king of Naples had no interest in the preservation of the island which could induce him to be at that expense. Besides, in time of war, he could never be in a condition to refuse yielding it to the French, in order to assist any project of theirs to intercept our East India trade, or to recover the possession of Egypt. It must, in future, be obedient to what we may call the king of Italy who might at any time march from the new Italian republic, and in forty-eight hours seize upon the capital of the other sovereign. There could be no hesitation, therefore, when the alternative was between the safety of the Neapolitan metropolis and the defence of the island of Malta. It was not probable that his Sicilian majesty would embroil himself with the affairs of Malta, while it remained within the grasp of the first consul, and must dread the hostility of England, which would be formidable to him, though by no means so to France. Under these circumstances, he thought it imprudent in this country to give up the possession of that important island at the moment that France, by its late accessions, was so greatly extending its empire on the Mediterranean. The annexing of the new Italian republic to itself would at any other time have been thought a sufficient cause of war; and now the retention of Malta would, on our part, be still an inadequate equivalent. He illustrated this by the comments of a writer in the Mercure de France,* and published under the immediate inspection of the French government, and which, in explaining how the articles of the definitive treaty were advantageous to the republic, added, "that Malta must always be French, as long as it shall be Neapolitan." He then adverted to the immense acquisition made by the French in the ceded province of Louisiana, at the time that it was also in possession of New Orleans and Florida, which gave them an immense influence on the Northern United States, as well as on the South of America. It gave them nearly as much the command of our East India navigation, as it would have in the possession of Ceylon; it brought them within 300 miles of the city of Mexico; the march would be as easy as from Chester to London; and he had no scruple to affirm, that on the unfurling of the first standard for an expedition to Mexico, the whole of the West of America would immediately repair to it in arms,—a circumstance which must ever put Spain in a state of entire dependence upon the French republic. His lordship next proceeded to consider a stipulation in the treaty, for which, he said, there was no precedent; namely, that which went to surrender the claims of British subjects upon the government of France, for losses sustained before the war, or at the commencement of the revolution. In these periods, property of English subjects in the French funds to a considerable amount was confiscated; which was done chiefly by means of that unprincipled manœuvre, by which the French financiers confiscated two-thirds of the funded debt, in order to enable them to pay the remaining third. He next adverted to the non-renewal of ancient treaties, which he would contend was a principle in the process of negotiation equally novel and injurious; and in illustrating these positions, he again referred to the French official papers that he had already quoted, which said, “the old law is destroyed; a new public law commences:” which principle might be most destructively applied by France in her future projects of aggrandizement; and they might well say to us, that, abiding by the treaty of Amiens, which in effect ordained a new law of nations, we had no right [or title to inquire; nor was that the worst, for though these treaties were ineffectual on our part with respect to France, we were bound by the letter of them with regard to other nations, which must certainly lay the seeds of future quarrels and dissensions. Added to these important considerations, there were others which were more of the nature of omissions than of positive stipulations, but which were of equally injurious tendency. He first adverted to the point of the honour of our flag in the British seas not being asserted, and which would, in an inconceivable degree, go to abate the spirit of our seamen, on whose ardour and exertions our best hopes always depended; and this point was settled by formal stipulation in the treaty of 1783. Another point was, the omission with respect to the regulation of the gum and the logwood trade. He then observed upon what had fallen from a noble lord on a former evening to the effect, that whatever claims should be demanded by France, would be founded on the arguments urged by him (lord G.) Nothing, however, could be a greater misunderstanding. Never could any man possibly be less the advocate for France than he was; and if the cause were never pleaded but by him, it would be very feebly urged indeed. His opinion upon the effect of the omissions with respect to the navigation of the eastern seas remained unaltered. In the treaty of 1783, it was stipulated that we should continue quietly to exercise our rights in that respect; and these were held of such high importance, that the treaty of 1787 was negotiated principally with the view of ascertaining those claims, and to avert a war which was just about to be entered into, in consequence of the unfounded pretensions of France in that respect. He thought that a distinct explanation should take place even now with France upon this point, which might be effected in five days, and before the cession of the cape, Malta, &c. was carried into effect. He then touched upon the recent acquisitions made by France on the continent of North America, and adverted to the unfavourable effects they might have upon the interests of this country in that quarter, particularly with respect to our West India commerce in periods of war. From this topic he passed to the acquisitions of territory made by France on the continent of Europe, and the serious consequences with which they were fraught; and, drawing to a conclusion, he recalled to the recollection of the House some of the leading passages of the last speech of the illustrious king William, which ought ever to be impressed upon their lordships minds, respecting the aggrandizement of France at that period, in consequence of a prince of the house of Bourbon being placed on the throne of Spain, by which the French king would become master of the whole Spanish monarchy; in consequence of which this country could never experience the blessings of real peace, but must continue to be exposed to all the expenses and inconveniences of war. This reasoning, his lordship contended, applied most emphatically to the state of the two countries at the present period. His lordship concluded by moving, "That the Definitive Treaty of Peace be taken into consideration on the 14th instant."

Lord Pelham said, that with regard to the non-renewal of the several treaties existing with foreign countries before the commencement of the war, he was ready to admit that the definitive treaty would have given him more pleasure, if it had contained a stipulation for the revival of those treaties, but his majesty's ministers had made as good conditions as they were able to obtain under the situation and circumstances of the contracting powers; and, inadequate as the terms might in some instances be held to be, he flattered himself, that if it were possible collectively to take the sense of the people upon the peace such as it was, they would rather have it than continue the war. He had been somewhat disappointed, at not having heard from the noble lord one single argument, to convince the House of the necessity for taking the definitive treaty into consideration. The noble lord had also forborne to state the motion that he meant to propose. He saw not, for his part, any good that could arise out of a consideration of the treaty, nor what it could end in, unless it was meant to move a censure upon ministers. If, however, it was thought desirable to take the treaty into consideration, the sooner that was done the better, as no good could arise from delay. The noble lord had stated several important topics as variations in the definitive from the preliminary treaty; but he could not admit that they were variations; and where they differed at all, it was in being more fully explained in the definitive treaty than they had stood in the preliminaries. As to the breach of public faith to the queen of Portugal, he did not think that charge at all imputable to this country; as far as it was in the power of ministers, they had stipulated for the integrity of her most faithful majesty's territories and possessions as they were previous to the commencement of the war; and as to the exception relative to the limits of the French possessions in South America, that article was stipulated between Portugal and the French by a separate treaty, over which Great Britain had no control, not being a contracting party; but ministers had obtained an explicit definition of those limits, which were determined by the fall of the river Arawari into the ocean below the North Cape near the Isle Neuve, and the Island of Penitence. With regard to the House of Orange, undoubtedly it had been stated, when the preliminaries were under consideration, that there were hopes of obtaining for the prince of Orange such a compensation as would be entirely satisfactory; but though they had not been able to succeed, they had prevailed so far as to induce the French to make a public acknowledgment that the House of Orange had suffered losses in what was now termed the Batavian republic, and to declare that an adequate compensation should be procured to the prince for his losses. In respect to the Cape, they had procured a full explanation of the stipulation respecting it, which was to be found in the definitive treaty. He denied that the construction put upon the condition relative to the Russian prisoners was the true construction; he could not admit, that this country was to be at the expense of furnishing and clothing them. With regard to Malta, it had been hoped that the emperor of Russia would have accepted the guarantee of the island's independence, which he owned would have been more desirable than the present arrangement respecting the island; but if they could rely on the good faith of France, the danger the noble lord apprehended was not likely to arise. His lordship concluded with moving an amendment, by inserting the 12th instant, instead of the 14th.

Lord Thurlow insisted that all subsisting treaties were at an end as soon as a war was commenced with those who were parties to them. It behoved those, therefore, who plunged the country into the war, not to have set the treaties loose by commencing hostilities; but it by no means followed as a matter of course, that ancient treaties were necessarily to be revived and renewed in every treaty of peace; that must depend on the will of the contracting parties.

The Lord Chancellor said, that if by the omission of the mention of former treaties they were all to be considered as abrogated, and if the public law of Europe was thus altered, he had no difficulty in saying, that an address should be voted to his majesty, praying that he would dismiss his present ministers from his councils for ever. But he trusted that the fact was far otherwise, and that the conduct of ministers deserved no such censure. He should not at present attempt to answer the noble lord, considering that a time would come when he might do it with more propriety.

Lord Auckland said, he had heard with the liveliest satisfaction what had fallen from the noble mover, with respect to our rights in India. It certainly had been imputed to him on the continent, and pretty generally believed in this country, that he had declared these rights to depend upon the treaties of 1783 and 1787. But he had now affirmed in the most decided and manly manner, these rights to be inherent in us as sovereigns of Bengal. He himself was in possession of information which he should take an early opportunity of laying before the House, and which would clearly prove that the French had not the shadow of a claim to disturb us in the exclusive enjoyment of our possessions and privileges in that quarter of the world.

Debate on Mr. Nicholls's Motion for an Address respecting the Removal of Mr. Pitt.] May 7. Mr. Nicholls said, that he felt it his duty, on public grounds, to draw the attention of the House to the misconduct and delinquency of the late administration, but more particularly the criminality of the late chancellor of the exchequer, whom he individually selected as the main object of his motion, not merely because he had been the most prominent figure in the whole group, but forasmuch as there were many points of heinous delinquency which attached exclusively to that right hon. gentleman. It was impossible to canvass this subject so fully as it deserved without going into a retrospect of the conduct and management of the late war. At the commencement of that unhappy contest, the right hon. gentleman rested his ground for the necessity of embarking in hostilities, on the plea that Great Britain was in honour bound to protect the Austrian Low Countries from the usurpation of France, and to rescue and deliver Holland. Had ministers obtained these objects? The very reverse: Austria had lost her domains of the Low Countries, and Holland was subdued by France. The right hon. gentleman had embarked in this war for the delivery of Holland, with the enthusiasm of a political Quixote. He had volunteered the service; no claim, no demand being made upon us by the Dutch, who, on the contrary, deprecated our interference. As little were we called upon to meddle in the dispute with the Austrian government. Having failed, then, in his attempt to effect the delivery of Holland and of Belgium, the right hon. gentleman, with an aptness at tergiversation which defied all parallel, set up another plea, and assuming the ore rotundo, with a mouth vaunting great things, boasted, as his next object, the attainment of "indemnity for the past, and security for the future." How has he succeeded in this part of his project? What is the indemnity, what the security he has obtained for us? So far from diminishing the power of France, that government had assumed colossal growth; so far from suffering any dismemberment of her provinces, any retrenchment of her territories, she had extended her dominions beyond the limits the proudest ambition ever dreamt of. The language which France now held out in concluding peace was twofold; as applying to herself, she adopted the maxim of uti possidetis as applying to this country, she insisted on the status quo ante bellum. Thus she was to retain all that she had acquired, whilst we were called upon to refund all we had gained during war. A third object was then set up, and the House and the country at large told, that the war was unavoidable on our part in order to extinguish French principles. In this point of view likewise the right hon. gentleman had completely failed. He was aware, that with respect to French principles, he might entertain opinions very different from many gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. On the present occasion, however, he should not enter into a discussion of abstract principles; but take the term in the sense in which it was employed and used by themselves. He would take the term as used and defined by Mr. Burke; and, adopting his interpretation, say, that ministers professed to carry on the war for the purpose of restoring the anciently constituted authorities of France; and that there might not be, in the centre of Europe, the dangerous example, as to them appeared, of the successful insurrection of a people against their rulers. Had they succeeded in this attempt? No. Yet this was the only point of view in which the war could possibly be productive of beneficial consequences. He, for his part, did not agree with the right

hon. gentleman in the representations he thought fit, from time to time, to make of the general temper and disposition of the country. He, for his part, did not believe that any great portion of the people were infected with Jacobin principles. Several trials had taken place for acts of alleged treason; many persons had been taken up and confined under the suspicion of treasonable machinations; yet were ministers not able to produce a single proof that there existed large and formidable bodies of men who panted for innovation, and who wished for revolution. Under the pretence of guarding the country from imaginary evils, this political Quixote, this fighter of windmills, had exposed it to real ills. Under the pretence of weakening, he had strengthened and aggrandized France. The more he reflected on the ruinous consequences of the late war, the more did he feel impressed with gratitude to the present ministers for having concluded peace. It was the war which rendered that peace necessary; that calamitous and destructive war, begun and carried on by the late administration, and which had terminated in a total failure and miscarriage of all the objects for which they pretended to undertake it. Waiting, however, the issue of the war, he would now proceed to investigate the point, whether, and how far, the right hon. gentleman had manifested ability and skill in the conduct and management of it? On this subject there were three wise and fundamental maxims which he wished to press upon the attention of the House. They had been ably stated in a political work, by a late writer, certainly no way attached to the revolution and existing government of France; but yet, who had loyalty, sagacity, and penetration sufficient to see the impracticability of conquering France on the system proposed by the right hon. gentleman. That intelligent writer had laid it down as an essential maxim, in the first place, never to trust to the accounts which emigrants give of the state of the country from which they have expatriated themselves. The second point was, never to rely on the success of the invasion of a country because dissensions may obtain among its inhabitants. In case of invasion, says this able politician, party dissensions will be laid aside, and all will unite against the common enemy. The third and last maxim was, never to believe that the success of an invasion can be calculated and determined by the state of the finances of a country. Now, let us see how far the right hon. gentleman has adhered to those salutary maxims. It is no small part of wisdom, if a man be not over-sagacious himself, to profit from the foresight of others. But the right hon. gentleman was, in this respect, incorrigible. He placed implicit reliance on the statements and representations made to him by the emigrated noblesse of France, and built his schemes on the report of persons whose interest it was to deceive him. Were these the proofs of his transcendent abilities, these the credentials of his being "a heaven-born minister?" He would now pass on to another of the right hon. gentleman's experiments. How far it was consistent with morals and the dictates of humanity, to form the project of starving a whole nation, he should not stop to inquire, but confine himself merely to the result of that notable experiment. It was to that scheme, and to the badness of the preceding harvest, that we owed the scarcity with which we were ourselves afflicted in 1795. To bring back the corn trade to its regular channel, the right hon. gentleman was obliged to drain the country of its specie, in order to procure corn from the foreign markets; the consequence of which was, the stoppage of the Bank in 1797. Such was the result of the right hon. gentleman's humane attempt to starve twenty-five millions of fellow-beings! The next point on which he should animadvert was the ambiguity of the right hon. gentleman's conduct. By this he had alienated not only the best of the royalists, but had more particularly forfeited the alliance of the king of Prussia, who deserted us the moment he perceived that our views were directed to our own aggrandizement. The French Royalists felt outraged, and justly so, when they saw us take possession of Valenciennes, not in trust for the French princes, but for Austria; and Toulon, with the fleets of France, in the name of the king of Great Britain. In the article of subsidies, the right hon. gentleman had carried his system to a length far beyond any of his predecessors. It was the enormous and lavish subsidies granted to foreign powers which most essentially contributed to the hardships, distress, and scarcity, under which the country laboured. As to the system which he had pursued with respect to St. Domingo, it was difficult to say what was his real aim in these transactions, whether he meant to take possession of that island in trust for the French king, or to establish in it a government of Blacks. If the former had been his object, he might easily have attained it, as the inhabitants would willingly have submitted to royalty. On the first expedition sent to that island, only 750 men were employed; yet before we had done with it, it cost 25,000 lives, and two millions of treasure. In 1799, the memorable expedition to Holland was undertaken, another Quixotical experiment, which ended in discomfiture and disgrace. Then followed the infraction of the treaty of El-Arish, which event, among other lamentable consequences, put it out of our power to protect and succour our ally Portugal. The army under the justly lamented Abercromby, which might have defended Portugal, was obliged, in consequence of the breach of the treaty of El-Arish, to be sent to Egypt. The next instance of incapacity and delinquency was the answer sent to the overture made by Buonaparte. He would appeal to the House whether there was a single gentleman at this moment who did not regret the rejection of the overture made by Bounaparté, in 1800. The peace which had just been concluded was on terms much worse, and far more humiliating. And what infinitely aggravated the guilt of the right hon. gentleman was, that, at the very time when he scornfully rejected the overture, he knew the country to be labouring under the deepest distress, struggling with famine, and involved in difficulties from which peace alone could relieve us; yet turned he a deaf ear to all remonstrances, and determined to persist in his career of war and bloodshed. For this purpose, he excited Austria, in the autumn of 1800, to renew the war, though he must have foreseen that she was not in a state to prosecute hostilities. The consequence was that Austria was completely subjugated by France and compelled to sue for peace. One of the next incidents in this eventful chapter was, the unfortunate dispute with the Northern powers; a dispute which might easily have been prevented, by giving up Malta to the emperor of Russia. Why such a measure should be deemed impolitic, he was at a loss to conceive. In his opinion, Malta, under the auspices of Naples, was infinitely more likely to be dependent upon France, than if it had been placed under the direction of Russia. Yet, rather than concede this point, the minister chose to embroil the country in a dispute, which, but for the opportune death of the late emperor Paul, might have led to the most disastrous consequences. That the war was now over, even under disadvantageous circumstances, afforded him sincere satisfaction. He was ready to admit that the terms of the peace were not the most auspicious, and that they were such as could only be justified by the calamities brought upon us by the war. But however infelicitous the terms, they reflected in no wise on the present administration, who were justly entitled to the praise and credit of having restored to the country the blessings of peace—whilst all the miseries under which the country had so long laboured, and all the inconveniences it must still continue to experience, were ascribable to the measures pursued by the late administration. There was one point on which he knew the late prime minister not a little prided himself, and for which he had great credit given him by his friends. This was his rare abilities as a financier. He wished to see how far the right hon. gentleman's pretensions were well-founded. In this view, he should analyse some of his boasted acts. To commence with the Income tax. What was the effect of that odious measure? It operated to the degradation of the English character; it debased the man, and compelled him to submit to an inquisitorial system, totally repugnant to the principles and spirit of the British constitution. What was his sale of the land tax? What but an act equally impolitic and unwise? He boasted of having kept up the funds. True, he had done so—but how? By an injurious extension of paper money; by an exorbitant rise in the price of all the necessaries of life; by reducing the tradesman to poverty and wretchedness, and by filling the poor-houses with thousands of miserable inhabitants, who, for the last two years were doomed to perish, to the amount he would not say of hundreds, but of thousands. [Strong and general murmurs]. I say, Sir, that thousands of persons have perished in the poor houses within the last two years. If any gentleman doubts the accuracy of this statement, let him move for a committee of inquiry, and I pledge myself to produce such damning proof as shall make his hair stand on end. The right hon. gentleman claims great merit as a finance minister.

What are his claims? He has added 258 millions to the national debt, and entailed little short of national bankruptcy upon us. These are his merits, these his claims. I do not wish to exaggerate his faults; I do not wish to load him with unjust accusations and reproach; I allow that he is not a man of avarice, but he certainly is a man of inordinate ambition. Though he may not have received bribes himself, yet he has carried the system of corruption to a length altogether unprecedented. His prototype, sir Robert Walpole, was a mere child in the art and mystery of corruption compared to the right hon. gentleman. Look only to the lavish use he has made of his official patronage,—no less than 100 new peerages, and 580 pensions! Yes, Sir, corruption was the instrument that he wielded.—But I proceed now to a point of far greater delinquency than any that I have yet touched upon. I am now going to canvass an act, the criminality of which has never been surpassed. When he finds himself no longer able to continue in office, he throws out lures, hopes, and temptations, to a very numerous and respectable body of his majesty's subjects, to look up to him as their only chance of redress. He endeavours to agitate a question big with the most momentous political interest; he endeavours to set the whole Catholic body in motion, and to alienate their affections from their sovereign. This, Sir, I maintain, is a criminality of the deepest dye, and the atrocity of which rests entirely with himself. Little inferior to this, in point of guilt (is his conduct towards the royal family. He has dared to make a distribution of the civil list in loans to the king's sons, with the iniquitous view of rendering the princes of the blood dependent on his pleasure and of creating discord among the royal family. Is this not cause for serious animadversion and impeachment? If, haply, any of the king's sons should want a larger sum than it would be convenient to grant out of his majesty's purse, parliament ought to be applied to, who would readily make the necessary provision, without inquiring too minutely into particulars; for the children of the sovereign are ever regarded as the children of the state. The right hon. gentleman has uniformly pursued a very different, and, with respect to the royal family, a very unfitting system. The prince has been kept out of his patrimony, and all applications for inquiry into his rights refused.

That to which he had a fair claim has been pitifully doled out to him as a boon. This it must be conceded, is no common instance of delinquency; it is a crime perilous to the constitution, and which endangers the vital interests of the country. A noble lord having given notice of a motion of thanks to his majesty's late ministers, I have felt it my duty to call the attention of the House to the conduct of the late chancellor of the exchequer, to analyse his claims, and to put the House upon its guard against a rash committal. Let us take care that we do not establish a power which may set that right hon. gentleman above his sovereign. The measure now in agitation to move a vote of thanks to the man whom his sovereign has discarded and dismissed, appears to me novel and dangerous. I call upon the House to guard the constitution with a vigilant and jealous eye. I call upon it, likewise, to guard and protect the power of royalty. What I have said, I have spoken from pure and patriotic motives. I stand totally unconnected with party. I shall now conclude with moving, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, expressing the thanks of this House to his majesty for having been pleased to remove the right hon. William Pitt from his councils."

Mr. Jones seconded the motion.

Lord Belgrave rose to move an amendment to the motion of the hon. gentleman. He could hardly think the hon. gentleman meant seriously to press his motion, as it was notorious that his right hon. friend had resigned his situation, and had not been dismissed his majesty's service. The consequence of agreeing to this vote therefore would be, that the House would thank the king for doing what he had not done. The noble lord said, he could not help anticipating a general and cordial support to the motion which he should conclude with. He entertained that expectation, from the disposition apparent in the House on a former evening, when the subject was first started, and from the nature of the motion itself, which embraced a general vote of approbation of the leading measures of his majesty's councils during the late war, which had been frequently the subject of commendation in that House, and recorded in the Journals in terms most honourable and flattering. But, though the conduct of government had been several times applauded in detail, there was this novelty in the motion

he was about to propose, that gentlemen would be now called upon to bring into view the general merits and demerits of government, and, upon a conscientious revision of their whole conduct during the war, to decide for or against the motion he intended to submit to their consideration; and he was far from wishing any gentleman to vote with him who did not feel entirely satisfied that their merits very much outweighed their defects. He thought indeed that, considering with the smallest portion of candour, the unprecedented difficulties of the late contest, and the liability of man to err, it would not be conceived extraordinary, if the late government should occasionally have betrayed, in their conduct, the imperfection of human nature. In the motion which he intended to propose, he included those ministers who had been principally concerned in conducting the affairs of the nation in the arduous contest in which it had been engaged; but he meant certainly to point both the vote and his remarks chiefly to the late chancellor of the exchequer, who had been, for so many years the leading member of his majesty's councils, and to whom the country was, above all others, indebted for the distinguished character that it at present held. The other ministers who held high responsible situations, would partake in the honour of the vote in proportion to their merits, or conscientious discharge of their duty, and undoubtedly, in proportion to the opinion entertained by the House and the public of their respective services. He should now proceed to touch upon some of the leading circumstances of the late war, and the conduct of the government. In the first place, he wished principally to hold up to the contemplation of the House, the striking contrast between the situation of the country at the present moment, and at the end of the year 1792—he said at the present moment, because, although last year a new administration had succeeded to the management of public affairs, yet, in the conduct of the war, they followed the system adopted by their predecessors in office. Comparing, then, the present period with that of the end of the year 1792, let him ask the House, whether they did not feel themselves a little more secure now? than they did at that time? Whether they did not feel themselves very much in the situation of mariners, who had just escaped the dangers of the most tremendous storm they had ever encountered, and who looked back upon the scarce subsiding waves with emotions of calm delight, and unspeakable satisfaction? Every man, not lost to all virtuous and honourable feeling, or whose intellects were not wholly benumbed, must have felt at the end of the year 1792, and at other periods of the war, no common anxiety for the fate of his king and country. Let them turn their eyes on their present situation, on the vessel of the state, having weathered the storm, riding in triumph and security in her native port and then let him ask the House, whether some credit was not due to those who had steered her uninjured through a sea so threatening, so awful, and so tempestuous? He could not avoid shortly stating a few of the most prominent features of the dangers they had escaped by the fortitude and exertions of the late administration. They had had not only France to contend with, but French principles supported by arms. They had not only a foreign enemy, but a domestic one to alarm them and increase their difficulties. While they had recourse only to legitimate means of carrying on the contest, France, in a state of unbridled licentiousness, had recourse to depredation, confiscation, and blood, to recruit her continually-exhausted finances. In the early part of her revolution too, the deformity of her principles was veiled by appearances so specious and alluring, that they for a while infused their fatal poisons even here; and the disaffected availed themselves of the delusion to spread their treasons in England, Scotland, and especially in Ireland, where the materials to work upon were more combustible, and better suited to their diabolical designs. Without dwelling, however, on this part of the subject, he should only add his firm conviction, that had it not been for the vigilance and firmness of his majesty's government, at the time when the life of our beloved monarch was traitorously endangered, dreadful would have been the confusion, desolation, and bloodshed in this metropolis.—The next point he wished to advert to was, their great success in the contest in different parts of the world. In the course of the late war their conquests had been many, their losses none. The House had had repeated opportunities of contemplating with admiration the immortal exploits of the navy; the army too had excited their applause and eternal gratitude. He begged leave then, to ask, whether some merit was not attributable to those who directed the public service, preparatory to such splendid achievements? It was the publicly declared opinion of one of the greatest heroes of this or any other country, that a large share of the merit due to the ever-memorable victory of the Nile was attributable to those who originated and planned that expedition. If they turned their eyes to India, the conquests in that distant quarter of the globe had established their reputation on a basis so firm, that the country need not be apprehensive of the security of their possessions there, under the direction of hands less able, and understandings less enlightened and comprehensive than those of the present governor-general, who had acted a master-part in the late splendid transactions in that part of the British empire. If he should be asked, how he connected their conquests in India with the late government? he should in his turn ask, whether the governor-general's instructions did not come from hence? And if he should be asked, how he connected lord Wellesley more especially with the late chancellor of the exchequer? He would say, was he not brought up in the school of his right hon. friend? Did not the House see him within a very few years strenuously and ably contending with him here for the maintenance of the honour, dignity, and character of the nation, in the great contest in which they had been engaged? He ought not, in that place, to omit to give the merit due to the late government, for the promptitude with which they called forth and organized the patriotic zeal of the nation, manifested by all ranks, in the alacrity with which they voluntarily stepped forth to defend the country against the threatened invasion. He next came to speak of the Union with Ireland, which was too remarkable a feature of the late government to be overlooked—an union which originated in an attempt, on the part of France, to disunite us for ever, but which ended in a union entire, and, he trusted, indissoluble. Already the good effects of the Union began to show themselves in Ireland, by diminished irritation and augmented confidence and industry. Here too, he might be allowed to speak favourably of its effects; for he could confidently appeal to the Speaker and the House, whether more propriety of conduct, urbanity and good sense, had been ever witnessed, than in the persons of the Irish gentlemen? He congratulated the House and the country upon it; and, although the union was as yet in its blossom only, he thought he might fairly anticipate its fruit ripening, and that speedily, into richness and abundance. And to what influence and persevering resolution were they chiefly to attribute the union, but that of the late chancellor of the exchequer? He considered it unnecessary to go into any detail, to prove the increase of the commerce and credit of the nation under the fostering protection of the late government, or to specify the many wise laws introduced by them for the security and welfare of the people. He was aware that he had omitted topics which might have been brought forward in just eulogium of the late ministry; but he could not forget one, on which the reputation of the late chancellor of the exchequer might be considered principally to rest; he meant his unrivalled talents in managing the finances of the country. By his sinking fund system, he had wisely contrived to uphold the public credit, and to ease the burthens of posterity; but, what was worthy of peculiar admiration was, that, in the midst of a contest of unexampled difficulty, his right hon. friend had had the resolution to leave the sinking fund untouched, and to have recourse only to legitimate sources of revenue to supply the necessary means of carrying on the contest with vigour: but he did more; for, trusting to the firmness and disinterested magnanimity of the country, even at the time when nearly two millions had been voluntarily contributed to the support of the war, he proposed the tax on income as a war impost, which was readily adopted, though it fell at the moment with peculiar weight on the country. This tax, excellent in theory, though somewhat defective in operation, was a most powerful weapon in the hands of his right hon. friend to fight the battle of the revolution, of public credit, and of the country. In fine, he might be truly said to have established a system of finance, by means of a rigid adherence to the integrity of the sinking fund, in times even of great peril, which might be called the magna charta of public credit, which no future minister would venture to depart from, and which, whilst it attracted the admiration of this and other countries, was calculated to preserve the country wealthy, prosperous, and independent.—He was now going to tread upon somewhat more delicate ground, as he was going to speak of the personal character of his right hon. friend. For seventeen years abundant in trying events had he been at the head of his majesty's councils; and though seventeen years, in the countless periods of eternity, might appear inconsiderable in the life of man, the period was not short; for if it had pleased God to have removed him from this world, at that awful moment when it was of so much importance to any man to be able to reflect that he had spent his life in active virtue, and not in idleness and dissipation, he would ask the House, whether they did not think his right hon. friend might with truth have declared, "For seventeen years I have served my country with unsullied integrity, entire personal disinterestedness, the most laborious diligence, with perfect devotion to its interests, and with constant zeal for its happiness and prosperity." That his talents were transcendent, no one would dispute; but while he was delivering this well-merited eulogium on his right hon. friend, so grateful for him to utter, and the House to hear, he was not so dazzled by the splendor of his character, as not to think that he perceived some political defects; for where was perfection to be found on earth? But these defects, far from eclipsing his fame, were only like transient clouds, that by contrast rather tended to heighten the lustre of this great political luminary. The noble lord then moved an amendment to the question, by leaving out from the word "That," to the end of the question, in order to insert these words: "it is the opinion of this House, that by the wisdom, energy, and firmness of his majesty's councils during the late arduous contest, supported by the unparalleled exertions of our fleets and armies, and by the magnanimity and fortitude of the people, the honour of this country has been upheld, its strength united and consolidated, its credit and commerce maintained and extended, and our invaluable constitution preserved against the attacks of foreign and domestic enemies."

Mr. Thornton, in seconding the amendment, said, that after what had passed, he thought it a tribute of gratitude justly due from the House to the late administration. He had uniformly been of opinion, that this country did not seek the war, but that it was forced upon us by the ambition and restless interfering spirit of the enemy. In the eventful contest that we had witnessed, it could not but be expected that disasters must occur. They had, however, been met with a manly spirit. It had often fallen to his lot to witness the spirit and talents of the right hon. gentleman against whom the original motion was pointed; and he could say with truth, that more integrity, cool deliberate penetration, and promptness of execution, he had never seen or read of in any man.

Mr. Grey thought it necessary, before the House proceeded farther, that the opinion of the Chair should be taken, whether the motion now offered could be received in the shape of an amendment. He had always understood that an amendment should partake of the nature of the original motion; but the amendment reversed the whole shape of the question. He could not help thinking that the regular mode of proceeding would be, first to negative the original proposition. The noble lord might then have an opportunity of submitting his motion in the form of a substantive proposition.

The Speaker said, that so far as he understood the forms of the House, the amendment was one which might regularly be submitted, though it certainly was of a very unusual sort.

Mr. Wilberforce conceived that the amendment was strictly consistent with order. The hon. gentleman on the other side had taken a view of the measures of his right hon. friend late at the head of his majesty's councils, and, as the result of this review, had made the motion which he had submitted to the House. The noble lord had taken a view of the same measures during the same period, and from this he had drawn an inference of a description precisely opposite, and had made it the ground of his amendment. The amendment was, therefore, not in reality different from the motion, but a different inference from the same facts. He remembered instances of similar amendments being received.

Mr. Fox contended, that if the noble lord disapproved of the original motion, he might propose an amendment, differing totally in substance, but he had no right to vary the form of the motion. The original motion was for an address to his majesty, and the amendment of the noble lord submitted to the House a distinct abstract proposition. He could not help thinking, therefore, that the amendment was irregular.

The point of order was here settled, and the debate resumed.

Mr. Gunning said, that if ever there was an occasion on which he more particularly rejoiced at having a seat in that House, it was upon one which enabled him thus publicly to declare the sentiments which he had ever entertained of the measures of the late administration, and to give way to those feelings of gratitude with which his mind was impressed when he considered that to them we were indebted for the preservation of our rights, our liberties, and independence, after a contest the most arduous. The more he reflected upon the importance of the struggle in which we had been engaged, the more reason did he see for ascribing praise to those whose unremitting efforts in the public service had enabled us, under Divine Providence, to maintain with unsullied honour, unimpaired credit, and unexhausted resources, that distinguished situation which we ever held among the nations of Europe. To the abilities, genius, and activity of the late chancellor of the exchequer was it owing, that we had survived the wreck of nations, in a contest, not entered into by the enemy for the ordinary purposes of war, but for the subversion of our constitution, and of our civil and religious establishments. It was to the destruction of these invaluable blessings that all their hostility was directed, as the only road to our defeat and ruin. For this purpose, domestic traitors were encouraged to disseminate their pernicious principles, eradicating all virtuous sentiments political and religious. Upon these means they calculated, as upon a slow, yet certain poison; but they knew not that we possessed an antidote in the wisdom, promptitude, and decision of the right hon. gentleman. In proportion as the evil grew alarming, the resources of his exhaustless mind suggested the remedy. He called for, and that House with a well-grounded confidence granted, new and proportionate powers to government for its suppression; and it was difficult which most to admire, the discretion or the firmness with which he made use of them. In vain should we have relied upon the valour and discipline of our fleets and armies, and the patriotic spirit of our countrymen, while the enemy was menacing our coasts, had not his vigilance rendered abortive designs likely to prove more fatal in their effects than the open attack of invaders. There was one subject upon which, he was sure, they could not be at variance; he meant the unqualified approbation which was due to the naval arrangements during the late contest. They would, he was confident, join with him in bestowing on a noble earl, lately at the head of the Admiralty, that tribute of applause to which his services had so justly entitled him. He trusted the House would not refuse to confirm that approbation which it had so long bestowed on the measures of the late ministers. While they remained in office, they acted with zeal, with vigour, and with integrity; when they resigned, they did so from the most conscientious motives, but in the full possession of the confidence of their country.

Sir H. Mildmay said, that he neither cordially approved the original motion nor the proposed amendment. To the former he objected in principle, and the latter he considered a very inadequate testimony of the public feelings on the conduct of his right hon. friend. From those who approved the principles of the war, and the object upon which it was undertaken and pursued, he thought a more distinct mark of applause was due to the late minister. He was the only person pointed at in the motion of censure, and he therefore thought that it was on his conduct alone that the House were bound to pronounce. He thought the attack that had been made was not cured by a general lumping vote of thanks, including a dozen different persons, whose merits, exertions, or responsibility, could by no possibility be the same. He did not think it necessary to advert to the various important measures that had distinguished the long services of the late minister, many of which were alone sufficient to justify an expression of the public gratitude, but which he thought far secondary to the great efforts and magnanimity he had displayed in protecting and preserving the constitution of the country. Others had had the merit of conducting us through wars that threatened our territorial and commercial power; but his right hon. friend had had to encounter a new system of warfare, which, in addition to the objects of all former contests, pointed its hostilities against every acknowledged principle both divine and human. France had attempted to introduce her poisonous principles here, and had tainted the minds of many; clubs were established in secret correspondence with Jacobin societies; and attempts were made in every part of the country, to introduce revolutionary opinions, and weaken the allegiance of the people to the person and government of his majesty. It required no ordinary capacity, no common perseverance and vigour to save the country from destruction under such circumstances; and he had no hesitation in ascribing the preservation of our religion, our laws, and our properties, and the security we now happily enjoy, to the efforts of the late minister; to whom, he believed, we were indebted principally for checking these principles, which would have rendered the crown on the head of his majesty precarious and insecure. It could not be expected that a contest, where we had so much at stake, could have been maintained so long, without considerable sacrifices from the people; but, great as the burthens were which they had to sustain, they had borne them with that fortitude that arose from the sense they entertained of their necessity. Very strong invective had been used against various parts of the conduct of the war; he however was satisfied, as far as the present occasion went, with its successful issue in effecting the great object of security. He contended that no war in which this country had ever been engaged had contributed to raise the character of the British arms to so high a pitch. Every Englishman would recollect with pride, the naval victories we had achieved, the perseverance and gallantry of every officer and seaman of our fleets, and the skill that had been shown, under the direction of lord Spencer, in continuing, for a period hitherto unexampled, the entire blockade of the enemy's ports, both in the channel and the Mediterranean. He challenged the hon. member to show any one instance, either by sea or land, where, with any thing like an equality of force, the event did not prove honourable to the British arms. We had wrested from the enemy many of her most valuable colonies, thwarted her in many of her most favourite objects, annihilated the whole of her marine, and possessed ourselves of the whole of her commerce, without any loss. These he thought the features of a successful war, and there was no period of it when they were more prominent, or when our prospects were more cheering, than at the time the late ministers went out of office. He could not conceive that, after nine years of expensive war, it was possible for any country to look to a more flattering prospect, either if the war was to be continued, or as affording the materials of honourable and advantageous negotiation. We had just gained a great accession of internal strength by the suppression of the rebellion and a legislative union with Ireland: we had got possession of Malta, and been successful in the Mediterranean. The unjust and unprovoked confederacy of the northern powers had just then opened a new field of brilliant exploit to our naval commanders; and the expedition to Egypt had afforded an opportunity to our army, of which they so gallantly availed themselves, to raise the character of the British arms by land to the same eminence we had acquired on the ocean. The councils that planned these expeditions, that nominated the commanders, that selected the troops, and appointed their separate destinations, were those of his majesty's late servants. Had they miscarried, the public indignation would have been directed towards his right hon. friend; and therefore, particularly at a time when we so liberally dealt out the public praise to every officer engaged in these fortunate exploits, he thought that some portion of our gratitude at least ought to be bestowed on him who would have incurred all the responsibility. —The hon. member had dwelt at much length on the general mismanagement of our finances. He would only entreat the House to look back to the embarrassed and impoverished state of the country at the period when the late chancellor of the exchequer came into office, and contrast it with the prosperous and flattering situation in which he left it. The foundation of this prosperity had been laid by his arrangements in time of peace; and even through the late war they had continued to flourish even beyond what has ever been known in times of the most profound tranquillity. Public credit abroad was only equalled by public confidence at home; and the revenue had increased in so rapid a degree, even during the war, as to exceed the most sanguine calculations of the minister himself, and enabled him, the year before he quitted office, to take credit for 3,300,000*l.* from the excess of the consolidated fund, for the services of the ensuing campaign; a fact, hitherto unknown in the history of finance. He had always, without professing much knowledge on the subject, looked, as criteria of public credit, to the price of the funds, the value of land, and the terms on which the minister was able to raise money for the public service. As to the former, we had seen the stocks gradually rising for the last three years of the war, notwithstanding a rebellion actually raging in the heart of Ireland, and a projected invasion on the part of France: the value of land had never been below 28 years purchase; and no minister had ever borrowed money on terms so advantageous to the country. A stronger proof of the opulence of the country could not be adduced, than that the present minister had been enabled, at the close of this war, by which the hon. member thinks we have been irretrievably ruined, to raise twenty-five millions for the public service, at four per cent and that he had no less than seven different individuals who offered to advance it. Some allusions had been made to the resignation of the late minister: he knew no more about it than others did: he could only bear witness to the general consternation it produced in the country.—It was “luctuosum suis, acerbum patriæ, grave bonis omnibus.” He did not mean to say that he approved indiscriminately of every act of the late minister, or that every one of his measures answered, to the fullest extent, the public expectations. He did not look for perfection; but he was satisfied that his principles of action were uniformly the same, and that his sole objects were directed to the prosperity of the empire, and the permanent security of the state. He thought that, on the whole, these objects had been pursued with great wisdom and effect, and that his right hon. friend was entitled to the approbation and gratitude of his country. He had been made the sole object of their censure in the motion, and therefore he ought to be the immediate object of their approbation, if the House thought as he did. It was like the case of a general officer, whose conduct had been impeached, who had been brought to a court martial and acquitted. Supposing the army not satisfied with the mere acquittal, but desirous to show some mark of their distinguished approbation, on whom would they bestow it? Surely not on the whole staff, but on the individual alone who was the object of attack. He could have no objection to thank the whole administration, but he thought that the late chancellor of the exchequer ought to be the subject of a distinct separate motion. He should therefore move as an amendment to the

The Speaker suggested, that this amendment could not possibly be received till the previous amendment should be disposed of.

Mr. Erskine said:—Whatever, Sir, may have been the opinion of the House as to the origin of the war, or however your support of the late administration may formerly have been justified, yet I conjure you, by the respect you must bear for the character and honor of this high assembly in all future times, not to give your sanction to a proposition so monstrous as that which the amendment recommends. The very manner in which it originated, is sufficient for its condemnation.—If the original motion asserted what was not consistent with the fact, or was subject to objections on any other account, why were they not used by the noble lord as a ground at once for its rejection, instead of making them the pretext of the confounded and fulsome eulogiums we have heard.—The noble lord considers our situation as triumphant—according to him, the vessel of the state, may be taken to be in port with her flags and streamers flying; but even if this were the case, what is it he proposes? Not to praise and thank the men who had brought her into the harbour, but those who, when she was labouring and almost sinking in the tempest, took to the boats and left her for any thing they knew to be dashed to pieces among the rocks. Yet without even the knowledge of any circumstances even to justify their having thus quitted her at so perilous a crisis; without a tittle of evidence to acquit them from censure, we are called upon to cover them with applause. In that navy whose achievements are so justly and deservedly applauded, when a ship is lost after the most notorious exertions for her safety, her officers are nevertheless in all cases, subjected to a court martial for the vindication of their conduct; but those it seems who have taken upon themselves to steer the superior vessel of the state, though it stands admitted that they deserted her even in a crisis of peril are not only not to be brought to trial, but are to have all honors ascribed to them and laurels entwined round their heads. Surely, such a proposition is quite preposterous, and ought not only to be negatived, but reprobated in terms of the most severe reproach. I oppose the motion from no personal animosity to the object of it; I admire the talents of the late minister as much as any man; he has given me no personal offence, and I can have no resentment to gratify. I resist the motion on public principles only, and condemn it if adopted as of the most evil example. I impute no blame to the noble lord for the panegyric you have heard from him; he has given way to the warmth of private friendship, a source of the honestest and purest satisfaction, the best consolation amidst the troubles of this world, but they ought to have no influence without enquiry, or rather against all evidence upon the judgments of men sitting as the representatives of an impoverished and disappointed people.—Let me also conjure you to bear in mind the time when we are called upon to assent to this extraordinary and unprecedented proposition. It is at the conclusion of a disastrous war, not concluded by the object of the motion. Of a war which for nine years and upwards, has shed the blood of our people, and exhausted our national resources. War is at all times an evil of great magnitude, even when justified by the strongest necessity; it is productive (however successful) of consequences so grievous and afflicting to humanity, that its causes and continuance should always be open to the severest scrutiny, but the war in question for which we are to applaud its authors who misconducted it, will neither as to cause or continuance admit of any justification, being begun rashly and without cause, yet continued upon the arrogant claims of “indemnity for the past, and security for the future,” neither of which have been obtained, but on the contrary leaving our adversary excluded in resources and in power, whilst near two hundred millions of our money have been expended and the liberties of the subject repeatedly invaded. Yet, with all these grounds for inquiry, or rather for criminal accusation, we are asked on the mere foundation of sounding panegyrics by his friends and supporters, to adopt the amendment that has been proposed.

But, in addition to all these objections, I must now call back your attention to the circumstances under which the late minister thought proper to retire from his majesty's councils. He withdrew suddenly, at a time when, besides all the disastrous circumstances I have adverted to, we were engaged in a dangerous dispute on a subject vital to our commercial system with all the nations of the North, one of which, and the most powerful, was governed by a prince approaching nearly to madness, and whose delirium mainly consisted in an unprovoked and determined hostility to this country.—He retired when France also was leagued with those powers, and when a struggle the most perilous that ever threatened this country, was apparently on the eve of commencing.—This was the season when the late minister, who is to day the theme of such splendid eulogiums, left the helm of the state to all the hostile elements, as I have described them. Yet he and his associates are now to be perfumed with the incense of a grateful country, while those under whose auspices those dark clouds were dispelled, by whose exertions such accumulating dangers were dispersed and surmounted, and under whose management the best safety we could hope for, has been obtained for us, are to be passed by without any monument of national approbation, and even without any notice whatsoever.—There is but one way indeed, in which it could be contended, even as an answer to national accusation, that the late minister had not deserted his duty. It may be said, that particular circumstances disqualified him from ostensibly undertaking the desirable work of peace, and that he only therefore retired for a short season behind the scene, and that though his face was hid from public observation, his comprehensive eye explored all the movements of the political machine—that every thing, in fact, continued under his control; and that the restoration of peace, which was received with so much gratitude throughout the country, was in reality his work. But, supposing this to be probable, has it in fact been established, or has there been any kind of proof upon which we could possibly proceed? The whole of this mysterious transaction, must at all events be cleared up, before I can assent to an acquittal, much less to the Amendment which has been proposed.

But there is another point of view in which this motion is open to the strongest objections. At a time when some of the most prominent members of the late administration, and the most confidential supporters and personal friends of the late minister are publicly condemning and disclaiming against the peace, and endeavouring to persuade the public that it is ruinous and disgraceful, can we who really consider it as a benefit and a blessing, be called upon to cover both him and them with our applauses? Would such a proceeding tend to consolidate the treaty that has at last so happily been concluded? Would it tend to convince the government of France, that we are at last honestly desirous to improve the good understanding which has taken place? But there is still another point of view, in which, if no other objections existed, the amendment must appear to be unfounded. If the peace, as has often and truly been said, is not so favourable to us as might have been wished, to whose misconduct is it to be ascribed? I answer, that it is to be solely ascribed to the late minister, who rejected the repeated offers of the French government when far better terms might have been commanded, and it was under the influence of his power and eloquence in this place that the rejection of these offers were approved of and sanctioned; and am I nevertheless, as an independent member of parliament, to thank that right hon. gentleman for acts deserving of an impeachment, and but that this word has almost lost its signification in this House, I should hope to see the day, when he might be brought to an account.

Let the House besides recollect, that the person whose repeated and more favourable offers of negotiation were rejected, was the same Buonaparté with whom we have now concluded a peace, and with whom the present ministers are disposed, I trust, to maintain the relations of peace—the same Buonaparté whose ambassador is now at our court, and whom, after all our lofty and scornful refusals, we have at length consented to recognise as the lawful head of the government of France—the same Buonaparté whose sincerity we have now acknowledged, and which we had just as little reason formerly to suspect. But there is no end of objections. The particular periods when these disdainful refusals of proffered amity were rejected, were peculiarly favourable for their reception. They were repelled when not a French soldier remained in Italy, whose soil had been traced and retraced by the footsteps of Russians, then the adversaries of France; and when the states of Europe had not fallen into the degraded condition to which they have since been reduced; yet it was in answer to such favourable propositions, that language of the most disgusting description was employed against the first consul of France. It was not only that we refused to treat, but even to listen to any proposition for a treaty;—it was not that we sent back to them objections to their terms of negotiation in diplomatic forms of courtesy, but rebuked them with the most offensive contempt;—and all this, to our shame be it spoken, was within these walls both sanctioned and applauded; but if we could now retrace our steps, is there a man amongst us who would renew them?—I verily believe not. Yet they were the steps in which you followed the late minister, whom we are now called upon to thank for having misled you. But were there even a colour for such a proceeding, the fair way would have been to negative the original motion, instead of resorting to this pompous interpolation: The noble lord has had his introductory “that, &c.” to amend the introductory “that, &c.” of the hon. baronet; and I too, said Mr. E. might have my “that, &c.”—On a loud cry from the Treasury-bench of “Move, Move,” Mr. E. said he would move, and moved, “That a Committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of the late administration:” but as the forms of the House did not allow of its being put, the hon. and learned gentleman withdrew it for the present, and concluded by expressing his dissent to the amendment of the noble lord.

Mr. Cartwright said, that a motion of censure having been brought forward upon the conduct of a minister who has rendered his country more service than any former minister ever did, it became that House to pass a personal vote in his favour. He entertained so high an opinion of the services of Mr. Pitt, that he should ever feel grateful to Providence for having given this country so able, so zealous, so honest an advocate, at a time of such unexampled public trial.

Mr. Wilberforce said, he gave great commendation to the terms in which the noble lord had couched his motion; it did not convey general, vague, and indiscriminate praise, but fixed upon specific advantages which the country had derived from the conduct of the late ministers. By the blessing of Providence, and the efforts of the late ministry, the vessel of the state has been rescued, not only from the waves, but from the hands of the enemy, and had been conducted triumphantly into port. With regard to the strongest ground of argument which the opposite party had chosen, the resignation of the late chancellor of the exchequer, he was happy, for that right hon. gentleman's sake, that this was their strongest ground, for it was as weak as could be imagined. That his remaining in office was accounted by them so essential to the interest of the country, was a high compliment to his talents: yet if he had at any time shown a want of zeal for the interests of his country, he deserved to be censured. But let us attend to the conduct he had pursued since his resignation, and from that we could form the best judgment of the motives which induced him to resign. Let us observe the magnanimity with which he had supported the ministry which succeeded him; the spirited and disinterested manner in which he had come forward to approve the peace which they had made: let us observe the greatness of his mind on these occasions, and then withhold our praise if we could. The merit of the late minister was of the most exalted kind; yet he could not approve of a vote of thanks to him exclusively. He, indeed, as the head of the late administration, gave energy and vigour to the whole; but his measures were all submitted to the rest of the cabinet, and modified and amended by their united wisdom. It was therefore an invidious measure, to return the thanks of the House to one member of the ministry to the exclusion of the rest. There were some parts of the late chancellor of the exchequer's conduct which deserved particular commendation. When others sunk under the prospect of the evils which threatened us, his firm and resolute conduct gave new courage and energy to the country. The merit which ranks next to this is, the public spirit with which he looked forward to the advantage of future ages, in the plans which he formed for the discharge of the burthens of the people. When it was necessary to call forth the energy of the country in its own defence, he did so with an intrepidity beyond all praise: when again the country showed a wish for peace, he was ready to comply with its wishes. When a peace had been concluded by other ministers, after he himself had retired from office, being convinced that the nation wished for peace, and that the terms of the peace were advantageous to the country, he came forward to support that peace.—With regard to the motives which induced him to retire from office, they were honourable and patriotic. Such being the merits of this great man, and such the beneficial consequences which have resulted from the conduct of the late administration, I give my most hearty assent to the amendment of my noble friend.

Sir Robert Peel said, that he had the honour to be a member of the commercial world, and had had frequent occasion to transact with the late chancellor of the exchequer, business of great difficulty and importance. From personal knowledge, he was therefore enabled to state, that no minister ever understood so well the commercial interests of the country. He knew that the true sources of its greatness lay in its productive industry, and he therefore encouraged that industry. Circumstances obliged him to lay burthens on the country, but he had first taught the country how to bear those burthens. Large debts were indeed contracted, but they were more than equalled by the increase of wealth arising from his wise measures. It was not unusual for a country to flourish in peace; but where was there another minister to be found, under whose auspices the resources of his country had been doubled in the midst of an expensive and vigorous war? Debts had been contracted; but they were all domestic debts, and the interest was spent among ourselves. Whatever might be said of our burthens, the country, under their pressure, was more flourishing than at any former period. Many things had been urged to show the evils arising from our paper money; but no issue of paper money had been made which we had not funds to support; unlike a neighbouring country, which issued paper money until its value was depreciated almost to nothing. The late minister had been the benefactor of his country, and had neglected no one's interest but his own. It had indeed been said, that though he did not enrich himself, he had secured his influence by bestowing pensions and titles on others. But he had no occasion to have recourse to such arts; he had secured sufficient support by honourable measures; three parts of the House, who were incapable of being bribed, were his friends. When such was the case, the House ought not to content themselves with a bare vote of thanks, but to bestow on him some more solid mark of their approbation. It would be disgraceful to the nation to allow such a man to retire to languish in poverty. He, for one, would be happy to contribute to prevent this; not from any personal motives, but on account of the important services he had rendered his country.

Sir G. P. Turner considered the amendment as but a small token of gratitude bestowed on the distinguished person for whom it was intended; but such as it was, he would support it from principle. He assured the House he was in no want of a pension; and if he sought for a peerage, he knew he should not get one. He had supported from principle the measures of the right hon. gentleman, because he was firmly convinced that that gentleman himself had acted from the purest principle. If the war had brought burthens with it, our property had notwithstanding been saved, our constitution unimpaired, our honour not only unsullied but exalted. As a public man, and as a private individual, he merited honours and approbation.

Colonel Wodehouse conceived, that to agree to the motion of censure, would be to vote a gross insult on the proceedings of parliament, by whom the late administration had been so honourably seconded. He was glad to offer his tribute of praise to the talents and worth of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Grey said:—Sir, I know not whether I am called upon by the motion of the noble lord to consider generally the merits of the late administration, and to approve of all the conduct of all the individuals who composed it, or to look only to one right hon. gentleman, on whom exclusively panegyrics have been heaped, and whose superior light is thought to have reflected some small degree of splendor on those who acted along with him. I must observe, that the long string of his admirers who have spoken in his praise have confined themselves to general eulogium and declamation, or to an assumption of facts which it behoved them to approve. This motion is not only unsupported by argument, but insulting to an oppressed people, groaning under the fatal effects of his misconduct. To some parts of it I do not dissent. That we have been highly indebted to the exertions of the army and navy during the late contest, every man must allow. But I think it a little unfair in the noble lord to mix the merits of the late ministers with the merits of our fleets and armies. One hon. gentleman says, that, by means of the late minister, we have gained all that we have not lost; another, that he has raised the country to an unparalleled pitch of prosperity and power; while a third asserts, that to him the king is indebted for his crown. Non tali auxilio. The Crown never was in danger, and if it had been, there was a sufficient share of loyalty and good sense in the country to defend it without any assistance from the right hon. gentleman. We are told, that the vessel of the state has outrode the storm, and now rides securely in port. In what does this security consist? Look to France, and see the situation in which we are left. There are not wanting those who affirm that the state, far from being in a port of security, can no longer entertain a hope of safety. Before I believe that we have gained all that we have not lost, I must hear very different arguments. We have now made peace with the French republic. We were called upon to do so at the beginning of the contest. What dangers would the country have known then, to which it is not now exposed? Was the republic more formidable then than at present? But we were afraid of Jacobinism. Is the existing government of France built upon Jacobinism, or is it not? Let those answer who rejected the overtures of Buonaparté, and who justified their conduct in this House. Have we forgotten the position of a right hon. gentleman, that the effect of the success of such an usurpation was a danger too tremendous to be encountered? There are few who will say, that the principles on which the government of Buonaparté is founded are less Jacobinical, than those of the other governments which have sprung up in France since the revolution. Had Robespierre been allowed to consolidate his power, would he have been less safe to be treated with? If he had found it for his interest, would he not have suppressed the clubs, silenced discussion, shackled the press, and, after worshipping the goddess of Reason, installed Christianity in the church of Notre Dame? These things have been done by one of whom such atrocities are related during his campaign in Egypt; and why might not the same line of conduct have been pursued by the other governments of France who have vexed that ill-fated country—ill-fated in having lost its liberty—fortunate in conquest and aggrandizement; but these are poor compensations for being reduced under the yoke of despotism. If peace had been made when France was driven within her ancient boundaries, would the dangers of this country have been greater? An hon. gentleman has given peculiar credit to the late minister for being ready to treat with the enemy as often as a favourable opportunity occurred. But the hon. gentleman did not mention when he was inclined to pacific measures, and when he breathed nothing but defiance. When did he consent to negotiate? In the hour of misfortune. Transient success at all times served to make him reject overtures of accommodation with the most unbounded haughtiness. When lord Malmesbury first went to Paris, Italy had been conquered and Germany overrun. Jourdan was defeated, and the negotiation broke off. What was the state of things when lord Malmesbury went to Lisle? The emperor had been compelled to conclude a separate peace, we were without an ally, and our affairs at home wore the most dismal aspect. Under what circumstances did we again refuse to negotiate? The French had been driven out of Italy; Buonaparté was sincere, because peace was his interest; the balance of power had not been for ever destroyed; and the continent of Europe did not lie at the mercy of France.—You would approve of a minister who has behaved with insolence as long as he was successful, and refused to abandon his rash and ruinous projects, except in disappointments and defeat. This resolution is to be passed after we have been forced into a peace such as England never concluded since she held her late high rank among the nations of Europe—a peace to be defended on the score of necessity, but which too clearly proves that this country is precipitated from that pitch of greatness to which the arms and the councils of our ancestors had raised it. I approved of the preliminaries and I would by no means give a vote which would endanger a renewal of the war. But I feel myself strongly inclined to alter my opinion, and my mode of acting, not only by events which have subsequently happened, but by the manner in which the peace is defended. What is the boasted port in which we are now riding securely? France has attained that power and those boundaries which few men in France, at the beginning of the contest, considered more than an idle dream. Her present limits are the Ocean, the Pyrenees, the Rhine, and the Alps. Indeed, she has gone beyond the Alps, and the Italian republic is no longer to be considered but as one of her departments. The gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us we are secure and triumphant! The maritime and commercial advantages which France has gained are not less considerable. I am convinced that the House heard with astonishment the assertion of a noble lord (Hawkesbury), that this peace secured to us a greater naval and commercial superiority than we had ever before enjoyed. The noble lord ought to have a more correct way of estimating these matters than tons of shipping or returns of exports. What are present advantages, unless we have some security for their enjoyment? Were these advantages less considerable before the war began? Consider for a moment, Sir, our prospects if we had remained at peace. Do we owe our superiority to the blood and treasure we have expended, to the taxes with which we are burthened, and to the exhaustion which we feel? I greatly fear that we have given France means to rival us upon the seas, which she never before possessed. With a sea coast from the Texel to Spain; with her ancient ports and new acquisitions in the Mediterranean, can it be doubted that she will become a great naval power? Has she no means of attacking yours? You are excluded from almost the whole continent of Europe; she has cut you out from the coast of Africa; she trades with greater advantages in India; from her formidable new position in America, she makes the United States dependant, and controls the whole of your commerce to the West Indies. Let the noble lord now say that our naval superiority is greater and more firmly established than at any former æra! To prove the fallen state of this country, I have only to appeal to the right hon. gentleman's colleagues in office. Instead of expecting approbation, does it not lie on him to clear his character? He may be innocent; but is not the reduction of a great nation to comparative imbecility and insignificance, primâ facie evidence of misconduct, which he and his friends are bound to repel?—All the gentlemen who have spoken have dwelt largely upon the unparalleled difficulties with which the late minister had to contend. Here was the assumption of a fact without any proof. Who ever began a war with such confidence? What minister had ever so few difficulties, in his own estimation, either at home or abroad? If difficulties did arise, such a man to retire to languish in poverty. He, for one, would be happy to contribute to prevent this; not from any personal motives, but on account of the important services he had rendered his country.

Here was the assumption of a fact without any proof. Who ever began a war with such confidence? What minister had ever so few difficulties, in his own estimation, either at home or abroad? If difficulties did arise, he must prove that they were not produced by his own misconduct; and that, without any fault of his, he is obliged to abandon all the objects for which he went to war, although his motto long was—

—“Potuit quæ plurima virtus Esse fuit; toto certatum est corpore regni.”

He had to struggle with financial embarrassments: when our trade was so extensive, when our credit was so high, could these arise without mismanagement? It is possible that they might; but it is too much to ask us, without inquiry and without proof, to believe that they did. Dissension relaxed the efforts of the confederacy, and at last dissolved it. But were not all his measures calculated to produce discord and jealousy? The grand object of the war was, to reduce the power of France, and to compel a government to abdicate which was inconsistent with civil society. When the destruction of a government was sought, what possible good effect could be produced by military operations in the West Indies? The loss of colonies had no effect in diminishing the influence of the rulers of France. The conquest of Martinique being achieved by those who are most dear to me, I must ever reflect on it with pleasure; but this and subsequent successes in that quarter, did not, in the remotest degree, advance the object of the war; the force sent thither was so much detached from that which should have been directed against the heart and vitals of the enemy. Was this the only evil of this selfish and impolitic plan? Could we expect that the confederacy would keep united, when it was seen that we were aiming at the aggrandisement of our own power? Distrust was generated, together with a similar desire of plunder, in all our allies. While we were pursuing schemes of conquest in the West Indies, the emperor attempted to gain a new barrier for himself in the Netherlands, and took possession of Valenciennes in his own name. When we began to struggle for what were called British objects—when an attempt was made by our troops upon Dunkirk, dismay and disgrace attended our ill directed efforts. These reverses are solely attributable to the fundamental error in the conduct of the war.—To show the right hon. gentleman's own views of the facility of the task he had undertaken, I would refer the House to his repeated declarations of France being not only on the brink, but in the very gulph of bankruptcy.

According to him, her resources were completely exhausted, and she could not keep an army in the field many weeks longer. What must be the noble lord's notion of the difficulties ministers had to encounter, when he talked of marching to Paris? Sir, our situation, for which we are to thank the right hon. gentleman, is such as to justify a peace by far the most dangerous that the British nation ever concluded. The sacrifices which we made by the preliminaries were very great; but many things have happened since which are extremely alarming, and which, had the House and the country then known, their joy would have been greatly damped. The island of Elba has been seized under circumstances which, since we are at peace with France, I forbear to state. Italy has been annexed to France; France has gained possession of Louisiana; and, what I think by no means the least important, by the non-renewal of former treaties we have lost many commercial advantages, and a wide door is opened for future altercation and animosity. The present chancellor of the exchequer said that we could not prevent the usurpations of France, since the emperor did not oppose them. What is this but a confession that England is excluded from the affairs of the continent, and that France may carry on her ambitious schemes without molestation? I was a good deal amused with the right hon. gentleman's assertion, that the island of Elba was ceded to France by a sovereign independent power, and that therefore we had no right to interfere. The late minister, affirmed, that the opening of the Scheldt was such a violation of the rights of nations, that for that alone he would have counselled a war against France. Is the annexation of the island of Elba to be compared, for one instant to the opening of the Scheldt? Yet it is permitted without a struggle; and perhaps we did not even venture to remonstrate. To such a deplorable condition have the councils of the late administration reduced us, that after the preliminaries of peace, we are obliged to consent to a prodigious augmentation of the power of the enemy. When this is the sad result of their measures, we are gravely called upon to hail them as our deliverers. The motion in itself is unprecedented, and a most unseasonable time is chosen to bring it forward. It is now above a year since these gentlemen retired from office, leaving the country in a state of unparalleed danger; and we have just concluded a peace which we reckon ourselves happy in obtaining, though unattended by security. At such a moment and on such men it is proposed to confer a mark of honour which neither the ministers of queen Anne nor the conductors of the seven years war ever received. We would represent them as having raised higher the glory of the country, and more effectually promoted its prosperity, than a Chatham or a Marlborough! I must hear something very different from what I have yet heard, before I consent to this prostitution of the honours of this House.—As the noble lord's motion is couched in such general terms, of course we must approve of every act of the late administration, their conduct of the war, their behaviour to foreign powers, their negotiations, and their refusals to negotiate. See in what inconsistency the House will be involved. The question is between the late and present administration. You have approved of the peace, such as it is; but I ask, whether the disadvantages of that treaty are not in a great measure, to be ascribed to the rejection of Buonaparté's overtures? Is there any man bold enough to affirm, that we might not, in 1800, have obtained terms of comparative honour, power, and security? With the fatal consequences before its eyes, does the House now approve of that rejection? If Louisiana has given France the command of North and South America; if she be mistress of Italy; if the island of Elba forms part of her territory; if she is virtually in possession of Malta (for to talk of the independence of the order is downright trifling), the insolent rejection of Buonaparté's overtures has wrought all these calamities.—A majority of his majesty's cabinet ministers retired last session of parliament; for whether they were dismissed or resigned, is not here worth disputing. For the general policy of their councils we are not to look to the individual sentiments of any particular member, however great his influence. His approbation of the present peace may or may not be a proof of his pacific disposition at a former period, when he talked about "a lucky escape." But the majority of his colleagues have declared the peace disgraceful and ruinous. Four have already openly stated their sentiments; and, if rumour is to be believed, others will embrace the next opportunity to do the same. Therefore they never would have counselled the king to conclude this peace, which the House has so loudly applauded. If the House passes this resolution, it condemns the peace which it formerly approved, and will, I have no doubt, in the course of a very few days again approve. Let me ask you to pause, and to show some regard for your consistency, your dignity, your reputation. The noble lord talked much about the tone of diplomatic transactions. From the insolent tone in which the late administration talked to the enemy, peace must have been for ever unattainable. Their grand object seemed to be, to exasperate the nations, and to render their enmity perpetual. One hon. gentleman stated, that the war had been generally successful, and that there had been no failure where British troops were equal in numbers to their opponents. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten the repeated motions made from this side of the House upon repeated failures? Has the hon. gentleman forgotten the attempt upon Dunkirk, where we yielded to inferior numbers? Has he forgotten the fatal and disgraceful expedition to Holland, where a British army was obliged to capitulate to an inferior force? We were told that a powerful diversion was effected. I have always understood that the object of a diversion was to employ a larger by a smaller force. But a more numerous British army than the duke of Marlborough ever commanded was here cooped up by these men whom we are going to thank, without an opportunity to promote the cause of their country. I would wish the hon. gentleman to recollect the expeditions against Ferrol and Cadiz, and the history of the armament meant to assist the Austrians in Italy, but which did not reach the Mediterranean till the fate of Europe had been decided in the plains of Marengo, and which, but for an accident, would have sailed into the port of Genoa, then in possession of the French. No man contemplates with greater exultation than myself the last campaign in Egypt. The troops of no nation ever gained greater glory. But, far from this success being to the credit of the late ministers, they deserve censure and punishment for having exposed these brave men to dangers too great in the ordinary course of human events to be encountered with the smallest hope of victory. Our troops were victorious chiefly from their own discipline, skill, and heroism; but in no considerable degree from the misconduct of the enemy. If any doubt is entertained of the criminality of ministers in sending out this expedition, let an inquiry be instituted, and I engage to make good the charge at your bar.—Now, Sir, let me be permitted to offer a few observations on the financial state of the country which the right hon. gentleman is praised for having so considerably improved. The financial talents and knowledge of that right hon. gentleman I am perfectly ready to admit. I do not, however, hesitate to declare, that his rash and desperate attempts at innovation in finance have involved the country in greater difficulties in that respect than it has ever been entangled in at any former period. Into this subject I had on a former occasion attempted to persuade the House to institute an inquiry; but my motion was objected to, as of too general a nature; yet my endeavour went no farther than to give an opening to a committee to inquire into the financial transactions of the right hon. gentleman. If that motion was justly objected to as too general, how much more objectionable is the present motion, which goes to give a lumping vote of praise to the general administration of the right hon. gentleman, and that without any previous inquiry, and upon the result of a single debate! But, what is there that deserves the thanks of this House in his financial exertions? Is he to be thanked for having more than doubled the national debt, and for having expended, during the late war, more than was expended during the wars of Queen Anne, king William, &c. nay, all the wars since the Revolution? Is this the proof of the financial prosperity in which the right hon. gentleman has placed the country? The hon. baronet has concurred in one censure, at least, of the financial conduct of his right hon. friend, namely, the remittance to the emperor without the consent of parliament. The hon. baronet has also lamented, and expressed his uneasiness respecting the restrictions on the Bank, a measure which is generally acknowledged to be inconsistent with the true principles of credit. By whose misconduct was that misfortune brought upon the country? To whom was it to be ascribed, in the opinion of the directors and governor of the Bank. The report of the committee told the House that it was imputable to the failure of the right hon. gentleman to make good the debt due by government to the Bank. The restrictions on the Bank also gave rise to almost all the forgeries for which so many daily fall victims to the law. Even now, after the vessel of the state has triumphantly entered the port of security, it is deemed unsafe to take off this restriction, neither is there any reason to expect that it will soon be taken off. Here, then, is another financial measure, the result of the right hon. gentleman's contrivance, which does not call for a vote of thanks. But perhaps the income tax will atone for any thing blamable in the former measure! Surely there never was proposed a tax more repugnant to the spirit of a free constitution. But what is become of that tax? Is it not now to be added to the permanent debt of the country? For have the terms of the loan been strictly adhered to? But his great financial merit is no doubt built on his plan of the sinking fund, and his adherence to that system! Has not the spirit of that plan been wholly abandoned, or at least considerably impaired, during the present session, and that with the advice of the right hon. gentleman? Can the public now derive any advantage from that plan? and is not the burthen transferred from the present House of Commons, and imposed on posterity? Here, then, are specific objections against the financial merits of the right hon. gentleman, in which, however, his strong hold is supposed to consist. And should not the House, therefore, pause before they proceeded to an unqualified vote of praise on his general administration? But the right hon. gentleman kept up the funds: is the glory or the prosperity of the country to be measured by the depression or rise of the 3 per cents? On this subject I would beg the House to recollect the observations of Mr. Hume on the reigns of Charles and James 2nd. I would also wish them to recollect what was formerly the wealth and commercial prosperity of Holland. They will then, perhaps, be inclined to look for better criteria of the security and honour of a nation than the mere price of stocks. States may, perhaps, be compared to patients who labour under certain disorders—they wear, indeed, the complexion and flush of health, but an internal decay preys upon their vitals. That the right hon. gentleman possesses great talents, no man is readier to acknowledge than I am: his eloquence, his dexterity at debate, may be unrivalled; but his talents are rather showy than solid, and better calculated to defend bad, than to produce good measures: his government was most iniquitous and oppressive in many respects, and utterly destitute of true policy. Viewing it as I do, in that light, it is impossible for me to assent to the amendment.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that he felt himself called upon to state the grounds on which he should give his vote for the motion of his noble friend; but before he entered on the general arguments of the hon. gentleman, he could not help adverted to that part of his speech which related to his noble friend's making that motion, which motion he would assert arose out of another motion, which had been made by an hon. baronet (sir F. Burdett), who on that occasion moved, in substance, a censure upon the late administration; and the present motion became still more necessary, as it arose out of a speech made by that hon. baronet previous to his motion; for, after an attack so pointedly made on his right hon. friend (Mr. Pitt), it was due to him who had been for so many years the minister of this country, it was due to the House which had for so many years given him their support, not to suffer the motion made by the hon. baronet, and the speech which preceded it, to pass over with a mere negative, but to institute a parliamentary proceeding, stating the reverse of such motion, which could not be done without expressing the approbation of that House of the conduct of his right hon. friend and colleagues throughout the arduous struggle in which they had been engaged.—The hon. gentleman had adverted to the subject of the war which was just concluded, and had mixed with his observations upon that subject some comments upon the treaty of peace. In the general view of things, it was perfectly fair for him so to do. On the subject of the war, the hon. gentleman, however, and others who had taken the same mode of argument on former occasions, had made a mistake in the character of the war, and the mode of considering it; they had considered the contest which we had just concluded as that of an ordinary war; such as a war for general principles of national interest—a general balance of power—or for the purpose of resisting the aggrandizement of a rival power. It was in no such view that the war we had just concluded ought to be considered. This war tended to bring about a revolution in the manners of men, and had its foundation in principles totally different from any other war in which this country was engaged. It was different in its moral effect, as introducing principles which threatened to overturn the moral principles of every other power in Europe. But the hon. gentleman had asserted, that in this war we were the aggressors. Now, by every party that had succeeded in France, it had been acknowledged, that France had been the aggressor. He did not deny, that in some of the provisional executive governments, there might be persons desirous of avoiding a war with this country; but the National Convention had determined upon war; and it was impossible for any provisional executive in France, with such a disposition in the Convention, to avert that calamity. The war arose from necessity, from the principles that were prevalent in France previous to its commencement, disposed as France was to receive the seditious of every country; publishing, as it had, principles utterly subversive of all order, destructive of all property, of all moral obligation, of every thing that was dear to man; with such a country, professing and publishing such principles, it was impossible to be long at peace. The war was a calamity, in such circumstances, that was unavoidable. But the hon. gentleman asked, whether the ground of argument, on Jacobin principles, did not now exist, in the same force and degree, against the government of France, as it did when this country first opposed it on that account? To which he would answer, that Jacobin principles not only did not exist in the same force and degree; but, in the way in which the hon. gentleman stated that matter, they did not exist at all. The hon. gentleman had asked, if Jacobin principles did not give birth to the present government of France? That was not the mode of considering the question; it was not material to consider what gave birth to the present government—the question to us was, what were its professions now? And, in that respect, there had been a complete change in the government of France. The present government of France had published to the world a recantation of every principle of Jacobinism, and of every other principle from which danger was apprehended, in a manner as satisfactory, as far as professions could be such, as the most decided enemy of Jacobin principles could desire. However he might regret the fate of the house of Bourbon, without considering whether that house was likely to be restored or not in the course of the war, yet, if it had been for nothing more than a change of the dynasty, the contest would not have been carried on; but the contest here was owing to the entire change of principles upon which the government had been carried on; all principles of established governments had been overturned, and it would have been at any time sufficient ground for other countries to adopt measures for the resistance of such principles, as being utterly hostile to all government whatever, they being in their nature calculated to overturn all constituted authorities; and they had been declared incapable of maintaining peace and amity with other powers, not because they were a republic, but because they were a government, the like of which never before existed, on which no republic even was ever formed, proceeding upon a system that was truly subversive of every maxim and every rule of action that had hitherto been found to contribute to the happiness of mankind. He might be asked, however, what he thought of the recantation which had been made of those principles, and whether he thought they gave evidence of recurrence to ancient principles? To which he answered, he was aware that whatever would be the desire of persons in France, after such a conclusion, it would be impossible for them to set up an establishment upon the best of models, for they must take their materials as they found them. In the mean time, he thought credit was due to their profession, as far as it ought to be respected by foreign powers; for they had publicly asked pardon of God and man, and had done every thing they could to revert to the ancient established principles of government; and their measures, in every point he had been able to view them, had that tendency. He thought it an important consideration, with reference to this peace, or to any peace that could be concluded, when some of the objections which had been started to the peace were removed; and it was then a question, if no credit were to be given to these recantations, how far it would be prudent in this country to drive them again to revolutionary measures, where they must abandon the system which they had now adopted, and proceed in the very same course which rendered them incapable of maintaining peace and amity with other powers.—He was now come to that part of the argument in which the hon. gentleman had asked, what period of the war it was, at which we might not have had more advantageous terms of peace than the present? To which he again answered, that he desired the hon. gentleman to show any period, from the commencement of the war to January, 1800, in which we had any chance whatever of any peace. The hon. gentleman had complained, that no proposition came from us at any time for peace, when we ourselves, or our allies, had been successful; but that our attempts at negotiating were always in the hour of our distress. The hon. gentleman had forgotten that a proposition to negotiate had been made by the late chancellor of the exchequer, at Basle, which was at a period when the Austrians had been successful. He was not now stating, whether government was right or wrong as to the terms which were insisted upon; but he was stating, in answer to the objections of the hon. gentleman, for the purpose of showing, that no peace could be made with France at that period; and it was not a question of terms, but of principle, which principle was, on the part of France, to make no peace at all; and he had no difficulty in saying, that had there been no alteration in that principle, it would have been impossible for this country to have succeeded in negotiating in any manner whatever.—The noble lord then took a view of the observations of the hon. gentleman on the subject of the negotiation in 1800, and maintained, that it was not probable we should have had better terms at that time than the present; the French being then in possession of various places which he enumerated, Genoa, Malta, Egypt, &c. and which they afterwards lost by the fate of war. He observed also, that Austria and Russia were at that time willing to continue the confederacy, and to prosecute the war, and contended that there was at that time a chance of improving the condition of Europe by its continuance, and therefore it was prudent in us to decline the proposals which were then made; besides which, it was to be remembered, that France had gone on in a ten-years revolutionary career, and had had ten revolutions in that time; so that there was no reliance to be placed on the stability of its government. Having stated this much upon the circumstance of the different negotiations proposed at that period; being satisfied that the war arose out of the moral effect of the French revolution; that no human prudence could have prevented it; being sure that, from the commencement of the war to January, 1800, there never was an option given to this country as to war or peace—he would admit, that in January, 1800, there was stated a different ground; but still it did not follow that it might not have been prudent to prefer the chances of war to the chances of peace.—He should now come, in its order, to consider the conduct of the war; but before he did this, he would say a few words on the observations which the hon. gentleman had made on the definitive treaty of peace. He certainly felt that, upon that subject, there was not the satisfaction or the security to Europe that could have been wished, or might have been once expected; but it did not thence follow, that any blame was imputable to the late ministers for their conduct in the management of the war, nor did it follow that there was any blame imputable to the present ministers for the conclusion of peace. The question of war or peace could only be decided by looking at the alternative of peace or war, by looking at the advantages and disadvantages of both, and making a choice between them; and he did think, that whatever might be the security of Europe at this time, there was, at the time of making peace, no chance whatever of Europe being placed in a better state of security, by this country refusing to make peace. He thought the peace, under all the circumstances, wise, not only for our own security, but for the security of the rest of Europe; for it was the interest of all Europe that we should husband our resources, and not waste our strength upon that pursuit which, under all the circumstances of the contest, was not likely to be very useful, either to Great Britain or the rest of Europe. He thought the state of Europe was not so secure as could have been desired; but when he came to think of the advantages and disadvantages of peace and war, and compared them together, there was no doubt remaining with him as to the course which this country ought to pursue. Now, as to the relative or comparative situation of this country and France, he was prepared to maintain, that there never was a period in which the maritime, commercial, and colonial strength of Great Britain, when compared with that of France, was so great as at the present moment. The hon. gentleman had gone into the conduct of the war, and had enumerated what he considered failures; and certainly some events deserved that name, for certain expeditions had failed of their intended objects. But when expeditions were undertaken, they must be so under considerations of success and of failure; for among the wisest expeditions ever attempted, there must be some failures; but, as far as regarded the separate conduct of this country, there never was a war which was more eminently successful. He believed this was the first war in which no British colony had been wrested from the British crown; where we were so triumphant in every quarter where the British force had been separately employed. If we looked at the result of the efforts of British force, when separately exerted, there never was a war so brilliant as this had been to Great Britain. As to the other powers, he should not at present say much; but if the conduct of any administration was to be tried in the course of a great war, it was not fair to try them on those exertions which they had not the whole conduct of themselves, but in which their efforts were in conjunction with others; and yet it would appear, that, even in this view of the matter, if other powers had been as true to themselves as we had been to ourselves and to them, there would have been less failure than there had been, and no fault was to be imputed to the government of this country on that account.—The hon. gentleman had adverted to the financial state of the country in the course of the present war, and to the conduct of his right hon. friend, in that part of the war in which he should have expected he would have met with the approbation of every man in this country, that of adhering to the system which had been adopted for the reduction of the national debt. The hon. gentleman had said, that by this war the national debt had been doubled; that might be true; but the national debt had been doubled by every war since the Revolution. But when the nature of that debt, and of the taxes laid on, was considered, there would be found no blame imputable to his right hon. friend, unless they could show that the war could have been conducted with less expense than it had been; on the contrary, he considered this as a proof of the merit of his right hon. friend, not because the debt was so great (that was matter of regret to him and to every body), but because the bur-

thens to support this debt had been so laid on as to affect in a slight degree only the commerce, the prosperity, the comfort, and the domestic happiness of the people of this country. With regard to the sinking fund, he was surprised that the hon. gentleman should have detracted from the merit of his right hon. friend in that particular. The plan for that purpose was wise; but it was not the wisdom of the plan that he so much admired, although that was great, as the determination to persevere in it under all the circumstances of the most extraordinary war. His right hon. friend had the merit of adopting, and of adhering to, the system by which the whole debt now standing against us would be annihilated in half the time that it had been accumulating, from its commencement to the present time.—Whether the war was necessary or not, was a question which he need not now argue; it had been often decided by that House; and he believed that at this moment nine-tenths of the country were not only of opinion that the war was just and necessary, but that the internal peace of the country would not have been preserved, nor could we have been able to contend with the difficulties which the French revolution imposed on us, if these measures had not been adopted. The noble lord then proceeded to take a view of the union between Great Britain and Ireland, which made an important feature of the administration of his right hon. friend, and for which he deserved the highest commendations; which had already produced many good effects, but which posterity would regard with admiration, astonishment, and gratitude to its authors. Under these circumstances, he felt himself called upon to agree to the amendment proposed by his noble friend.

Mr. Wellesley Pole supported the amendment, and praised the conduct adopted by the late minister with respect to Ireland, which he maintained had been freed from her foreign and domestic enemies by his vigilance and wisdom. He descanted on the vast commercial advantages accumulated by the prudent measures of the late administration, and concluded with stating that they were justly entitled to the thanks of the House.

Mr. Fox said:—Sir, I confess I had some reasons for wishing to delay offering myself to your notice till a late period of the debate: not that I might enter upon the discussion with more advantage after hearing the arguments of those who might precede me, but that, by rising at an advanced period of the debate, I might know with more correctness and certainty what line I had to pursue. Sir, the grounds that have been laid down are of three kinds; and first, though the orders of the House admit of such an amendment as the present being entertained, yet I conceive it to be one of the most irregular, unfair, extraordinary, and unjustifiable proceedings that ever was adopted. Why did not the noble lord follow the usual mode of giving a direct negative to the motion? Has he evinced much dexterity by a contrary line of conduct? The object was, to persuade the House to approve of the late administration. To do that directly and boldly, after the events that have occurred, and the situation in which the country has been placed, was felt to be something too strong. The noble lord was first induced by the observations that were made a short time ago by a worthy baronet (sir F. Burdett). That the House had not been famous for acceding to inquiries he well knew; but he thought of a better mode. An hon. gentleman had given notice of a motion for a vote of censure upon Mr. Pitt by name. This was an opportunity which the noble lord availed himself of to make a motion of a diametrically contrary tendency. Yet still he felt that direct praise might not be agreeable. When, therefore, it was proposed to censure Mr. Pitt by name, then does the noble lord propose to pass a vote of praise upon his majesty's councils. The motion, however, is more general still: he connects with his approbation of his majesty's councils, approbation of the conduct of this House, and of the army and navy. Now, Sir, upon the conduct both of the army and navy, we have passed many a specific vote, and the noble lord knew he was treading upon popular ground. But he goes farther yet, and includes in his motion, applause of the conduct of the people of Great Britain. This is the most unusual proceeding I ever heard of. He says, you, the army have done your duty; you, the navy; and you, the Commons; and you, the people of England, are above all praise in supporting us. Now, Sir, it has been usual, when we have moved to thank any particular person, that that person should retire; whether it would not, in the present case, be decent for us all to retire, I know not, but really, the noble lord has made a general lumping dish of praise, of which we have no example. The original motion introduced by an hon. gentleman near me, very ably, certainly, in many of its points; but I own I am not tempted to agree with him in all. First of all, Sir, I should not consent to thank his majesty for dismissing Mr. Pitt, before I knew whether he did dismiss him or not. Again, I should not consent to thank him, before I was informed upon what grounds he dismissed him. What those grounds were I certainly have not the means of knowing; but we have reason to believe, that he and his colleagues retiring was occasioned by their wishes to do something that had a tendency to emancipate, and assimilate the situation of the Catholics of Ireland more to that of the Protestants, than it is at present. I use the word emancipation, because it has been generally used in speaking upon this subject. These wishes were opposed, and they took the honourable part of resigning their situations. Sir, if that was the real cause of the right hon. gentleman's resignation, it has my unqualified approbation. I should say, that "nothing in his administration became him like the leaving it." Sir, I think I know myself well enough to say, that I am not influenced by any spirit of ancient rivalry; but I must add, that whatever praise the right hon. gentleman deserved for the cause of his resignation, he has forfeited it all by subsequent events. If he thought that it was a great cause, agreeable to the principles of humanity, and necessary to the prosperity of the country, why then I am of opinion, that when he retired upon such an occasion he ought to have come to parliament and have declared his motives. If any strong bias existed, as we have been told, against the question of Catholic emancipation, we should have seen and known it after the subject had been stated to both Houses. If I am answered, that, though the object desired to be attained was a good one, it could only be good if done by government, I reply, that that was no reason for its not being tried. Had the minister come openly and honourably to this House, and said, "such and such is my opinion and my motives," and have said also, "whoever succeeds me must be responsible for the consequences that ensue," I think we should have carried the question; but at least we should have known the fact. Sir, I have no grounds for deciding whether this was the real cause of Mr. Pitt's resignation or only the pretext; but I think I have sufficient foundation for believing, that the principle had not taken very deep root in his mind. I therefore, for one, should be against voting an address to his majesty upon the subject. —We come now to the second point. That the present ministers have done a great service to the country by giving us peace, I admit: but, however we may approve of the peace generally, still the terms upon which it was made must be defended by the state of the country as it was left by their predecessors; and, vice versa, the defence of the former ministers must be derived from a condemnation of the terms of the peace, and of their successors. I say, that the present ministers must defend themselves upon the situation to which their predecessors had reduced the country, the late ministers must defend themselves by condemning the measures and the peace made by the present ones; and to do them justice, they have all, except Mr. Pitt, adopted this manly ground. The late secretary for foreign affairs, lord Grenville, is a man of whose conduct I grievously disapprove, particularly that part of it which related to the answer returned to the first overture of Buonaparte; but no one will say that that noble lord is not a man of great abilities and a manly character. Lord Grenville, I repeat, takes his stand upon this point. He says, not as the Jacobins state, that the peace was rendered necessary by the situation in which the country was left by the late ministers, nor as the half Jacobins assert, that the peace was suitable to circumstances; but he says, "we would not have made peace upon such terms; the country was not reduced to such a state as to render it necessary to accede to them; we would have continued the war, and we are confident that our resources would have accomplished the objects we had in view." Lord Grenville, then, has taken the only manly ground. It is on this principle that that noble lord, Mr. Windham, and earl Spencer, have justified themselves. I have heard that the late lord chancellor has done something like it. With respect to the right hon. gentleman to whom the conduct of the war was more immediately entrusted (Mr. Dundas), he has so seldom favoured us with his company this session (a reproach that, to be sure, comes whimsically enough from me), that we are not acquainted with his opinion. These gentlemen adopt at least a manly style of proceeding. Yet the vote of praise now moved applies to them as well as to Mr. Pitt. The noble lord seems to pass over them in a general way. He says, there were others certainly in very responsible situations, but Mr. Pitt must be considered as the principal. Now, Sir, however that may be, the names of lord Grenville, Mr. Windham, and lord Spencer, can never be considered as mere stop-gaps. Such a doctrine would be strange upon any occasion, but it would be particularly so in the present case. We cannot guess what the opinions of lord Grenville are from Mr. Pitt, nor what Mr. Pitt's are from lord Grenville. Nay we know now that they must have been at constant variance. These are the true grounds; but are they political grounds for saying that it is desirable to lump them all together in one general vote of praise? There is indeed great generosity in the proceeding. These gentlemen come, day after day, and move for papers; they produce daily discussions, and they are complained of as going farther than ever we did, though it is not meant to be said that their opposition is factious. Now, Sir, we think it a little hard that we should not be put under the same cover as they are, and that we should have that epithet applied to us which is not imputed to them, though they are accused of going farther than ever we did. At length, however, comes this whimsical interruption. You say to them, only desist from accusing us for a few minutes, while we are thanking you [A laugh]. Sir, what are we to take into our consideration? We are to view the late administration in the aggregate; we are to ascertain the result and the effects of their measures—to contemplate the country as they found it, and as they left it. In 1792, France, says the noble lord, was the aggressor. This position I shall always deny. France declared war first, but it does not follow, that that power which declares war first must of necessity be the aggressor. If the anecdotes mentioned by the noble lord be true, still I contend that you were the aggressors, because you did not adopt the regular means enforced by the law of nations, of putting an end to your differences by negotiation. But, grant that France was the aggressor. Well, Sir, in 1792, war was declared. It is a long period to go back to;

but let us consider a little the circumstances of those times. The same dextrous attempts were made then as have been made this night, to reconcile principles and people of the most opposite description. Now, Sir, how has the war been conducted as a war intended to destroy the French government? We say to the French, if you take Holland we shall take Martinique, and so on in the way of capture for capture; but how will this destroy the French government? You might have had for the attainment of that object the assistance of Frenchmen themselves. I do not mean merely of emigrants, but of Vendéans and royalists; but how could you expect their assistance, when you took such pains to show them that your object was not their interest, but to rob and destroy the French territory, and to parcel it out among you and your friends? In the first campaign you took Valenciennes for the emperor. You took Dunkirk for yourselves. That, you said, was a British object, and therefore it was taken possession of in the name of Great Britain. But is this all? No. Lest there should be a doubt with respect to your views, when you take Valenciennes, the garrison of which, it is known, as well as that of Dunkirk, surrendered by capitulation, you stipulate, that they shall not serve against yourselves, Prussia, or Austria; but you do not stipulate that they shall not serve against the Vendéans. Here you give up your friends in La Vendée, and show yourselves perfectly indifferent to their fate; and the result actually is, that these garrisons are sent into La Vendée, and the troops previously serving there are withdrawn. But the noble lord says, that though Jacobinism be not destroyed in France, yet the war has had the effect of substituting a better government in its stead. Was it, then, the English arms that destroyed the Brissotines, the Robespierres, and the various other successive factions of France, and introduced the government of Buonaparté upon the extinction of the directories? I contend, on the contrary, that the reign of that horrible monster Robespierre, was prolonged by the war. For when you so plainly showed your designs against France, you cooled the ardour of every Frenchman in your cause, you made him resign himself blindly to his fate, and rally round the government of his country, rather than assist those whose sole object was so plainly avowed to be its destruction. We are told that the ways of Providence are inscrutable, and that it is vain to attempt to penetrate the mysteries of fortune. No man, it must be confessed, ever enjoyed a greater share of fortune than Buonaparte, so much indeed, that there have been times when he would have been called the favourite of the Gods; but, wonderful as his fortune is allowed to be, what should we think of it, if he should show that, for nine years past, the English have been fighting for his government, and spending their blood and treasure for its promotion; that it is not their blindness and obstinacy that have served him, but that they are the willing instruments of his power, and that they take credit for their intentions and successful endeavours to raise him to his throne. The noble lord has said, that no peace with France of any description could be had by any possibility before the year 1800. Now, it is well known, that so early as 1793, Maret was here endeavouring to negotiate a peace, which would have included Holland, Belgium, and Savoy. What is our situation now? As to Belgium, so far from saving it, I do not believe that any attempt even to mention its name has been made in any late negotiation. Holland and Spain are both dependent upon France; the Cisalpine republic is more closely connected with her; Switzerland and Genoa still closer; Etruria is nearly in the same state; and she has obtained the complete boundary of the Rhine. It was reckoned scarcely a pardonable extravagance in a young prince, flushed with victory and in his first conquest, to boast that he would have no boundaries for France, except the Mediterranean and the Pyrenees. It was very true, these were not her precise boundaries at present, but, looking to what she had gained on the side of the Baltic, it could not be said that they were less comprehensive. Now, on the head of security, are we to be told, that, by the single difference of the person, we are in less danger at present than we were at any previous period of the war? I should certainly prefer Robespierre to Buonaparte, as a person less formidable from his talents; but if, in addition to the superior talents of Buonaparte I am also to take into account all the other differences between them arising from the great extent of his power, and the increased influence and dominions of the republic. I contend that at no period have we been less secure against the power of France. Next comes the question of Jacobin principles. Upon this subject an hon. member says that Jacobin principles not having taken deep root in England, they have been cured here by the war; but that in Ireland, where they were inveterate, they have been cured by the peace. Now, the reason, I believe, is this: I believe that they existed in Ireland, and, therefore, were cured by the peace; but here, they did not exist at all, and, therefore, here the war could not cure them. But admitting that they did exist in England in some degree, and in Ireland in the extreme, what is the inference to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's statement? Why, that peace is the fit remedy; for if it cured the greater, surely it must be an adequate remedy for the lesser evil? I desire to know how war will prevent Jacobin principles? People sitting under easy taxes and living in comfort, are not likely to be seduced into resistance to the government. But war neither produces domestic comfort nor light taxes. The noble lord talks also of the resignation of the people; it is a phrase of very ambiguous meaning. If by the resignation of the people it is to be understood that they are resigned to the will of God, and those accidents and calamities to which human nature is liable, I admire this disposition of their minds; but if I am to understand, that they have quietly resigned themselves to all the calamities of a war during its continuance, and rejoice the moment that they have got rid of it, that is not the character I wish of my countrymen. The noble lord then goes on to say, that they have not only acted with resignation, but with disinterestedness. This is another phrase that may admit of many interpretations. If by disinterestedness be meant a total neglect of their own interest, I do not commend it; if it mean the preference of the interest of others to their own, it may be laudable, according to the circumstances; but what has been the disinterestedness of the people in the late war? They have reduced themselves to want, and stripped themselves of their comforts, for no object. If it be for this conduct that they are commended, I do not much approve the epithet. If they have been, under such circumstances, so disinterested as not to listen to a Jacobin seducer, surely they would listen still less to him if they were free from heavy taxes, and in the full enjoyments of those comforts which the war abridged. How war prevents Jacobins, then, is beyond my comprehension. But this, we are told, was a war in defence of the constitution, and, therefore, not an ordinary war. Now, I want to know, what war, since that concluded by the peace at Ryswick, down to the present day, except the seven years war, has not been directed against the English government? This was the case in the duke of Marlborough's war. It was so in the war accompanying the rebellion in 1745. In short, that has been the nature of all the wars with France. To this it is answered, that those wars were mere trifles, compared with the war which is just terminated. This is the way in which orators and statesmen always talk of the present time. Were then tyranny, popery, and the destruction of the constitution, as carried on in the system which prevailed in the four reigns of the Stuarts, were these mere trifles? The fact is, they are all the same. The evil of the present time is always considered the greatest, and every minister resists it by all the means in his power. Now, with respect to any who may have acted upon French principles, though I doubt whether there really be such persons, the number, it seems, is very elastic. Mr. Burke has stated them at so many thousands, I believe 80,000. and again I find, when it answers the purpose, they are represented only as a few, without credit, influence, or zeal. Admitting, however, that there are such persons, I have a right to presume that they are few, as the number taken up is exceedingly small, and those who have been legally charged as such have been fewer. To this it may be objected, that the number is nothing: and that there are other things more material to be taken into the account. I admit that the duke of Monmouth, and one or two persons of great consequence, would, by their great influence outweigh numbers; but of what description are the persons who have been taken up as Jacobins in this country during the late war? So far from being persons of influence, it has been made matter of ridicule to suppose that they could be affected by the new taxes, considering them as a set of people totally destitute of property. You have among them Mr. Jones, Mr. Bonner, and others; and for these Mr. Pitt is to have a civic crown, as if he had destroyed so many

Catilines. It is surely absurd to attach such importance to such individuals, and to say that the conduct of such men as the duke of Ormond and sir W. Windham, a man of the greatest talents and influence of his time, when acting in concert with the Pretender to overthrow the constitution and government, was a slight danger.—Again it was said, that the more poor, the more dangerous; because, the more destitute of property themselves, the more ready to destroy it. But it was well known, that influence accompanies property, and that it was thus the duke of Orleans had so great an influence in bringing about the revolution in France.—If the numbers were very great, if they amounted to half of the population of the country, Mr. Fox said, he would be ready to admit them to be dangerous, however destitute of property; but when we were told from judicial authority, that they were few in number, and without zeal or ardour in the cause, he could not consider them as formidable. So far, then, for the great merit of the late ministers, in resisting the force and power of Jacobins. We are told next, that, under their direction, we have withstood the torrent of jacobinism, which has destroyed every other country in Europe. Now look at Holland; the revolution was produced there by the aristocratic party, in opposition to the Stadtholder. I shall not, however, dwell upon Holland; you may take it; Switzerland, and Italy also. But look at the king of Prussia; has Prussia been revolutionized? Is there a Directory at Berlin, or Magdebourg; or have the kingdoms of Austria and Russia been changed into republics?—Mr. Fox proceeded to shew that thanks could not be given to the late ministers jointly, as Mr. Pitt and lord Grenville now maintained such opposite opinions respecting the peace. The one or the other must have been acting wrong with regard to the war when they were in the cabinet. Who would thank lord Grenville for his answer to Buonaparté's first overtures? No one had justified it, and he would venture to say it had been read all over Europe with disgust. If the House went into a committee, these points must be decided; but the present general vote avoided this difficulty, by voting thanks, without inquiry, in the lump. Should they be thanked for expelling the French from Egypt? They shut the French up in Egypt, and compelled them to keep possession of it, in defiance of the proceedings of a brave and gallant officer, sir Sidney Smith, who negotiated for their evacuation. Were they to be thanked for rejecting Buonaparté's overtures, because he had not given a proof of his power? They rejected them because they would not desert their allies; and they pleaded in apology, that they made peace because their allies deserted them. They should have known, that at the time they rejected these overtures, the allies were not to be relied upon. Ministers were answerable for the alliances they formed. They contended that all their plans had succeeded; their means had succeeded, but they had failed in their ends, because their means were not applicable to their ends. Mr. Pitt was praised for his skill in finance. Mr. Fox acknowledged his quickness, but doubted his judgment respecting our resources. He always approved his plan of the sinking fund, but thought it extraordinary and absurd to praise him for persevering in a plan of his own found successful. He never could call a man a great financier who proposed the income tax, an impost against all principle of taxation; it was, in fact, a confiscation of property. If the late and present chancellor of the exchequer were not on such a friendly footing, there would be a danger of their quarrelling about the 56 millions for which the income tax was pledged; the one would not allow it to be a part of our permanent debt; the other made it so.—Mr. Fox reviewed Mr. Pitt's conduct in the stoppage of the Bank, and censured it; but the most important object was the constitution. He should ever remain of opinion, that liberty was the fundamental cause of all our greatness. He would not say, that no occasions could occur for suspending it; but those who conceived themselves aggrieved and imprisoned, should be left the means of redress. A precedent was set of suspending our liberties, which rendered them of small value. He compared the ground of alarm and the cause of suspension, with the cause of alarm in the rebellion in 1745; and showed that the danger of the present day was nothing like that of the former time, when persons of real property and influence were engaged against the state. Now, no persons of property or influence had conspired, but harsher measures had been taken than in former times, when the danger was real. It had been said, the ground of alarm in Ireland was great; it was so. Here Mr. Fox contrasted the conduct of ministers, who made war to extinguish jacobin principles in England, where he said they did not exist to a dangerous extent, with their now boasting that peace had extinguished jacobin principles in Ireland, where the danger was really great. He condemned the use of the torture in Ireland, as worse than any thing in the conduct of Robespierre. He again touched on the war, and said this reign had been remarkable for two wars, in the objects of both of which we had failed; by the one we lost America; by the other we have overthrown the balance of Europe, which we pretended it was our wish to preserve. And how preserve? By overthrowing France, which formed so great a part of that balance.—He then reviewed the different periods at which we might have made peace, and showed, that the longer it was delayed, the worse the terms necessarily became. We would not make peace when France was "in the gulf of bankruptcy," and we were not "scratched" by the war; and the consequence was, such a peace as we had now obtained. If we were to thank ministers for success in preserving us against jacobinism, why might not the emperor boast of this as a successful war? Why might not the king of Sardinia boast of having preserved the island of Sardinia, though he had lost Piedmont? He, however, thanked the present ministers for having concluded the definitive treaty, which he highly approved, under all the circumstances; and concluded by observing on the absurdity of thanking all his majesty's late cabinet ministers, maintaining, as they did, different opinions, some of them consequently being wrong.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, the right hon. gentleman had expressed his determination not to vote in favour of the original motion, because he was not prepared to give it an affirmative. With respect to the removal of the late minister, he affirmed it not to be a dismissal from his majesty's councils, but a voluntary resignation, influenced by the deepest sense of duty. There was nothing in the life of that great and distinguished man which more entitled him to the admiration of his country, than the motives which induced him to resign an office that he had so long held, with equal reputation to himself and advantage to the country. The amendment moved by the noble lord was not on this occasion hastily or obtrusively brought forward; but after an interval of fourteen months, and after an hon. baronet (sir Francis Burdett) had brought forward a motion which tended to a vote of censure. The amendment did not require an unqualified assent to every measure of the late administration. It was a motion of approbation in the lump, without specifying particular measures. From Mr. Maret's overtures to this country in 1793, he believed that he himself was very zealous to accommodate matters; but the truth was, he had no powers to negotiate, and therefore was not attended to. And as to the negatives given to the overtures of Mr. Wickham and other persons, he assured the House of the deep regret felt by Mr. Pitt at these repeated failures. He had never seen affliction more keen, or distress more visible, than in the mind of his right hon. friend, on being obliged to continue the war. He extolled the great services of our army and navy. With regard to the financial operations of the late chancellor of the exchequer, it was owing to his consummate abilities, that the war, which had been undertaken for the destruction of our property, had terminated in a manner so favourable to our resources. He hoped the opinion of the utility and wisdom of the income tax would survive its being withdrawn. To that alone was to be attributed the high value of our funds. On the whole, the late administration had done every thing in their power to give security to the people; and he should, indeed, be forgetful of the transactions of the last nine years, were he not to concur in the amendment.

Mr. W. Smith said, that during the late administration, there was only one instance of a vote of personal approbation, namely, in 1796, when a loan was made, which then occupied a good deal of the attention of the public. He had taken the liberty on that occasion to move some resolutions, implying a censure on the chancellor of the exchequer; the result of which was, that the subject was referred to a committee, upon whose report the House thought proper to pass a vote of approbation. That, however, was not done without a previous inquiry, which was very different from the mode at present meant to be adopted. With regard to the income tax, he would only say, that so far from giving the minister credit for his ingenuity in forming it, he thought it impossible to devise any means of supply so odious and injurious.

Lord Glenbervie said, that he was the person who had moved the vote of approbation alluded to; but that it was done after inquiry had taken place in a committee. He did not conceive that such a circumstance having then happened, could be adduced as a precedent to regulate any future proceeding.

Mr. Calcraft thought very highly of the conduct of the late chancellor of the exchequer, but considered this vote of approbation too general.

Mr. Foster said, that if the amendment had been confined to measures of the late ministers relative to the war, he would have supported it; but it embraced many other objects, particularly the union with Ireland, which he could not praise ministers for, because he had always opposed this measure. He thought there would be an inconsistency in those Irish members voting for the amendment who had disapproved of a union, which had been carried by the most improper means.

Lord Castlereagh said, he could not tamely sit by and hear such fallacious insinuations. The union would stand on its own ground, and was not to be shaken by side-winds and unfounded aspersions on individuals, who had sacrificed so much in bringing it about.

Mr. Foster observed, that what he had said was not an insinuation, but a positive charge of the most corrupt practices, which he was ready to prove.

Mr. Tierney observed, that here was another ground for the House not to acquiesce in the amendment. A privy counsellor of Ireland had broadly asserted charges of corruption against the late ministers. If this vote should pass, the present chancellor of the exchequer might think he was minister of the country; but he could assure him he would no longer be so, since the present motion was evidently intended to bring back Mr. Pitt to the king's councils. It was said by some persons, that he was dismissed. If this were the case, what a reflection on the royal prerogative to bring forward such a vote! If he resigned, the amendment would seem to insinuate that the royal authority acted wrong in refusing to listen to his salutary advice. How would this vote bear in respect to the spirit of conciliation now asserted in regard to France? How would the present ministers feel, if the first work of the peace were a statue in France in honour of Marat and Robespierre? How might the French government think if we voted so immediately such a fulsome panegyric on a person so obnoxious to them? It was a wanton act to drag the House of Commons through mud and mire to bring back the late ministers against the king's will.

The question being put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question," it passed in the negative. Then the question being proposed, that the words, "It is the opinion of this House, that, by the wisdom, energy, and firmness of his majesty's councils, during the late arduous contest, supported by the unparalleled exertions of our fleets and armies, and by the magnanimity and fortitude of the people, the honour of this country has been upheld, its strength united and consolidated, its credit and commerce maintained and extended, and our invaluable constitution preserved against the attacks of foreign and domestic enemies," be inserted instead thereof; an Amendment was proposed, by sir Henry Mildmay, to be made to the said proposed Amendment, by adding at the end thereof these words: "That the right hon. William Pitt has rendered great and important services to his country, and deserves the gratitude of this House." Upon this a long conversation arose; after which the House divided:

So it passed in the negative.

Then the main question being put, that after the word "That," in the original motion, the words, "It is the opinion of this House, that, by the wisdom, energy, and firmness, of his majesty's councils, during the late arduous contest, supported by the unparalleled exertions of our fleets and armies, and by the magnanimity and fortitude of the people, the honour of this country has been upheld, its strength united and consolidated, its credit and commerce maintained and extended, and our invaluable constitution preserved against the attacks of foreign and domestic enemies," be inserted. The House divided:

|      | Mr. Grey .....          |       |

So it was resolved in the affirmative. Then the main question, so amended, being put; Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this House, That, by the wisdom, energy, and firmness, of his majesty's councils, during the late arduous contest, supported by the unparalleled exertions of our fleets and armies, and by the magnanimity and fortitude of the people, the honour of this country has been upheld, its strength united and consolidated, its credit and commerce maintained and extended, and our invaluable constitution preserved against the attacks of foreign and domestic enemies."

Sir Henry Mildmay's motion, viz. "That the right hon. William Pitt has rendered great and important services to his country, and especially deserves the gratitude of this House," was now put separately. Upon which, an amendment was proposed, by Mr. Fox, to be made to the question, by inserting after the name of the right hon. William Pitt, the names of lord Grenville, earl Spencer, Mr. Dundas, Mr. Wyndham, and the earl of Rosslyn; as they were Mr. Pitt's colleagues in the conduct of the war. Mr. Thomas Grenville considered this amendment not seriously meant as a mark of respect to his noble relation. Mr. Chancellor Addington intreated Mr. Fox to withdraw his amendment. Mr. Fox declined so doing, and said, that inasmuch as the House so warmly approved of the war, those men who clung to it with so much fondness, were as well, if not better, entitled to the thanks of the House, than the right hon. gentleman who had deserted it. The amendment was negatived. Another amendment was proposed, by Mr. Grey, to be made to the question, by inserting after the word "country," the words "by which the present government has been enabled to conclude a safe, honourable, and glorious peace. This passed in the negative. Then the main question being put, "That the right hon. William Pitt has rendered great and important services to his country, and especially deserves the gratitude of this House;" the House divided:

So it was resolved in the affirmative; and at five in the morning the House adjourned.

May 4. Mr. Yorke (secretary at war) rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to enable his majesty to accept of the offers of service of the yeomanry and volunteer corps, under certain regulations. It was unnecessary for him to dwell upon that subject, as the late thanks of the House was a sufficient proof of the effectual service they had rendered the state, and how much they had contributed to the tranquillity of the country in very dangerous circumstances. He hoped that that their active assistance would no longer be necessary to preserve internal tranquillity. Every Englishman must be convinced that his own constitution was superior to all others. He hoped also, that Europe would enjoy a long repose, and that we should have nothing to fear from external foes. But after such violent convulsions, it was improper to throw aside at once our means of defence; it was prudent still to keep up a corps, from which most effectual protection could be derived. These considerations were sufficient to show the propriety of enabling his majesty to accept of the services of the yeomanry and volunteer corps under certain regulations; and the regulations he should propose were these: that their services should be perfectly voluntary; and that only such corps should be kept up as were to receive no pay. As an inducement to the yeomanry to offer their services, he intended to propose certain exemptions in their favour; viz. that a member of the yeomanry corps might procure an exemption from the militia, by appearing completely armed and equipped on horseback at military exercise for seven days each year; and from the horse-duty, by appearing in the summer one day each year. If it should be judged expedient to keep up any of the volunteer infantry, he should propose, that this should take place only in the great cities, where they could be easily collected. The exemptions he meant to attach to their service were, an exemption from the militia if they appeared 14 days each year at exercise; and exemption from the hair-powder tax, if they appeared one day each year at exercise. The only expenses which he meant should fall on the public were, a serjeant to each troop with adjutant's pay; arms from the public stores, and a small allowance to the serjeants to keep their horses in order. In case of actual invasion, he meant that these corps should be placed under military law, and at the call of the Sheriffs. It was needless for him to dwell on the excellence of any measure that tended to keep up the martial spirit of the country; for unless a martial character was preserved, all our other advantages would perish "like the baseless fabric of a vision." It was only by cultivating among all ranks this military character; it was only by every citizen being ready in circumstances of emergency to go forth with his sword by his side and his helmet on his head, as in the days of our ancestors, that our national independence and glory could be preserved. He then moved, "That leave be given to bring in a bill, to enable his majesty to avail himself of the offers of certain yeomanry and volunteer corps to continue their services."

Sir E. Knatchbull seconded the motion. He paid some handsome compliments to the valour and loyalty of his constituents; and hoped, that if their private concerns obliged several of them to retire from the yeomanry, it would not be considered as any diminution of those principles.

Mr. Spencer Stanhope said, that this was, he believed, the first attempt to keep up such an establishment as this when the country was in profound tranquillity, and he could not help considering it adverse to the ancient constitutional practice of this realm. Such a measure could only have one or two objects in view. It might be formed to keep down any return of that Jacobin spirit which had manifested itself in 1792. But if such a spirit was to be kept down, he thought it would be better quelled by the operation of those bills for the preservation of public tranquillity which had been suffered to expire. If force was necessary, he conceived that it should be the force in the hands of the civil power, and not the force of military violence. If the measure was not formed with this view, it must have a reference to the possibility of the recurrence of a scarcity. He wished that any other mode than this could be adopted to accomplish this object, for that now proposed seemed liable to serious objections. If the farming interest was to be kept up in the situation of yeomanry, a spirit of exasperation could not fail to be the consequence; and in case of the recurrence of a scarcity, the worst consequences might be apprehended.

Sir W. Young said, that the observations of the hon. gentleman, with regard to its being unusual to keep up yeomanry corps in the time of profound peace, were applicable only to profound peace—a term belonging to former times, but now no longer to be used. There was nothing now like profound peace in the political situation of Europe. It was necessary for us always to be prepared for defence; and where could we find better guardians of our liberty and safety than in our volunteer corps?

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that the object of the motion was, to give to this country the full benefit of the wise system under which we had hitherto protected ourselves; and, among other effects to be produced by it, was that of deterring persons from attempting, from an idea of our weakness, to disturb the tranquillity of the country. Of all the characters that could be given to a bill, that which had been stated by an hon. gentleman was the most extraordinary; for he had said it was inconsistent with the constitution of these realms that such a measure should be adopted in time of peace. Now he thought exactly the reverse. There was no circumstance belonging to the constitution or composition of our military corps throughout, that had more attracted his intention, or made more impression on his mind, than the idea that such a corps as this could exist only in a free country. A determination on the part of government to put arms into the hands of a whole people, and a resolution on the part of the people to accept them for the defence and security of both, was peculiar to the community in which we had the happiness to live. It proved a double security, and a double pledge. It was a pledge on the part of government, that they should never attempt any thing hostile to the constitution. It was a pledge on the part of the people, that they valued as well as understood its excellence; that they were steadily attached to, and determined to preserve it. He was, therefore, warranted in saying, that the measure would afford gratification to the country at large. It proved the good intentions of government towards the people, the attachment of the people to its government, and the zeal and ardour of both for the constitution, by which they were mutually protected. It was upon this public principle that those volunteer corps had existed and flourished in this country. It had been said, that such a power as this might be wanted to meet the remnants of Jacobin principles and spirit which had manifested itself for a few years in this country. He was confident that the Jacobin spirit, which once appeared in this country, was very much subdued. The general sense of mankind had driven it into its hiding places. Those principles which it attempted to uphold, and those vain theoretical notions which it endeavoured to fasten upon a deluded multitude, had, by dreadful experience of their practical effects, become universally odious. There might be a few who still adhered to this system; but they were so inconsiderable in number, so degraded in character, so detested in principle, that they had no hope of appearing in such numbers again in this country. The lesson which this system had taught mankind, was a great and useful one. What had occurred in this respect was not likely to occur again; but might occur again; against which there could not be a better antidote than that of putting arms into the hands of a people who had shown their abhorrence of such principles. He was convinced, that the laws of this country as they stood would be sufficient for the preservation of the public peace; but if there should be any material interrup-

As an inducement to the yeomanry to offer their services, he intended to propose certain exemptions in their favour; viz. that a member of the yeomanry corps might procure an exemption from the militia, by appearing completely armed and equipped on horseback at military exercise for seven days each year; and from the horse-duty, by appearing in the summer one day each year. If it should be judged expedient to keep up any of the volunteer infantry, he should propose, that this should take place only in the great cities, where they could be easily collected. The exemptions he meant to attach to their service were, an exemption from the militia if they appeared 14 days each year at exercise; and exemption from the hair-powder tax, if they appeared one day each year at exercise. The only expenses which he meant should fall on the public were, a serjeant to each troop with adjutant's pay; arms from the public stores, and a small allowance to the sergeants to keep their horses in order. In case of actual invasion, he meant that these corps should be placed under martial law, and at the call of the Sheriff. It was needless for him to dwell on the excellence of any measure that would keep up the martial spirit of the nation, for unless a martial character was preserved, all our other advantages would perish "like the baseless fabric of a vision." It was only by cultivating in all ranks this military character, and only by every citizen bearing his sword by his side, and his head, as in the days of chivalry, that our national independence could be preserved.

 appeared, that by "entire" was meant dominions of which Portugal had not n despoiled. This statement of the ble lord, however, was questioned in the French councils, and no satisfactory information could be obtained. The treaty of Badajos might be adhered to;
 but the object of France was as completely gained as if her original preten-sions had been admitted. She had secured to herself the navigation of the Arawari. From a Dutch map that he had, it appeared, that the only entrance to this river was between the two islands Nuova and Penetenza. France thus controlled the commerce of Brazil, and the whole wealth of South America lay at her mercy. What means she might use to extend her usurpations he would not pretend to foretel; or whether she might not halt for a while to consolidate what she had already usurped. But, after what had taken place in Italy, not a doubt could be entertained that France would seize Bra-

tion which the authority of the civil magistrate was not able to suppress (and he hoped there never would be a disposition to use force without cause), it would then be time enough to use military force; and he knew not how we could secure to ourselves so much military force with the chance of so little military violence, as by the plan now proposed.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Debates in both Houses on Motions for Papers relative to the Treaty of Peace with France.] May 5. The Earl of Carlisle rose to bring forward his promised motion respecting that part of the preliminary treaty which related to the affairs of the stadtholder; in doing which his lordship went generally over the leading points of the treaty in other respects; which he considered as extremely degrading to this country, and highly prejudicial to that intercourse which she held with the other nations of Europe, under those ancient treaties which had not been recognised or revived, but totally abandoned under the present treaty. He expatiated on the unshaken attachment which the stadtholder had maintained towards this country at the outset of the war. Not until the French army was within a few miles of his capital, did he abandon his situation, and then was compelled to fly with his consort and the wreck of his family in an open boat; and not only was he driven from his dominions, but his private property was seized and confiscated, and his family left destitute of every means of support. But, notwithstanding these sacrifices sustained from his attachment to this country, and notwithstanding the boasts of those who formed the preliminary treaty that ample compensation had been stipulated for that illustrious personage in the losses he had sustained; notwithstanding the article in the preliminary treaty, by which that compensation was stipulated; yet did it unquestionably appear, that this stipulation was violated almost in the very moment of its conclusion, and in the same room with the noble marquis by whom the treaty was concluded; for it was now known that a distinct article was concluded by the minister of France with the plenipotentiary of the Dutch, immediately after the signature of the definitive treaty between the four powers, by which the French government engaged to guarantee Holland against contributing to the compensation of the stadtholder. Such a conduct on the part of France, in the very moment of concluding a definitive treaty, by which the four powers lately at war were mutually pledged to each other in the most ample compensation, gave to the French government such a decided feature of perfidiousness, as would not fail to excite sentiments of indignation in every just and honourable mind, and to rouse every sentiment of generous feeling for the injuries and insults thus newly meditated towards that much wronged and illustrious character. Such conduct on the part of France must shake every fair reliance upon their faith; and as no stipulation whatever of the fund, or the country from whence those promised compensations were to be derived, had been specified in the treaty, he desired to know where was the ground of reliance upon that faith which was already violated in the very moment it was pledged? Under these circumstances, he considered the cause of the stadtholder as, if not totally abandoned, at least left open for new contests. He considered, however, this country as bound by every principle of honour to maintain the claims of the stadtholder, who had sacrificed so much in her cause. His lordship concluded by moving for a humble address to his majesty, praying that a copy of such communications be laid before the House as have been made to his majesty by the French government, respecting the secret article concluded by France with Holland, explanatory of the subject of compensation to the stadtholder.

Lord Pelham said, that no communication whatever, on the article alluded to by the noble lord's motion, had been made to the government of this country by that of France. But even if there had, he did not see how his majesty's ministers could be called on officially to lay before the House a communication of a matter between France and Holland, which concerned themselves only, and had no relation whatever to this country. Much stress had been laid by the noble lord on the losses sustained by the illustrious personage alluded to, merely for his adherence to this country. But he must deny the inference, that those losses were sustained merely in the cause of this country. They were sustained in the common cause of civilized society. Although we felt disappointment in not being able to obtain for the stadtholder compensation to the extent we could have wished, did it therefore follow, that, in pursuit of his restoration, this country was bound to continue the war without any other object?

Marquis Cornwallis observed, that, notwithstanding what had fallen from the noble mover on the subject of this explanatory article, he by no means considered that article as at all violatory of the pledge of compensation to the stadtholder. That compensation, on the contrary, stood guaranteed upon a security as strong as could possibly be founded on the faith of a solemn treaty between the four contracting nations.

The Lord Chancellor contended, that the pledged faith of nations was an ample security for the stipulation to procure a full compensation for the losses suffered by the house of Orange.

Lord Auckland regretted, that a more satisfactory article had not been obtained as a security for the compensation to be made to the prince of Orange than the 18th of the definitive treaty. He wished to have seen the means of making the compensation, the amount of it, the fund from which it was to be taken, described explicitly. He spoke highly of the claims of the prince of Orange on this country, from what fell within his own knowledge during the four years he had spent in Holland as a minister of this country. Dissatisfied, however, as he was with the definitive treaty, he derived some consolation from the noble marquis's declaration, that he had no doubt but the 18th article would be solemnly fulfilled by the contracting parties.

The motion was then withdrawn.

May 5. Mr. William Elliot rose to move for certain papers connected with the definitive treaty. He said, he had no doubt the motions he had to propose would meet with the unanimous assent of the House. The first paper for which he should move was, the treaty of Badajos. There were two treaties concluded at Badajos, one between Portugal and France, which never was ratified, and another between Portugal and Spain, which was ratified, and which was the document he alluded to. By that treaty the important town of Olivenza was ceded to Spain, and the integrity of Portugal was most materially violated. This paper was alluded to in the 7th article of the definitive treaty. His second motion would be for copies of any conventions or armistices concluded between France and

Portugal during the year 1801, and communicated to the British government. It was to be feared that these contained many commercial stipulations highly detrimental to this country; and one of them was the basis of the treaty by which a great part of Portuguese America was ceded. The hon. gentleman entered into a consideration of the fatal effects of this cession. He said, this district had always been reckoned of the utmost importance by Portugal, not on account of its fertility, nor its population, nor its trade, though all these were considerable; but because it was the only security for the valuable but vulnerable possession of Brazil. This was forcibly illustrated by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, which was guaranteed by Great Britain. By the articles of this treaty, France was expressly prohibited from crossing the river St. Vincent, or trading to the mouth of the Amazons. In the preliminaries it was declared that the dominions of her most faithful majesty should be preserved entire. But on the 29th September, two days before the signature of the preliminaries, a treaty had been concluded between Portugal and France, by which the former power was obliged to cede an immense tract of country in America. When the noble lord was questioned upon this point, he was evidently much embarrassed. At last an explanation was given; from which it appeared, that by "entire" was meant the dominions of which Portugal had not been despoiled. This statement of the noble lord, however, was questioned in the French councils, and no satisfactory information could be obtained. The treaty of Badajos might be adhered to; but the object of France was as completely gained as if her original pretensions had been admitted. She had secured to herself the navigation of the Arawari. From a Dutch map that he had, it appeared, that the only entrance to this river was between the two islands Nuova and Penetenza. France thus controlled the commerce of Brazil, and the whole wealth of South America lay at her mercy. What means she might use to extend her usurpations he would not pretend to foretel; or whether she might not halt for a while to consolidate what she had already usurped. But, after what had taken place in Italy, not a doubt could be entertained that sooner or later France would seize Brazil and Peru. The words of the definitive treaty inflicted upon this country a needless indignity. It asserted the integrity of Portugal, and guaranteed its dismemberment. We held out our protection only to display our weakness. He should thirdly move for the copies of any treaties entered into between Spain and France during the late negotiations for peace. Our new ally dealt in masked conventions, and, after several mock treaties, one made its appearance, by which the whole of Louisiana was ceded to France. She thus got possession of a large and fertile tract upon the river Mississippi, not more distant from Mexico than Northumberland from the metropolis of England. Much had been said of capital: here was a capital on which France would not fail to draw, and the world might long rue that such resources were in such hands. The French were now brought up to the very confines of Canada, and might soon re-establish their empire in that country. But the united states of America had most to fear. Kentucky and the western states had little connexion with the eastern, they were separated by immense forests, and peopled by different inhabitants, adventurers from every quarter. The only outlet to their trade was the Mississippi, and the American government had stipulated with Spain for the free navigation of that river. Now, these states must be completely under the control of France. If France does not separate them from the rest, she will make America at all times dependent upon her, and will draw her into the confederacy against our naval greatness and the dignity of our flag; if indeed he could use the expression, now that the dignity of our flag, which had once been reckoned our most valuable possession, had been disgraced and degraded. It might be said, that the spirit of Europe would rise to prevent these usurpations in America. Some people seemed to consider the spirit of Europe as a kind of incantation. A foul and flagrant usurpation had lately taken place in the very heart of Europe, while Europe inertly looked on. Yet the spirit of Europe was, to protect the independence of America. Gentlemen who held this language had profited little by ten years of woful experience. When France had conquered the continent of Europe, could the continent of America be safe? The expedition to Egypt was at first called visionary, but if the principles of the present day had been acted upon by ministers then

France would now have been in quiet possession of that country, and perhaps other provinces of the Ottoman empire would have fallen a prey to her rapacity. He maintained that the cession of Louisiana had changed the whole complexion of the question. Had this fact been known at the time when the preliminaries were debated, he was convinced the House would have paused before it assented to them. He had great respect for ministers as individuals, and he would by no means say that they wished to impose upon the House. He believed that they were ignorant themselves; but ignorance would not excuse them. Did they take the proper means to procure information? Did they peremptorily put the question? If France returned no answer, that was the greatest indignity to the government and to the country. If France returned a false answer, it was a fraud; and in either case the negotiations ought to have been broken off. At any rate, they were acquainted with the fact before the signature of the definitive treaty; and before they proceeded farther, they were bound in honour to come again and ask for the opinion of the House. He concluded by moving for "a copy of the Treaty of Badajoz, referred to in the 7th article of the Definitive Treaty of Peace."

Lord Hawkesbury said, that to the motion he had no objection; but he must say, that the hon. gentleman had taken a most unusual mode of proceeding; he defied any one to point out an instance when, in the height of faction, an opposition had ever adopted such a line of conduct. There had frequently been discussions concerning armaments and other acts of government, and the constant practice had been to give notice of a motion for an inquiry, to move for necessary papers, without entering into the main question; and when appointed, then at least to state the reasons why ministers should not be censured or dismissed. Gentlemen, in making their preliminary motions now, took the widest range. He could not help expressing the greatest surprise that, in what regarded Portugal, the definitive treaty should be thought to have departed from the preliminaries. Questions upon this point had been put repeatedly, and rather vexatiously; to which he had always replied, that the river Arawari was to be the boundary between the two Guianas, and that the treaty of Badajoz was to be abided by. The treaty of Madrid had been abandoned, and the Portuguese retained the command of both banks of the Amazons. As to the imputation of unfairness towards Portugal, Portugal decided upon her own fate, without the intervention of Great Britain. We were left to the alternative of supporting Portugal, or saving Egypt; the latter was considered, even by the court of Lisbon, as the most important; and therefore a disposable force, which, being divided, would become inefficient, was consolidated and sent to Egypt. But before this was done, Portugal herself made two applications to this country. Her first was, that we should release her from all her engagements, and exclude our shipping from her ports; her second application was, whether, in the event of a failure in the negotiation, this country could afford her pecuniary aid? Ministers first refused their aid; but since they released her from those engagements, they had notwithstanding voted her a subsidy to make good her conditions with France, which she accomplished accordingly. He then appealed to the House, whether Great Britain had broken her faith with Portugal? The fact was, Portugal, pressed between two enemies, Spain and France, was forced to these cessions, which no subsequent treaty could counteract. As to the motion therefore relating to Badajoz, he would not oppose it; and regarding the second head of information, viz. Copies of Treaties between France and Portugal, these he would consent to if the hon. gentleman would confine the period to the signing of the treaty of Madrid in 1801. But as to the other papers or treaties, it was impossible to grant them; they never were official, and this country was not a party in any of them. He maintained, that our naval superiority, with regard to France, never was so high as at present, and that nothing could tend so much to degrade our flag as the language of the hon. gentleman.

Dr. Lawrence contended, that ministers should not decline giving information on particular points as required. The House did not know whether the treaty of Madrid were an existing treaty or not: and this ignorance was a confirmation of the disgrace of the country. In the tricking language of the preliminaries, the integrity of Portugal was guaranteed, but not as before the war. When this defect was discovered, then came another sort of integrity; so that we were glad to get out of the trap in which we were caught, by leaving a part behind us. It was true, we had sent Portugal a sum of money; but was this alone acting with good faith to a nation to whom we owed protection? It was unfair to answer the charge of the surrender of our flag, by extolling our navy. Nobody questioned the lustre of its achievements. If in the late war, it was a triumph that we could throw supplies into Gibraltar, and escape a battle, how great must be the glory of our navy now, when it was matter of regret that we could not cut away the chained navy of France from her shores! The British flag was the last symbol of our dominion in the northern seas. It was to that, the disapprobation was directed; and when ministers should come forward to justify its surrender, he hoped they would not construe the charge into an attack upon the British navy.

Mr. T. Jones denied that the British flag was dishonoured: if he thought it was, he should be the first to move to bring ministers to condign punishment. From the number of papers demanded, and the variety of inquiry, one would suppose the gentlemen opposite had formed themselves into a war committee. Those gentlemen, now that peace was concluded, seemed to wish to wage a separate war of their own. They contended, that the nation had received a fundamental insult; and all their arguments on this point were certainly arguments à posteriori. But if even all that they had said of the peace was true, what good could it answer, to tell the enemy that we had concluded a treaty, by which our national interests were injured, and our national glory tarnished? He did not say that the peace was a glorious one; but it was a peace salutary to the country, a peace which had brought back comfort to the domestic fire-side; and any attempt to disturb it, would, he was confident, be resisted both by the House and the country.

Mr. T. Grenville said, that if the mode of discussing so interesting a subject in separate detail was not adopted, no member could, amid the multiplicity of important interests and relations which the treaty affected, possibly understand what it was to which he was called upon to give his approbation. With the statement of our relations with Portugal, as made by the noble lord, he perfectly agreed; but he differed with him very materially in the inferences he had drawn from this statement. What was the statement of the noble lord on this subject? It was that we were bound to defend Portugal, and to make exertions for the recovery of Egypt. The late administration, conceiving that both objects could not be effectually obtained, had preferred that in which, at the time, we were most likely to succeed. To the propriety of this arrangement he was not disposed to object; but what were the consequences which it produced? Portugal, deprived of our protection, had been obliged to ask a release from her engagement; and, yielding to the necessity of circumstances, had been compelled to make peace on most disadvantageous terms. Now, what was the inference which the noble lord drew from this situation of Portugal? That, under all the circumstances, we were called upon by good faith, to buy back the cessions, which, in a moment of peril and of difficulty, our ally had been forced to make as the purchase of her peace. Was this the manner in which faith was to be maintained with our ancient ally? This, he was sure, was not the manner in which the late administration would have stipulated for the integrity of our territories. They did feel that they were bound to purchase back restitution, not of the description provided by the present treaty, but of a substantial and efficient nature.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, that he was as averse as his noble friend from imputing factious motives to any member; but he must say, that the mode which had been adopted was so singular, that he was at a loss how to reply in an orderly manner to arguments, the bearings of which, on the question before the House, it was impossible to discover. There were, however, some points of fact, on which he trusted he might enter into some explanation. The treaty of Badajos was known and understood by the government here, and particularly that part which related to the limits between French and Portuguese Guiana. Ministers were afraid that Portugal might be terrified into concessions even more injurious to herself; and, with a view to this apprehension, a stipulation was inserted in the preliminaries, by which the subsequent treaty of Madrid was virtually annulled. They had not been insensible to the imminent danger which hung over Portugal; they had stipulated for her; and in fact, many of the sacrifices in the West Indies were made, with a view to preserve the integrity of her territory. We had, therefore, been far from violating any obligation of good faith to that country. He must also say, that ministers had not, by any act of commission or of omission, tarnished, in any one respect, the honour of the British flag.

The first and second motions were agreed to. The third was negatived.

May 6. Earl Temple rose to move for certain papers relative to Malta. It was agreed, he said, in the preliminary treaty, that Malta should be restored to the order as it was before the war, placed under the guarantee of a third power. By the definitive treaty both these stipulations were infringed; the order was not restored to its situation before the war; and a new langue had been introduced into the order, inconsistent with the radical principles of nobility, on which the order was founded, as not requiring proofs of nobility. This was a departure from the original stipulation. Another stipulation enjoined the knights to return; an injunction with which they could not be supposed willing to comply, in consequence of the want of support, four-fifths of their revenues having been swept away. Supposing they were to return and to elect a grand master, the election would be made under the influence of France: if, indeed, the election of a grand master had not already taken place, it being well known that France had continued to carry on an intrigue with the people of the island to surrender it to France on its evacuation by the English, and the treaty having stipulated for the validity of such an election. Another stipulation excluded the Barbary powers from the ports of Malta; whereas it was only by keeping them open to those powers, that the independence of the island could be maintained; as it was from them that the island was supplied with provisions. Another objection was, that the treaty proclaimed the neutrality of the island, but it did not guarantee that neutrality, or state any thing specific. The clause inviting his Sicilian majesty to garrison it for a year with 2,000 troops was also delusive, his Sicilian majesty having no interest to induce him to undertake that trouble and expense; and even supposing that he had, it would be only putting the island in the hands of France. In answer to these objections, it was said, that the great powers of Europe were guarantees of its independence. This also was unsatisfactory. It did not appear, that they had accepted the trust, nor had we any security that they would. Supposing, however, that they should accept it, still the island must eventually fall under the power of France. Russia was too remote, and had a design upon it. Prussia and Austria had no interest, and could not be expected to take an active part, after tamely acquiescing in the establishment of the Italian republic. The result, therefore, would be, to leave it at the disposal of France, Spain, and Great Britain, being a majority against us. His lordship then expatiated upon the importance of the island, and also upon the strength and value of the island of Elba, and the usurpation of the Italian republic. He next referred to the grand alliance in the reign of William 3rd, as an example which we should have imitated in the present conjuncture; and concluded by moving for an account of all "commercial duties and territorial revenues, raised within the island of Malta, since it was surrendered to his majesty's forces." The motion was agreed to. The noble earl then moved for, "a copy of the treaty of peace concluded at Luneville, between Austria and France."

Lord Hawkesbury objected to the motion, because no parliamentary ground had been stated for the production of the treaty. That treaty was concluded a year ago, and this country was no party to it; and it was not included in the definitive treaty of peace. This treaty could not be wanted for information, because, in reality, a copy of it might be had at every bookseller's shop.

Mr. Grenville said, that the cession of the Cisalpine republic was so generally understood to increase the power of France in that quarter, that most people thought we should have retained Malta, as a countervailing possession. It could not then be argued, that the treaty of Luneville, by which the Cisalpine republic was given up to France, was a question unconnected with a discussion relating to Malta.

Mr. Pitt could not conceive how the production of this treaty could be necessary for the purpose of the debate; nor did he think it could be properly applied for on the grounds which had been stated. His right hon. friend must know, that the treaty of Luneville was not made in conjunction with this country, and that we were not a party necessarily connected with it. Whether we approved of the government of Austria yielding to the necessity which dictated that treaty, was another question, but it certainly was not a British question. The mode of proceeding adopted by his right hon. friends upon this occasion seemed to be, to separate, and to take one by one, the different articles of this treaty; and by these motions, to discuss each stipulation by itself, instead of investigating the whole treaty at once, and deciding upon its general merits. His right hon. friends confessed that the subject was not before the House; they called for documents to enable them to decide; and yet they argued with as much peremptoriness and decision, as if not only no farther information was necessary, but as if the question admitted of no doubt. They decided without hesitation or difficulty, that one stipulation was ineffectual—that another was inconsistent with the interest of the country—that a third was disgraceful, &c. He agreed with his right hon. friends, that this subject was to be considered with a reference to the general situation of Europe; but if the treaty of Luneville was laid before the House, of what use would it be at present? His right hon. friend had lamented some of the stipulations of that treaty. So did he. It was, however, now set aside by an act of the French government, which was a new monument of the ambition of that country, erected even between the preliminary and definitive treaty. His right hon. friends opposite to him, and, he did not differ in their opinions of the chief consul and government of France. As far as that conduct went, it might be urged as an objection to the whole treaty. He did not differ from them upon general points, but with regard to the inference that might be drawn from them. The way to consider this subject would be, when the time for discussion came, to consider the objects gained and fortified by the treaty of peace, compared with the probable effect of a prosecution of the war, under all the circumstances in which Europe was placed, when all the other powers were making separate treaties of peace, and securing their separate interest. There was nothing more unfair, than thus taking the treaty article by article, and debating it in detail, when the only proper way to consider such a subject, was to take it in the whole with all its bearings and objects.

Mr. Windham thought the House had the same ground and reason to call for the treaty of Luneville, as it had for the treaties of Badajos and Madrid. To him the production of the treaty of Luneville appeared indispensable, because it afforded strong proof of the bad faith of the French government. It was impossible, in his view of things, to form an accurate judgment of the merits of the definitive treaty, without having the means, at the same time, of entertaining a comprehensive view of the general state and situation of all the European powers. Those who opposed the motion, confounded inquiry with decision.

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, he would not pretend to decide upon the intention of gentlemen, in the motions that had been made upon this subject; he could only judge of the tendency of them. His right hon. friend had said, that he did not ask for the judgment of the House at present on any part of this subject; now that was what he complained of; for when the judgment of the House could not be had upon the subject, gentlemen were taking a course to affect that judgment beforehand—a mode of proceeding which was certainly at variance with the practice of the House. But it was said, it was right for the House to know what had been done with regard to the Cisalpine republic, and that therefore the treaty of Luneville should be produced. The answer to which was, that the treaty of Luneville could not explain that subject. The treaty of Badajos had a necessary connexion with very important parts of the negotiation. The treaty of Luneville had no such connexion.

The motion was negatived.

May 7. Earl Spencer rose to move for an account of the amount of the territorial revenues and duties upon commerce of the island of Malta, since the said island was surrendered to his majesty's arms. It must be obvious to all their lordships, that the island of Malta was a main article of negotiation in the lately decided treaty of peace. In the preliminaries, according to the 4th article, it was stipulated that "the island of Malta, with its dependencies, should be evacuated by the troops of his Britannic majesty, and restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem; for the purpose of rendering the island completely independent of either of the two contracting parties, it shall be placed under the guarantee and protection of a third power." Let their lordships look to the definitive treaty to see how far this preliminary was fulfilled. The first stipulation of the 10th article of the definitive treaty regulated what langues should continue to subsist after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, and invited the knights of the order to return to Malta as soon as the exchange shall have taken place; that they shall form a general chapter, and proceed to the election of a grand master from amongst the natives, and those nations which preserve langues. His lordship observed, that by a subsequent stipulation there was henceforth to be no English nor French langue. The English langue had long discontinued to exist, and nominally by this stipulation the French langue was to be abolished; but would it in effect be abolished? The remaining langues would be the three of Provence, Auxerre, and another district in Lombardy. From the state of dependence on France in which those places stood, they were to all intents and purposes French. Spain had two langues; and who would say that the French could not dictate to Spain in this as in every other respect? The Italian states had another langue. Could it be denied that the relationship which the Italian republic and the chief consul, as president of that republic, stood in to each other, placed it beyond a doubt that the Italian republic would be under the dominion of France? The remaining langue was the German one, and he did not mean to say that the German langue might not act independently; but what chance was there of securing the island of Malta in a state of independence under such circumstances? It was, in fact, neither more nor less than leaving the island of Malta in the power of France. His lordship next spoke to the third stipulation under the tenth article of the definitive treaty, viz. the establishment of a Maltese langue, to be supported out of the land revenues and commercial duties of the island, who were to have dignities and appointments, and an appropriate auberge, and that no proofs of nobility should be necessary for the admission of knights into the said langue. Upon this the earl reasoned, and after contending that a langue of non-nobles would not assort well with the noble knights of the ancient langues, complained of it as a revolutionary organization of a new constitution of government for the island of Malta, not only without the consent, but without even the having consulted the wishes of the Maltese themselves. He also complained of the inaccuracy of the English version of that part of the third stipulation of the tenth article of the treaty. He did not believe that "des habitans des isles de Malte," &c. was rightly translated, when it was stated to mean the "native inhabitants of Malta," &c. &c. He considered the stipulation for the evacuation of the island and its dependencies by his Britannic majesty within three months after the exchange of the ratifications, as exposing it to the immediate falling into the hands of the French; and said it was not at all probable that the king of Naples should furnish 2,000 men to serve as a garrison for the several fortresses on the island, when no resources were provided for their pay, clothing, and subsistence; but even supposing that the 2,000 Neapolitans did garrison the fortresses of the island, what sort of resistance could such a small number of Italian troops make against the armed hordes that France might pour into the island? His lordship passed great encomiums on the bravery of sir A. Ball, and another British officer, on taking possession of the island, and while they continued to hold it; declaring, that they had so conciliated the affections of the Maltese towards the British, that they would have been much better pleased to have remained under the protection of his majesty, than under that of any other power. In fact, Malta ought to have been secured to Great Britain, on account of the various important interests of the British empire, upon which it bore in a material degree. Our Indian empire was greatly exposed, as well as our Levant trade, and all our connexions by the way of the Mediterranean, by Malta being suffered to remain at the command of France; as every trifling difference between the republic and the king of Naples might be used as a pretext for the French to send a force against the island. But the whole of the article in the definitive treaty, and all its stipulations, were utterly impracticable. Where were the resources to come from, that were to defray the additional expense of supporting the new Maltese langue of non-nobles, of erecting and providing an auberge for them, for paying the 2,000 Neapolitan troops, keeping the fortresses in repair, and all the other charges of the island? The amount of the produce of the territorial revenues, as far as he could learn, was somewhat about 30,000*l.*, and the amount of the duties might be about 10,000*l.* more. The gross amount of the two was scarcely equal to the charge of the demands occasioned by the constitution of the government as it had hitherto stood. Where, then, was the surplus that would be necessary to be found? His lordship then moved for an account of the amount of the territorial revenues and commercial duties since the surrender of the island to his majesty's arms.

Lord Hobart did not object to the motion; but as a day was set apart for the discussion of the whole of the definitive treaty, he thought it ought to be considered altogether, and not by piece-meal. He therefore would barely notice, that as the noble lord had admitted that Malta was impregnable by blockade, we should not have succeeded if the Maltese had not themselves paved the way for our obtaining possession of the island; and therefore it could not be impolitic to pay a marked attention to the native inhabitants, by creating a Maltese langue. As we won the island by force of arms, we had an indisputable right to arrange its government. The noble earl was mistaken in supposing, that the king of Naples would not send the 2,000 men to garrison the fortresses of the island, as well as that he would not pay them. He would certainly do both. As to the additional expense which would be necessary to carry the article into effect, Malta was most advantageously situated for commercial purposes, and thence the revenue would increase.

The motion was agreed to.

May 12. Dr. Laurence said, that nothing had passed that could induce him to abandon the opinion he entertained, that the treaty of peace lately signed was, in many respects, most fatal to the country. Let any person consider of what importance to this country were its possessions in the East; and let him at the same time consider, how the security and well-being of those possessions were endangered by the non-renewal of the treaties by which they were heretofore protected. Let it be considered what advantages were given to the enemy by this neglect, or omission, or by whatever other name it was to be called; advantages which the enemy himself already exaggerated. He would content himself with a confined consideration of the dangers to which our possessions in the East were exposed, though perhaps the whole were involved. He moved for information, not so much for himself as for the House; he required explanation, that the House might accept it where it should appear satisfactory; and he entered into discussion, that the facts might be fairly ascertained; so that when the House should come to debate on another day the most extensive and important subject that had ever been before it, gentlemen might not be involved in assertions, contradictions, and errors. If, in his attempt to explain this subject to the House, he should fall short, he was happy that there were persons present who, from the share they had taken in the transactions of India, were fully adequate to make up any deficiency on his part. When we were but simple merchants trading to the East, as all the nations of Europe had been previous to the conquests made by this country, a barren rock on the coast of Newfoundland was held to be an object of more importance than the settlement of Madras, the most valuable of the part of India where it was situated. From simple merchants we had advanced to the exercise of a delegated authority under the people of the country; in time our authority became paramount; and a people which was found capable of instructing the Greeks, when the Greeks conquered it, became nothing in their own country. Wherever the rights of others had been invaded, he should not hesitate to condemn that invasion. The authority of this country was substituted for that of the great mogul. He hoped that when he was forced to give an opinion on that substitution, he should give a sincere and honest opinion; but till called upon he should give no opinion. It was now necessary to see what rights had been asserted, though for his part he acknowledged no rights; to see what claims had been set up by France and Holland, and how those claims had been urged; to see what the triumphant treaty of 1763 had done for the adjustment of these claims. First, as to what related to Coromandel: France in that treaty renounced all the acquisitions she had made on the coast of Coromandel and Orissa since 1749. It had been said, that papers were unnecessary in debating a subject like this, for that history was sufficient. With pleasure and delight he appealed to a history so honourable as that of the period of which he now spoke. We were then unassuming merchants, trading to the East, but perhaps more firmly established than now, when the people of the country were disgusted with our ambitious encroachments. We were then satisfied with a neutrality; but the French, whose power was become more dangerous as it was more extended, were not so moderate. Dupleix, the first European governor who assumed the style of an eastern prince, invaded our rights, and roused exertions which succeeded in repelling him. In Bengal, at the same period, in consequence of a similar aggression, we had made a like exertion to vindicate ourselves, and by that exertion had acquired power. The French had acquired some power in Coromandel, and the five northern circars, of which we afterwards obtained a grant from the mogul. By this grant our title was superior to their's. They had, by subsequent treaties, formally renounced their claim; but, by the present treaty, that renunciation was done away, and a door opened for future contention.—He came now to Bengal. The French king had consented to keep no troops and to erect no fortifications on that coast. There was now nothing to hinder the French from doing so. There was no natural reason why they should not fortify themselves, and endeavour to render their establishments as secure as possible. It was true, the sovereign of the country might object, if these fortifications were carried to any improper length; but would the attempt to fortify be deemed a sufficient cause for war? There was no prohibition from fortifying in the present treaty. By former treaties the French had acknowledged Mohammed Ali as sovereign of the Carnatic, and consequently had subscribed to our authority: possibly even from that family some persons might now be found, whose title could be set up in opposition to our's. The stipulation in 1763, that no fortifications should be erected on the coast of Bengal, was scrupulously adhered to in the negotiation of 1783, that when a stipulation was made for a ditch to carry off the water from the fort of Chandernagore, a jealousy arose; and it was not without a critical explanation, and a full security that nothing farther would be attempted, that permission was given and the delay arising from the arrangement of this matter was the excuse stated by the secretary of state for not bringing the definitive treaty to a more speedy conclusion. The jurisdiction of the factories may, on the ground of application for the surrender of persons taking refuge in them, again produce contention. The convention of 1787 granted a general exemption to all factories, and a general jurisdiction over all persons within certain limits. The omission of any regulation to this effect in the present treaty, might renew the ancient jealousies. Independent of this, there were many claims and pretensions arising out of the trade itself. The French, even when they were admitted to trade under our protection, refused to allow us to regulate their trade, and insisted on carrying it on in their own way; so that no advantage could be derived from it to the revenue of the company, which, when its collection was attempted to be enforced, they often resisted with force. A perpetual correspondence was carried on, on the subject of these aggressions; so numerous, and filled with facts so numerous, that a whole session would not be sufficient for the detail. The first objection to the treaty was in 1765, when Chandernagore was given up. Mr. Law objected against the strict enforcement of the treaty, and required permission to make lodgements for the protection of those engaged in the trade, which, together with his other demands, was made the subject of a letter from lord Clive. The complaints of foreigners would grow louder, unless the company entered into an agreement to supply them with cargoes to a certain amount out of the private trade of its servants. When Mr. Francis proposed to add a paragraph to the dispatches, saying that the nabob of Arcot was a legal sovereign, Mr. Hastings was unwilling to do so. The Dutch and Danes applied to this country as the sovereign power, and, under the name of a protection, were granted an indulgence; but they soon refused to submit to the payment of the duties, and we were compelled to exact them by force; and so far did their contumacy extend, that in time of scarcity they exported corn, which they knew their colours would protect, though a general embargo was laid. Nor could it be said that the knowledge of the embarrassment of this country, in consequence of the American war was the cause of this spirit of resistance; for it manifested itself in 1775, when the disturbances in America had only commenced, and the knowledge of them, could not yet have reached India. By the treaty of 1783, his Britannic majesty is to take such means as are in his power (not even then avowing the direct sovereignty) to procure certain facilities for the French trade: but two years had not elapsed when disputes arose, which soon came to a question of force, and ended in the firing of a vessel; a transaction which sir John Macpherson thought necessary to make the subject of a particular negotiation. Dr. L. then adverted to the treaty of 1787, which caused a board of justice to be holden, and in which the French brought forward their claims to the trade in India, particularly in the articles of salt, saltpetre, and opium, and which claims were only settled by a convention entered into with the government of this country; in which they were allowed to traffic with our East India Company on certain stipulations and fixed prices, in which it had been contended that our East India Company sustained a loss, but which, he asserted, was only a moderated gain.—He then begged to call the attention of the House to the Dutch claims. By the definitive treaty in 1784, their carrying trade was allowed, even to that of naval stores, and the freedom of navigation in the Indian seas. At all times the Dutch were jealous of our obtaining any settlement between our possessions in India and China, which might enable us to send the commodities of Bengal to that vast empire instead of carrying on our trade with it through the medium of dollars and bullion from England. They were then jealous, he said, even in those periods, when they were in alliance and connexion with us: by the alliance formed between France and Holland in 1795, they had become alienated from this country, and might now bring forward claims which before they would not have thought of. They had now become closely connected with that nation, which did not like any other logic than the ultima ratio regum; what was called the last reason of kings, but was now become the first of the republic: and if these claims should be advanced, we should have not only France to contend with, but Holland also, with a recruited navy. He then adverted to the Cape of Good Hope, which he stated to be of essential consequence to this country, both in time of peace and war. It might be urged, he said, in defence of the non-revival of former treaties, that we did not give up our rights, but were prepared to defend them to the utmost. But, though they had not been revived generally, it was surely worth while to revive specifically that part which protected our commerce in the East Indies. "Thus," said he, "I have stated what was stipulated in our favour by former treaties, and is now relinquished, without giving my opinion whether the concession was voluntary, or extorted by force. It is not however in India, but here, that these affairs must be settled either by negotiation or force. We must now say, that in proportion to the magnitude of the concessions we have made, we are prepared to defend what remains to the last." He concluded by moving, "That there be laid before this House an account of the acquisitions made, or pretended to be made, by his most Christian Majesty, on the coast of Coromandel and Orissa, between the years 1748 and 1763."

Mr. Dundas said, that, whether our situation was to be decided by negotiation or by the sword, in India or elsewhere, he would dare say, there was no difference of opinion between them upon this point, namely, that it was essential to the interests of this country, not to do any thing ourselves to bring those rights into doubt. He stated it as a general maxim, on which he apprehended there was no difference of opinion: and yet he was afraid that, if motions like these were persevered in, much difference of opinion would arise upon the application of that principle. His proposition was such as he held to be clear as the sun at noon-day; namely, that no doubt could be entertained on the relative situation of this country and of France in India. No doubt had been expressed upon that subject till lately in that House, nor would any doubt be entertained elsewhere, but by bringing forward speculations of our own in that House, and making that doubtful in debate which was long acknowledged to be clear in principle. He then entered into an historical detail of the rise and progress of the British power in India, the contest which had taken place from the earliest periods, and the share taken therein by the French, in order to oppose our progress in India, down to the period in which lord Clive had so distinguished himself; to whom, for his valour as a soldier, and wisdom as a statesman, he paid the highest compliments; the result of whose measures he stated to have consummated the British power in India, and settled our sovereignty there by right of conquest, which right he reconciled to the inhabitants by the wise respect he paid to their prejudices. Having gone through a complete history of these events and having given a compendious account of the progress of the Mogul empire, and of its revolutions for eight centuries, he proceeded to state the conclusion which he drew from all these premises; which conclusion was this, That though we may feel it just and expedient to make such allowances to the prejudices of the inhabitants, and to make such regulations in our territories as we may please, or think adviseable, yet with regard to European powers, to them we say freely and distinctly, "we have gained this country by our arms, and by our arms we will keep it." For upon all the grounds which he had already stated, it was manifest that the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa, &c. had come to Great Britain by conquest, as much as any country ever came into the hands of another; and from the period when it became so under the government of lord Clive to the present day, the French never had, directly or indirectly, from the treaty of 1763, any right whatever to interfere with those provinces; but that they were by right of conquest subject to the sovereignty of the king of Great Britain to all intents and purposes, which sovereignty was to be exercised through the medium of the India company, and through the different organs established for the preservation of our provinces, as much as any other part of his majesty's dominions. He therefore laid it down as an indisputable proposition, that what we had gained thus by conquest, was to be considered with reference to any other European power, as totally subject to our sovereignty, without any interference of their's; that we were actually the sovereigns of India, and no European power had any right whatever to dispute our title to this power. Such was the state of the British power in India; the situation of France was extremely different, without one inch of territory, except what she might claim by the definitive treaty under consideration. Was there a man who had any doubt whatever as to these facts at this moment? Was there a man who thought, that if these facts, and the right arising out of them, were to be called in question, this country would not go the length of risking its last stake to support those rights, and refuse giving up one iota of them? He had no reason to be satisfied in any point of curiosity, by asking why it was expedient in the present moment to avoid references to ancient treaties in the present definitive treaty. It was a subject upon which he did not think it necessary to dwell at present; it was sufficient for him to say, that there was no diminution thereby in our power in India, no foundation whatever for any other to dispute our sovereignty there, nor any thing which entitled others to contest with us the rights upon which that sovereignty was founded. Nor was that all. He mistook greatly if any doubt was now entertained, that with regard to Great Britain, her sovereignty in India stood at that moment upon a better footing than if the former treaties had been renewed by it. The treaty of 1783 was unquestionably the very worst treaty this country ever entered into on the subject of Indian affairs. It was the business of his majesty's government, and a very laborious one it was, in the convention of 1787, to do away the evil created by the treaty of 1783. By that of 1783, our sovereignty in India was rendered disputable; by the convention of 1787, our sovereignty was re-established. Had the treaty now upon the table renewed any former treaty, it would have been impossible to refer to the convention of 1787, without also renewing the contests which were brought forward in 1783. It would have been impossible to have introduced the one, without also calling for an explanation of the other; and therefore the affairs of that country were much better, considering all the circumstances of the relative situation of this country and of France, in suffering all treaties whatever to be passed over in silence. We might, perhaps, by renewing some of the declarations and admissions of our sovereignty in India, as settled by the convention of 1787, have employed some antidote against the evil of which we had too much reason to complain, but it was manifest to him that we could not have such antidote without having also a certain portion of the poison, by the renewal of any discussion upon the subject of treaties; and therefore he had no difficulty whatever in saying, that upon a review of the whole condition of our affairs, considered with relation to those of France, we were infinitely better in passing the subject over in silence, than we should have been in endeavouring to renew any of them. He confessed, that when the rumour reached him, that the provisions of the convention of 1787 were left out of the present treaty, he shrunk under an apprehension that our power in India would be destroyed; and he was the more alarmed when he heard it said, that this was brought about in consequence of the views of France to undermine, and finally to overturn our sovereignty in India. This led him to turn the subject very seriously in his mind, and to look at all the ancient documents, to consider the whole matter deliberately; and the result was, that it was infinitely better for us to have no reference whatever to any treaty. But the learned gentleman asked, if the House could really think that we could be secure in India against the ambitious claims of France, as they had appeared in 1783, and which were done away in 1787? Did he really think we were safe now, without having renewed, by the present treaty, the provisions of the convention of 1787. This he would answer, by putting to the learned gentleman this question: Did he really think, that if the French should be disposed to renew the pretensions of 1783, or any other period, that they would be prevented from so doing by a few scraps of paper being laid on the table of that House, a species of artillery that would not be equal to the operation of a single field-piece for half a minute? But the learned gentleman would say, that the treaty of 1783 would establish the disposition of the French at that time to dispute our sovereignty in India. It would, indeed establish that which there was no need of establishing, because the thing was well known; the French did, on that occasion, as they would do on every occasion, provided they thought they could succeed in the attempt, namely, endeavour to diminish the greatness of this country, and enlarge its own; but, in proportion as they were disposed to be hostile to our interest, or querulous while we enjoyed our advantages, it was the wisdom of this country, in the same proportion, to wait until these claims were made which gentlemen spoke of with so much apprehension, and in the mean time to stand upon our paramount right of sovereignty. What course the

French would take to enlarge their commercial interest in India it was not for us to anticipate. It was enough for us, that if they endeavoured to do so by the exertions of individuals, or otherwise, they could never do so without being liable to be interrupted by this country. If they were to try to erect commercial factories, or to do any thing that interfered with our sovereignty in India, we should be fully warranted, and what was better, we were in possession of means to resist such an attempt. But those means would not be increased by a few papers being laid before the House; such documents would not help us to any arguments which we had not already, for the propriety of resisting such attempts. From all this it was perfectly clear, that before the French could exercise any trade in India, they must come to us in the character of suppliants. He had stated the difference between the treaty of 1783 and the convention of 1787, already. He had to observe, that we were not now in a situation similar to that in which we stood in 1787. There was now no treaty in existence between us and France, nor any regulation on the subject of India, except the single clause in the convention now upon the table. And with regard to the trade of France in India, if any they were to have, they could have it only through the indulgence of the British power in India; and therefore he said again, we were better off as the case stood upon the present treaty of peace, than if we had renewed any of the former treaties. Whatever matter of complaint was to be urged, or rather of lamentation, upon this subject, it could only be, that his majesty's government did not settle the whole of the provisions of all former treaties, by taking notice of them all, and finally adjusting them all. This, however, in the abstract it might appear desirable, ought not to have been attempted in the present case, because it would have been impossible to accomplish it, without protracting the negotiation to a length that would have been inconsistent with the interests of the states of Europe. The articles in these treaties must have been all gone over, if any of them were noticed; in the course of which a thousand explanations would become necessary, and which might have made the negotiation in many respects appear to some idle and ridiculous. But there were other considerations which, he hoped, would operate on those who may have the future conduct of the affairs of India; and they related to other powers, as well as to the French and ourselves in India; we were not to consider merely our own concerns and those of France in India. He stated it as a solid ground of consideration for the East India company, to regulate, not only the trade of the French, but to look to the regulation of other subjects, to have an eye upon other commercial connexions. But it might be said, Why not stipulate these things in negotiation, and finally determine them by treaty? To which he would answer, It is much better as it is; for at present we have the sovereignty of India: and he would ask, if it would be a wise course to exclude the government of this country from all discretionary power to regulate the trade of India? If the French, or any other power, should claim the right of carrying their goods up the Ganges, or to do any other act, was it not sufficient that we had the power to prevent them? The French trade in India, the Dutch trade in India, and the trade of other powers in India, might go hand in hand, so that it was not detrimental to us; but if detrimental to us, we had the power to stop it: and that was enough for our present purpose at least. He wanted this subject to be considered upon a large and comprehensive scale, and not confined merely to ourselves and France. He did not mean to insinuate, that he was in possession of the reasons which actuated his majesty's servants upon this occasion, when they came to the conclusion which was now before the public; but he felt himself entitled to state, that if they had done that which some gentlemen blamed them for not doing, they would have put it out of their own power to do their country much service; which they will now be enabled to render by consulting those who are best qualified to advise them, and that more especially on the affairs of India. But, when he heard it said that France was hostile in its disposition towards the trade of this country, and was endeavouring to prevail on Holland, Spain, and other countries, to do all they could to discourage our trade, and to prohibit some of it in their dominions, he would ask, are they so? And if they be, is this the precise period in which you would make them a voluntary gift of commerce to India, when you are doubtful in what relation they choose to stand with you with regard to other commercial connexions? "I own," said he, "this is a subject on which I feel deeply. I am the last man in the world to plead for the system of this country narrowing the trade of foreigners in India. My maxim has been to enlarge that trade, and that we might as well attempt to prohibit foreigners from buying our manufactures of Yorkshire or of Birmingham, as prohibit foreigners from trading with our territories in India. But I should guard against misconception. When I say we should not prevent the French, or any other nation, from trading with our territorial provinces in India, I mean to say, that I am not afraid of them as merchants. I am not unwilling to give them a boon as merchants, with a chance of reciprocity, and I ask no more; but I think I am not going too far, when I desire this country to guard against that which I know the French have endeavoured to make, and will endeavour to make, if they see any probability of its success—I mean an encroachment on your sovereignty in India. This they have done; and if an opportunity offers, this they will do under the pretence of pursuing trade. They will ask you civilly, to allow them to do a number of things for the purpose of carrying on trade, when their object will be to encroach upon your sovereignty. It was in this way that they formerly endeavoured to encroach upon your sovereignty in 1787, when they told us they could not recover their debts without certain enlargement of power in India. We resisted that directly; and I hope this will be our conduct in future. The very first article insisted upon by lord Auckland in 1787 was, that nothing in the most distant degree touching our sovereignty in India would, on any terms, be assented to on the part of this country. I trust his majesty's government will stand upon the same ground as we did then; and if we do so, there will be no danger. Depart from that principle, and your sovereignty will be first undermined, then attacked, and finally overthrown. But we have not before us any proof, that the French nation are bringing forward any such claim as we here stated on their behalf. Will it not be time enough, when they do bring forward those claims, for government to resist them? But surely, when we agree that their claims are dangerous and cannot be admitted, it is singular to pursue this as a subject of declamation in the Houses of parliament. I say, this ought not to be done; for we all know, that what passes in parliament, transpires; and I cannot concur with those who wish to make the people of this country think the peace a bad one. I certainly cannot give an approbation of all the articles of peace; but is it doing good to this country to keep this question up, and to endeavour to make the people dislike it? Gentlemen complain of the pride and arrogance of France. Is this the way to make her less proud or arrogant? Certainly not."—Mr. Dundas refuted the observations of Dr. Laurence, on the subject of the danger to us in the Eastern seas, and on the apprehension he expressed concerning the claims of the Dutch, and then concluded—"I have stated what appeared to me to be the true substantial rights and interests of this country on the subject of Indian affairs; upon these rights and principles I desire to stand, and I have stated what course I think this country ought to pursue, to preserve those rights entire. I am aware that by so stating them, and by so recommending the course to be pursued, I impose on the shoulders of his majesty's government an awful and tremendous responsibility; for if you depart an iota from your sovereignty in India, and allow others to encroach on you, or any way to diminish the force of that paramount sovereignty, you will lay the foundation of the overthrow of your power in India. If, being possessed of that mighty empire, and of the means to assert and vindicate your right, you allow others to injure it by any act of executive government, I shall not receive any apology for the ministers who shall suffer that to be done under any pretence that the French had claimed these things before, or under any other pretence whatsoever, because you are now more than ever possessed of means to prevent it. I apprehend the learned gentleman is of the same opinion; and I hope he will concur with me in saying, that ministers, if they allow our sovereignty in India to be touched, will be without an apology, and that therefore he will be so good as to put his motion in his pocket."

Debate in the Lords on the Definitive Treaty of Peace.] May 13. Lord Grenville moved the order of the day for the House to take into consideration the Definitive Treaty of Peace.

Earl Stanhope requested previously to say a few words. There were two grounds on which the order might be opposed; one by entering into a debate upon it, and the other by moving to discharge it. He should not move the reading of the order for the purpose of postponing it. It had been stated, no matter where, that the definitive treaty ought never to have been entered into—that circumstances had taken place between the signing the preliminary and the definitive treaty, which had entirely changed the relative situation of the two countries as they stood at the time the preliminary treaty was signed. The argument was founded principally on Buonaparté's having been appointed chief magistrate of the new Italian republic. By the argument it was inferred, that this was an act of dishonour on the part of the consul, and that as he had acted dishonourably in keeping the presidency of the new republic, it was not to be expected that he would hereafter act upon a different system; insinuating that, from the character of the man who was at the head of affairs in France, there was no reason to expect a continuance of the peace. He felt it his duty to combat such an argument. He maintained, that after the battles of Marengo and Hohenlinden, and the subsequent treaty with Austria, the influence of France over Italy was complete; and whatever alterations had been since made, were mere matters of form, and not of substance. His reason for wishing the order of the day to be read was, not with a view to defer it, but that he might communicate that information to their lordships which he thought important, before the subject was discussed. He should first move the reading of the 130th standing order, for the exclusion of strangers. It was not his desire to preclude the public from hearing the debate; but, before the question was argued, he wished to submit some facts which he could not safely lay before their lordships without enforcing the order.

Strangers were ordered to withdraw. The subject of the noble earl's communication was, we understand the improved construction of a Diving Boat in France; which was described to be navigated under water with so much skill and certainty, as to make it easy for them to blow up a first-rate man of war with only fifteen pounds of powder. When strangers were re-admitted,

Lord Grenville was speaking on the subject of the definitive treaty of peace. His lordship said, he should offer no apology for having exerted his endeavours that their lordships might acquire previous information upon the different points to which the definitive treaty referred. The necessity and propriety of his conduct were so firmly impressed on his mind, that he was surprised at any insinuation of irregularity. The fact was; that himself and his noble friends had put the House in possession of arguments against the treaty, while those whose duty it was to have stated their reasons in its favour had not thought proper to defend it. The unfairness and irregularity, if any, was on the side of those who had reserved the detail of their arguments to a general debate, in which it was impossible to come to an issue on the various points connected with the subject. He was far from wishing to impute unfairness to any of their lordships. They had considered that discussion should not precede decision: he had thought that the best thing he could do was, to court repeated discussion previous to decision. In this situation the question was now submitted, and he rose to offer such a motion as resulted from the sentiments that he entertained. In doing this, the first argument with which he had to contend was one which had equally been resorted to in and out of the House. It was asked, what was the use of discussion now, when peace was concluded? Was it wished to overthrow the treaty? If not, what benefit could arise from debating upon the subject of it? He should be sorry to bring forward any motion, if he had it not in his power to meet such an argument. Whatever disadvantages might arise to the country from this unfortunate treaty, he would be one of the first to say, it was concluded by the power which had the right, by the constitution of the country, to conclude it; and therefore, whatever were its terms, parliament was bound to accede to it. It was ratified by his majesty, and the great seal of the kingdom affixed to it; consequently it was irrevocable; and not to carry it into effect would be to add dishonour to the loss occasioned by the treaty, and to impeach the national integrity. The first proposition he should make to the House was, to declare to his majesty their opinion, that the public faith was pledged to the observance of the peace; that it was an obligation binding upon the country to maintain it inviolable. After such a declaration, what objection could possibly be urged against the discussion of the terms of the treaty? What inconvenience could result from pointing out the injurious effects likely to proceed from them? Why was he not to be allowed to urge the House to fix a mark upon those impolitic and weak ministers who had negotiated such a treaty, and whose counsels had concluded it? It was not his wish to interrupt the treaty now that it was made; but only to lay before the House the dangerous tendency of its provisions, that future ministers might be warned against advising a measure so disadvantageous to the country. The object of what he should state to their lordships was prospective—it was to ascertain the situation in which the country stood now the peace was settled, and its terms agreed to—it was to point out the state of danger in which the country was involved by the treaty—not for the purpose of shunning the danger, but of exciting the country to adopt the real line of courage by preparing to meet it. Such was the view with which he had desired the attendance of their lordships this day. He should propose to them to lay before his majesty an address, expressive of their determination to preserve inviolate the treaty; but, having done so, to represent to his majesty the state of the country, and the means of avoiding the danger which threatened it. This was what he conceived it was the duty of their lordships as legislators to perform; and it should be his task to point out his reasons for doing so. For this purpose, it was necessary to advert to the arguments which had been advanced against the preliminary articles, and the events which had taken place since. He had already stated to the House his objections to the preliminary treaty: if the definitive treaty had been conformable to the preliminary articles, and the relative situation of France and Spain had not altered by intervening circumstances, however he might have been disposed to have protested against the definitive treaty, he should not have thought it necessary to have proposed to the House the adoption of any new measure; but he found that all the grounds of the pretensions on the part of France, as contained in the preliminary treaty, had not only been confirmed by the definitive treaty, but exceeded. The terms of the latter were therefore infinitely more prejudicial than the former. He could not avoid calling the attention of the House to what had been the arguments used against the preliminary articles. It had been stated, that in all negotiations for peace there were two grounds or bases necessary to be adhered to: when after a long contest between two nations, the respective governments were considering how they might restore the blessings of peace and tranquillity, the basis on which the negotiation proceeded was, either the status ante bellum, the actual situation in which the parties stood before the war, or the situation in which they stood at the time of the negotiation, which was called the uti possidetis. Instead of the negotiators of the definitive treaty proceeding distinctly upon one of these grounds, they had applied both in the most prejudicial manner possible to this country. They had referred to the status ante bellum with regard to England, by giving up all she had taken during the war to France; and they had adopted the uti possidetis as to France, by leaving her in possession of all that she had acquired. It was obvious, that at the commencement of the negotiation each country was in possession of some advantage which operated to the disadvantage of the other. It was to our disadvantage that France possessed so much power on the continent; and it was to the disadvantage of France that we, by the superior skill and valour of our navy, were possessed of the colonies of France and Spain. The arrangement to have been desired was, that we should have diminished the power of France upon the continent, in proportion to our sacrifices with respect to the colonies that we had taken. If France could not have been persuaded to that, then it was our duty to have extended our maritime power, for the purposes of compelling her. As far as appeared by the treaty, ministers had made no attempt whatever to reduce the power of France on the continent, but had, by concessions abroad, given her the means of weakening our colonial strength. This was not acting upon the principle adopted by lord Chatham at the peace of 1763. That enlightened statesman had always considered, that every preliminary treaty should be as definitive as possible. If the preliminary articles of 1763 were compared with the definitive, it would appear that there was scarcely any difference between them; while the direct contrary was the case with regard to the present treaty. By the incapacity of the negotiators, they had left themselves to treat with France during the pendency of a naval armistice. The question before that armistice was, whether this country would suffer the fleets of France, which were blockaded in the mouths of their harbours, to stir out. But what occurred immediately after the preliminary treaty? In direct opposition to our entreaties and threats, France sent an armament to the West Indies, and imposed on this country the necessity of also sending to the West Indies a naval force more than double any that we had sent during the war. Thus the first-fruits of the peace was the necessity of keeping an armament of thirty-five sail of the line in the West Indies.—He would not enter into the pretence, on the part of France, for sending the expedition that she did send; nor would he discuss the question whether it would or would not be better for this country if St. Domingo was under the dominion of France. He should only observe, that, the more urgent and pressing were the wishes of Buonaparté to send that armament, the more ought it to have been the policy of the negotiators on the part of this country to have insisted, that the French fleet should not have sailed till the preliminary articles were converted into a definitive treaty, and until he had afforded a conviction that he had no intention of obtaining such a cession as he had since obtained in Italy.—Something had been said of the time and temper in which the peace had been made on the part of France, and that it afforded a proof that the person at the head of the French government had become a harmless, inoffensive neighbour, and wished to show how much he had been misrepresented, when it had been insinuated that there were no bounds to his ambition. He would leave it to any man to say, whether, if peace depended upon the disposition of the republic, we should enjoy it, even for the length of time the present debate would occupy. It was evident the definitive treaty contained concessions infinitely more important than the preliminary articles; and it was no less true, that the conduct of the French government evinced a design to exclude the commerce of this country from the continent of Europe.—With respect to the situation in which Portugal had been placed by the definitive treaty, the House had been merely told that it was a pity it should be so; and, with regard to the prince of Orange, their lordships were informed by one of the servants of the crown, that he looked at the articles concerning that prince with regret. The indemnity to the prince of Orange was left in such a situation by the treaty, that it depended entirely upon France whether he should ever be indemnified or not. As to the Cape of Good Hope, not a word had been said, whether it would be advantageous to have it a free port or not. Why, after having stipulated that Malta should be independent, and that its independence should be guaranteed by one of the powers of Europe competent to its protection, was it placed under the guarantee of six powers, who never could be brought to agree upon the subject of it? How could Malta retain its independence? How was it possible that the expense of the garrison, stores, and charges of maintaining that fortress, could be provided by a power to whom no revenues were left? The expense of providing for Malta amounted to 130,000*l.* annually, while its revenues really applicable to that expenditure did not amount to more than 25,000*l.* The inference he drew from his statement was, that the election of the Grand Master must depend upon France, and that, in all probability, the whole island would shortly fall under the power of France.—He next adverted to an advantage given to the French with respect to the mutual cession of the colonies. It was stipulated, that the French inhabitants of Ceylon and Trinidad might retire from those islands, while nothing of the kind was admitted into the treaty with regard to the colonies that we ceded to France. His lordship contended, that by the non-renewal of the treaty of Utrecht this country had renounced the stipulation, that France should not acquire in Spanish America any privileges with reference to commerce that were not granted to England. It was needless to urge how much more important such a stipulation would have been at the present moment than at the period of the treaty of Utrecht. By the treaty of 1783, we had ceded Goree and Senegal; but at the same time the cession was under a stipulation for the liberty of carrying on the gum trade; but now the cession had been confirmed without the renewal of the stipulation. That it was the intention of France to make war against our commerce, was evident from the circumstance of a decree having been issued by the government, forbidding the right of trading on the coast of that part of Africa. He should be glad if the suggestions he had stated could be repelled. If their lordships could be satisfied that the definitive treaty would not prejudice the rights of this country, then, if he could not approve of it, he should be ready to admit, that, the preliminary articles having been approved by parliament, it was bound to sanction the definitive treaty.—It had been acknowledged that the possession of Italy by France would justify a recurrence to a state of war—this was not his own argument, but the admission of the secretary of state. He now entreated the attention of the House to the situation in which the country stood at the time of the commencement of the negotiation. It was in a state of war, but under circumstances calculated as much as possible to alleviate its inconveniences. We had acquired the possession of colonies to an immense extent, which were valuable, not only from their military situation, but from their affording the means of carrying on the war itself. The produce of the West Indies had been 2,000,000*l.* annually, from which a very considerable revenue had arisen. This resource was lost. We had by our naval power obtained such a preference, that the fleets of France could not stir; now they had been suffered to proceed to the West Indies; and we were compelled to send an expensive armament to watch them. We were also in possession of resources sufficient to have enabled us to have carried on the war till we had obtained just, adequate, and reasonable conditions of peace. Had we availed ourselves of them? No; we had left to France the whole preponderating power of the continent, and had confirmed her in the possession of Italy. We had also added to France possessions of considerable importance in India, but had omitted to stipulate that they should not be fortified. We had given up to Holland the town and port of Cochin; a situation which the French would avail themselves of for the purpose of intrigue—one in which we should have most to apprehend from the attempts of France, and be least able to counteract them. His lordship maintained, that it was necessary, for the safety of our Indian possessions, that this country should have retained the sovereignty of the Cape. In order to be able to bring home our commercial fleets from India, or to send out troops, it would be always necessary to send a convey, and then we should be insecure. In time of war, how was a single regiment to be sent? It was true, that troops might be sent directly from Great Britain to India, without touching at the Brazils or the Cape; but in such case they would not be fit for service for many months after they had landed. But the advantages we possessed in the sovereignty of the Cape was this—When the war broke out in the Mysore with Tippoo Sultan, we sent a corvette to the Cape, whence a force of fresh troops were dispatched fit for immediate service, landed, marched up the country, and were present at the siege of Seringapatam. It was not, he believed, too much to say, that, by ceding the Cape to Holland, we had, in point of fact, ceded it to the power of France. In the West Indies we had restored to France Martinique and Tobago, and had facilitated the means of recovering St. Domingo. She was besides in possession of Louisiana, and the fruitful country of Florida; for it was a circumstance too plain to admit of a doubt, that Spain never could keep Florida while France had possession of Louisiana. In addition to these advantages she had the means of entering Mexico at any time.—Such was the comparative situation of France and England in the East and West Indies and America. How did we stand with respect to the Mediterranean, the next seat of our naval interest? Our naval superiority in the Mediterranean was most important; but his majesty's ministers had placed the country in such a situation, that he defied any one to tell him how a single ship could be sent to the Mediterranean. By this policy they had dispossessed the country of Majorca, Minorca, and even the Island of Elba, which could only be useful to France for the purpose of excluding us from Leghorn. We were thus destitute of the means of maintaining any fleet in the Mediterranean. His majesty's ministers had put it out of the power of the king of Sardinia to open his ports to an English fleet. It was owing to the assistance afforded by the king of Naples and Sicily, that lord Nelson had been able to refit that fleet which had effected the overthrow of the French armament at Aboukir, and disappointed the gigantic ambition of France. What was the return the English government had made to him for his assistance? It had procured a stipulation, that France should evacuate his dominions, but had not provided that she should not return whenever she thought proper. The inevitable consequence of such policy would be, that France would obtain the possession of Naples, and in the end we should find ourselves excluded by France from the whole commerce of the Levant. Every object of importance obtained by the valour of our navy had been surrendered by the counsels of those ministers who had made them pass into the hands of France.—Now to address their lordships on the subject of the defence made to these various charges—the defence rested on the ground of an imperious necessity for peace. In this defence, the noble lord who had advanced it was at least consistent, because he had uniformly maintained, that the country was not in a condition to strain every resource to carry on the war; but his majesty's ministers denied the existence of any such necessity. If it was true, that the country was under circumstances of imperious necessity, it was not astonishing that the definitive treaty should have been agreed to; but what security had we that France would suffer us to recover from that state of necessity to which she had reduced us? Such a plea on our part would only furnish a pretence for going on from sacrifice to sacrifice, from loss to disgrace, till at last we had nothing to contend for. It was to prevent this that he had brought forward the present motion, from which he was persuaded every advantage would be derived. It would have the effect of declaring to the public and to the enemy, that the country was not reduced to the necessity of making a disgraceful peace. In fact, such an argument as that founded upon necessity could not be raised by any country that was not prepared to receive the yoke of a conqueror. The question was, whether the advantages of the peace were greater than the disadvantages of the war? If it was expedient to have made this peace, it must have been so from the consideration that some advantage was obtained by it. The advantages might possibly be said to have proceeded from the extension of our commerce; or from enabling the country to adopt a system of economy; or from our having obtained some security for the continuance of peace. He should consider these points separately. With respect to our commerce, the peace must evidently have operated to the diminution of it. In support of this proposition, he referred to many observations respecting the acquisition of commercial power by France under the definitive treaty. Upon the question of economy, he contended, that in order to be able to husband our revenue, it was necessary that we should be able to protect it. With this view, he recommended government to keep a large naval and military establishment in a constant state of discipline. With regard to any naval establishment in the Mediterranean, ministers by their conduct had rendered it impossible to send a fleet there. It was with peculiar satisfaction he understood it was the intention of government to adopt the necessary measures of having a large channel fleet ready for actual service at forty-eight hours notice. With respect to security having been obtained for not going to war again, he could assure the House that no man wished more than himself that such might be the case. If it was not so, this country would have to commence a new war under every circumstance of disadvantage. If at the end of three campaigns we recovered what we had given up by the treaty, he should think we had made a most glorious war. Such was the situation in which the country stood; and he flattered himself that the House would concur with him in the propriety of considering how we might best resist the danger that threatened us. He feared the spirit of the country would be broken, unless its councils were directed by abler men. He had deemed it necessary to desire the House to carry a declaration to the foot of the throne, containing a resolution, that the House was ready to attend to every practicable economy calculated to enable this country to resist every future attempt on the part of the enemy; but that, in order to do so, it would be necessary to have a scale of defence sufficient to meet the danger.—The noble lord next adverted to the question of the right of the British flag in the navigation of the Eastern seas, and the claims of France and Holland to carry on a free and independent trade. He observed, that although this country might be disposed to treat such claims as ridiculous, Holland and France might not do so. If it should be necessary to maintain a war in India for the sovereignty of the territory, he should consider such war as just and necessary; but the question was, whether France and Holland would entertain the same opinion? Perhaps the very ship that carried out the orders to give up the factories to the French, might bring back an account of actual hostilities. He deprecated the consequences of a war in India, particularly at a time when the East India directors had stated that the company was too poor to instruct their own servants in the rudiments of their business. The noble lord again adverted to the impolicy of suffering the treaties to expire, recapitulated his arguments, and expressed his intention of introducing into the Address a hope that no time might be lost in settling, by amicable adjustment, those points which had not been arranged by the definitive treaty. He concluded by moving,

“That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to assure his majesty, that we have taken into our most serious consideration the treaty of peace, which his majesty has been graciously pleased to communicate to this House:

“That we acknowledge, with all humility and submission, his majesty’s undoubted prerogative of peace and war; and that we shall consider it to be our first duty, as far as may depend on us, to maintain inviolate the public faith, as it is pledged by this treaty, and to assist his majesty in performing, with uprightness and punctuality, those engagements into which his majesty has been advised to enter.

“But that we cannot conceal the painful apprehensions with which we consider the result of those engagements, nor can we forbear to offer to his majesty our humble and dutiful advice for the adoption of such measures as can alone, in our opinion, under the blessing of Providence, avert from us the dangers with which we are now surrounded:

“That it is impossible for us to have seen, without the utmost anxiety and alarm, all the unexampled circumstances which have attended the final conclusion of the present peace:—The extensive and important sacrifices, which, without any corresponding concession, this treaty has added to those already made on our part by the preliminary articles:—the unlooked-for and immense accessions of territory, influence, and power, which it has tacitly confirmed to France:—the numerous subjects of clashing interest,

“That, by relinquishing so many sources of prosperity in peace, and so many bulwarks of defence in war, and, by renouncing, at the same time, the advantage and security always hitherto derived from the accustomed renewal of former treaties, the British government has imposed on itself a greater necessity than has ever before existed for measures of increased precaution, and for determinations of unshaken constancy:

“That we therefore rely on his majesty’s paternal wisdom, for a watchful and unremitted attention to the situation and future conduct of the power with whom we have negociated; and we think it necessary more especially to assure his majesty, of our ready and firm support in that determination, which, we trust, his majesty will henceforward pursue, of resisting every fresh encroachment, of whatever nature, which shall be attempted in the maritime, commercial, or colonial rights and interests of the British empire:

“This our solemn declaration must, as we believe, materially conduce to prevent the necessity which it is calculated to meet: and we trust that his majesty will also approve of our desire to support it by a scale of naval and military defence, adequate to the extent of our danger, and to the importance of the interests which we have to maintain:

“The anxiety which we feel in this respect, is the necessary consequence of our sincere wish for the permanence of the public tranquillity, which his majesty has now re-established: And it is for the same important purpose, that we also most earnestly recommend to his majesty’s wisdom the pressing necessity of arranging, by immediate and amicable discussion, those points of essential interest which had been adjusted by former treaties, but for which no provision has been made in this negotiation:

and security of real peace; the object which it has been his majesty's benevolent desire, by such extensive sacrifices, to ensure to his loyal and affectionate people."

The Duke of Norfolk said, he differed very much from the noble lord who had preceded him. He approved highly of that exercise of the royal authority by which the late ministers were dismissed from power. They had involved this country in all the calamities which she had for years experienced, and therefore deserved all the disgrace which had been inflicted on them. With regard to the peace, he gave it his hearty approbation, as likely to produce all the blessings which could be expected from such a happy event. It did not meet with his concurrence because he thought it unexceptionable, but because he believed that any peace would be much more beneficial to mankind than the continuance of such a war. Our fleets and armies had certainly by their glorious achievements, raised the national character—great and glorious as it was in history—far beyond what the warmest patriot could have expected. But, with all that splendor of achievement, he preferred peace, as more conducive to the true interest and happiness of mankind. The noble peer who had made the motion now before their lordships, had indicated feelings of umbrage, if not of hostility, to the nation with whom we had lately concluded peace. Whatever the noble lords sentiments were, he for one, wished it to be understood, that, for the preservation of that peace which we had so lately accomplished, we ought to cultivate every mode of conciliation and friendship. The ideas, however, which had now been suggested, were indicative of the determination of the ex-ministers, should they ever return to power. Instead of confirming this peace with the drawn sword against the nation with whom we were lately at war—we ought to use every effort to remove all doubt, on their part, as to our sincerity. The peace had now been concluded, the national faith plighted; and he hoped never to witness a violation of the treaty, however disadvantageous it might be considered by many noble peers, whose opinions were opposite to those of the present administration. He was no friend to the measures of those in power, but he was a sincere friend to peace. To remove all jealousy and fear on the part of France, he would therefore earnestly recommend some motion in approbation of the peace. The noble duke, by way of amendment to the Address, moved to leave out all after the first two paragraphs, which went to acquaint his majesty of their having taken the definitive treaty into consideration, and their resolution to aid him in carrying it into effect.

Lord Pelham endeavoured to remove the objections which had been advanced by lord Grenville, who had, he said, in a very elaborate speech, attempted to excite sentiments adverse, not only to the present peace, but apparently to every kind of peace whatever. The preliminaries were not, in his opinion, so very different from the definitive treaty: the spirit, if not the letter, was preserved; and, as our national faith was pledged, he conceived that no man who was hostile to peace, could be friendly to the interests of the country. The noble lord seemed to be instigated by such a spirit of opposition to the peace, as if he were resolved, that there should be no peace at all. With regard to the little island of Elba, he conceived it unworthy of contest, and therefore would not detain their lordships by a long disquisition on that subject. As to Malta, it was to be restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, and its independence and perpetual neutrality acknowledged, under the guarantee of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Spain, and Prussia. Such an arrangement was perfectly consonant to the wishes of those who were highly esteemed for their intelligence and patriotism. Perhaps it would have been more agreeable to the policy of some, if Russia had taken possession of Malta; and why at one time such an arrangement had been postponed or neglected, was best known to the emperor, who had, in the settlement of differences, conducted himself in the most liberal manner. Many were of opinion, that his becoming one of the guarantees was a greater security for the independence of the Maltese, and consequently the peace of Europe, than the adoption of the other arrangement mentioned. Our possessions in the East and West Indies were much strengthened by the acquisitions which we had attained from the peace; and whatever apprehensions certain noble lords might entertain for the safety of our settlements in the East, when contemplating even the supposed ambitious views of the French government, he dismissed all such idle fears at once from his mind, as unworthy of serious reflection. Our sovereignty in the East was acknowledged and confirmed by various treaties, and therefore any apprehensions on that head were nugatory in the extreme. With regard to the state of the prince of Orange, his claims had by no means been abandoned; but it ought to be recollected, that, however powerful his claims were on our generosity as an old and faithful ally, he could not now be considered as a sovereign; and therefore an indemnity for the losses which he had sustained could not be recommended on such a principle of compensation. For the possessions which he had held independently of the States, he would certainly receive an adequate compensation from those who had the control of public affairs in Holland. Ministers were, therefore, not to blame when the claims of the house of Orange were called in question. They had acted with every attention to the rights of that prince, who had so faithfully conducted himself for the interests of this country, and that of our allies. Great jealousies and fears had been expressed on the subject of our commercial interests, as if we could, on the termination of hostilities, expect that the same extent of commerce would remain to us, which we enjoyed, by the gallantry of our seamen during the war. His lordship again earnestly recommended, that no ideas of a hostile nature to France should be circulated as if sanctioned by the British government, which was zealously resolved to use its best exertions for the cultivation of peace and friendship between the two countries. Every measure adopted by government on such an important subject, certainly challenged the investigation of any noble peer; but he could not help remarking, that the noble lord who now appeared in opposition to the peace might have chosen another time equally well adapted for his purpose.—Lord Pelham, before he sat down, intimated his intention of submitting to their lordships, as soon as the preceding motion and amendment were disposed of, another motion for an address to his majesty, approving of the definitive treaty now under discussion.

Lord Mulgrave said, he should support the motion of the last noble peer whenever he brought it forward. On this occasion, he had no hesitation to differ from his noble friend (lord Grenville), because he was conscious that in so doing he was discharging his duty to his country. His noble friend had dwelt much in condemnation of the arrangement for Malta. He, however, thought that every candid man would acknowledge the error of the noble peer, who had given the most unqualified reprobation of the peace. Malta, luckily for the interest and happiness of Europe, was to be restored to the Maltese, who were best able, under the guarantee of the powers mentioned, to govern that island. He could not conceive any solid ground for entertaining suspicions of the sincerity of France, so far as related to the fulfilment of the treaty; neither was he in the least alarmed at the supposed inordinate ambition of Buonaparté. He wished it to be fully understood by France, that neither the British government nor British people had the most remote intentions of violating the national faith so solemnly pledged. He saw no needless sacrifices which we had made for the attainment of Peace. It could not, by any reasonable man, be supposed, that on the return of that desirable event, we were not to make some sacrifice as an inducement for France to agree to terms of pacification. Notwithstanding all the sacrifices which we had made, there still remained to us great advantages, both in the East and West Indies, by the acquisition of Ceylon and Trinidad; but he confessed, that he could not contemplate the state of St. Domingo without serious apprehensions of danger to our settlements in the West Indies. It was evident, that whether Buonaparté subdued Toussaint, or formed a treaty of friendship with him, or whether Toussaint expelled the French from that island, the result would be the same to the British interests in the West Indies. It was also as evident, that a very numerous and powerful black army would be retained for the emergencies of the state. An army of Europeans would not be able to encounter the dangers and difficulties incident to such a station as St. Domingo. The consequence would be, that necessity would oblige us to keep up a military establishment, able to cope with that of France or Toussaint. As to the resources of this country, they were capable of answering every emergency of the state, even on the renewal of a war equally bloody with that which had now terminated. But our establishments ought to be in proportion to our resources; as we could not, perhaps, render our resources, immense as they were, adequate to prodigal establishments. He earnestly recommended that we should embrace every opportunity of cultivating a permanent peace with France.

Lord Auckland said, that the definitive articles on the table formed the closing scene of a war, into which, as he had often asserted, not from conjecture nor from argument, but from a positive knowledge of the fact, we were unavoidably forced. We were forced into it not merely for the preservation of other allied states; not merely for the support of those principles of civil and religious order which are essential to the well-being of mankind, but for the defence of our own constitution, and for our independence and existence as a free nation. The struggle had been long and most severe; he could, however, look back to the whole course and conduct of it with fair national pride. With respect to dominion, we had lost nothing, and had finally made and secured to ourselves acquisitions of great importance. With respect to national character, it might be said, without vaunting, that our navy and armies had been raised to a pitch of glory unexampled in all the histories of mankind. And lastly, our great object had been attained in the entire preservation of that constitution, and of those blessings resulting from the best of all governments, which our enemies, foreign and domestic, had attempted to destroy. Under this impression of the war, and of its consequences, he felt more disposed to consider the means of maintaining our actual pre-eminence among nations, than to examine, rigidly and repiningly, whether the terms of peace were such as in the course of the war he might have wished and expected. Whatever opinions, therefore, he might have avowed respecting the wise and just policy of declining all pacification till we had reduced the enormous and growing power of France, and had restored independence to the continental states;—whatever he might have thought, even since the epoch of the preliminaries, as to the expediency of continuing our exertions till we had obtained for ourselves at least, a solid and unequivocal security;—whatever he might now think, if he were to balance the expence, pressure and distresses of a prolonged war, against the distrusters, agitations, and dangers of an insecure pacification—he nevertheless saw and acknowledged the general wish and impatience of his countrymen to withdraw themselves from a state of war, and to make the best peace that relative circumstances would allow. How that general wish had arisen was a question which he would not at present investigate. He respected the public opinion; and the definitive treaty having been signed and ratified, ought to be executed with that scrupulous honour and good faith, which were, in peace as well as in war, the best and proudest distinctions of our national character.—It was now become his duty, as a peer of parliament, to quit all asperity of expression in regard to the people who were lately our enemies; to promote conciliation; and to remove all probable causes of misunderstanding. With these views he had called their lordships' attention to the effects and consequences of the non-renewal of a long list of treaties, which it had been the practice of more than a century to renew; and more especially to the separate consideration, whether it was desirable to renew the treaty of 1787, respecting the exercise and conduct of the French commerce in the East Indies. He had looked into the works of all the first publicists on these subjects, and had corrected himself in a mistake still prevalent in the minds of many, who state, in an unqualified sense, that all treaties between nations are annulled by war, and must be specially renewed if meant to be in force on the return of peace. It is true, that treaties, in the nature of compacts or concessions, the enjoyment of which has been interrupted by the war, and has not been renewed at the pacification, are rendered null by the war. But compacts not interrupted by the course and effect of hostilities, such as the regulated exercise of a fishery on the respective coasts of the belligerent powers; the stipulated right of cutting wood in a particular district; or possessing rights of territory heretofore ceded by treaty, are certainly not destroyed or injured by the war. On the other hand, there are cases in which treaties may be dissolved without any specific breach, and without any war between the parties. He would, suppose that we had not made war against Holland on her entire revolution and change of constitution and system; still our antecedent treaties with her would have been dissolved, by her incapacity to maintain the relations to which those treaties were meant to apply. And, therefore, it is stated by Vattel and other writers, that treaties cease whenever an essential alteration takes place in either of the contracting parties. And this doctrine will apply to our late treaties with Savoy, Switzerland, and other countries, which are temporary victims to the French revolution.—He would now state certain inferences to be drawn from these general positions, after observing that in the definitive articles, there is not any provision, direct or indirect, for the renewal of treaties which had subsisted before the war. And he would more especially advert to certain points which had been urged by other noble lords, beyond what he conceived to be warranted by sound reason or by the law of nations. And first, with respect to Holland:—It is not true that our non-renewal of the Dutch treaties will liberate the ships and vessels of that republic from the ancient practice of striking their flag to British ships of war in the British seas. That practice did not depend on the treaty of 1784, nor even on the treaty of Breda, in 1667. Those treaties were only recognitions of an existing right, and the treaty of 1667 expressly stated, that “the Dutch flag shall be struck in such manner as the same hath been formerly observed in any time whatsoever.” The same remark would be found applicable to the sixth article of the treaty of 1784, by which “the States General promised not to obstruct the navigation of the British subjects in the Eastern seas.” That article was no compact or grant; it was only an acknowledgment of a pre-existing and undoubted right; and was merely meant as a notice to our merchants, that they would not be disturbed in the exercise of their right.—Next with respect to Spain. He acknowledged that our commercial treaties with that country are lost and gone; but it is equally certain that those treaties had ceased to be executed long before the war; and he could add, from personal experience, that we had acquiesced in their being disregarded by the Spanish government. As to the cession to France of the Spanish part of St. Domingo, and of Louisiana, he had seen it with concern; but he saw also that it could not have been prevented or remedied by a renewal of former treaties; for the cession, in both instances, had taken place when the eighth article of the treaty of Utrecht had been rendered null by the war, and before it could be revived by any article in the pacification. It had been asserted by some noble lords, that by the non-renewal of treaties, and the consequent loss of the treaty of 1786, our right to cut logwood might be brought into doubt and dispute. Those noble lords ought to have drawn a contrary inference. He had already stated the incontrovertible principle, that treaties or compacts, the exercise of which are not interrupted by the course of the war, remain in full effect on the return of peace. Our privileges in the bay of Honduras had been given in lieu of ancient and acknowledged rights in the bay of Campeachy. Those privileges having been enjoyed without disturbance, during the war, are confirmed and established.—Lastly, with respect to France. The non-renewal of the commercial treaty of 1786 naturally presented itself to his observation. His parental affections, however, did not extend to his treaties; they did not influence him so far as to make him regret the loss of the treaty alluded to. It had already passed through its limited period, and had no claim to a renewal, unless our negociator at Amiens could have persuaded the French government that the French manufacturers are able, in 1802, to resume the competition to which they found themselves unequal in 1786, under the tariffs then settled. On our part also, it would have been necessary to reduce the wine duties to the specified amount at which they were fixed by the treaty of 1786; we must consequently have sacrificed the duties imposed during the war, which produce above a million sterling. He could not, however, quit this part of the discussion, without expressing his surprise, that any statesman can consider commercial treaties as of small importance to commerce. He believed himself to be fully aware of the great effects of capital, of energy, and of enterprise, but he knew, at the same time, that commercial treaties are most beneficial to trade, by regulating the terms of competition, by giving personal protection, and by other collateral advantages and encouragements. In support of these opinions, he would confidently appeal to the manufacturers of Birmingham, Staffordshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Paisley, who well recollect the benefits derived, during six years, from the French commercial treaty.—Thus far he had spoken only of certain detached interests as affected by the non-renewal of treaties. It had, however, been observed, that the great and venerable mass of treaties, which had so long constituted the title-deeds of so many states and empires, is utterly lost and gone. Unhappily this assertion is true. The most important acts of diplomacy, accomplished by the most enlightened of our ancestors, during a period of two centuries, are now left to moulder in dust, or to be drawn forth only for the curiosity and researches of historians. But this event, deplorable as it may be, is not caused by an omission in the definitive articles, but by the fate of war, by the existing circumstances of nations by the inscrutable decisions of Providence. The customary stipulation for the renewal of treaties had ceased to be applicable to the new order of things on the continent of Europe. It would be fastidious and fatiguing to their lordships to enter into a detailed examination of the treaties proposed to be provided by the project delivered at Lisle; but one example might serve, and he would entreat their lordships to refer to the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht. In that treaty, as in all others, there are several articles for the purpose of replacing the contracting parties in all the relations of peace and amity. The other provisions are, a disclaimer on the part of France, of the Pretender's family which is now extinct; a renunciation of the king of Spain to the crown of France; a renunciation of the duke of Orleans to the crown of Spain; a stipulation for the demolition of Dunkirk; a promise of just and reasonable satisfaction to all the allies of Great Britain; an article for the freedom of the city of Dantzic, now annexed to the Prussian dominion; and the treaty closes with the accession of the grand duke of Tuscany, the duke of Savoy, and the duke of Parma; all which powers are now either absorbed in revolutionary arrangements, or swallowed up by France. The treaties of Ryswick in 1697, of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, of Paris in 1763, and of Versailles in 1783, would be found equally irreconcilable to the present state of things. And surely the French plenipotentiaries at Lisle had the best of the argument with lord Malmesbury, when they objected to the renewal of treaties as irrelevant, contradictory to existing circumstances, and calculated only to create difficulties and confusion. In saying this, he desired at the same time to render both to lord Malmesbury and to the noble lord who had instructed him, that tribute of admiration and of gratitude, which is due to distinguished and superior talents, honourably exerted in a crisis most essential to the best interests of the British empire.—He now came to the consideration which had principally induced him to enter into the present discussion. It had been stated to their lordships, from great and respectable authorities, that our rights and interests in India might be affected by the non-renewal of the convention of 1787. Being convinced that this apprehension was groundless, and feeling at the same time that a misconception of the subject might convulse the most valuable and most essential of our possessions, he had long been desirous to lay before their lordships some facts and reasonings, of which he had an immediate and personal knowledge, and which he trusted must give full satisfaction to every unprejudiced mind. He found it impossible to add strength to the unequivocal and forcible language in which the noble lords opposite to him had asserted our sovereignty in India. That sovereignty had been acquired and established in a war forced upon us by the unjust and violent aggression of Serajah Dowlah, at that time the effective sovereign of Bengal. It had been confirmed and extended by subsequent grants, conquests, and treaties. It had been recognized by all the powers of Europe and of India, who have accepted and enjoyed privileges from us in our character of sovereigns. In that character we have maintained a uniform and decided, and undisturbed possession during forty years; and few of their lordships could produce a better title to their private estates. We support this right of sovereignty by a powerful and adequate force. Thus, then, we stand circumstanced with every advantage of conquest, grants, acknowledgement, long possession, and power. "True," say the noble lords, "but you are confounding the right with claims which controvert that right; you confound it with claims which the French East India Company heretofore asserted, which your convention of 1787 had quieted, but which will now be awakened, and revive. Here you plead to an audience already convinced; the question is whether France will be convinced." To such insinuations he could only reply, that France must be convinced, unless she meant to seek an unprincipled and extravagant ground of quarrel. France is bound by the law of nations both in India and elsewhere: by that law she must return to the situation recognised and established before the war, and not derogated from by the treaty of pacification. Their lordships would recollect, that by the 13th article of the treaty of Paris, in 1783, the king engaged to take such measures as should be in his power for securing to the subjects of France in India, a safe, free, and independent trade, such as was carried on by the French East India Company, whether they exercised it individually or united in a company. Before any adjustment could be made in Europe in consequence of that article, the servants of the French Company thought proper to set up various obsolete and obnoxious claims. They refused even to submit to the search of their ships in going up the Ganges; and one of their vessels, a sloop of war, was driven a shore, and sunk by our cannon, with the loss of one of her crew. These disagreements and their consequences were reported early in 1786 to the French ministers, when he (lord Auckland) was in habits of daily intercourse with them on other subjects. In the mean time colonel Cathcart (an officer of the highest hopes, if his life had been spared by Providence) was deputed by the Bengal government to the French chief governor, the Vicomte de Souillac, at Mauritius. An adjusted reference of the points in dispute was entered into between them, and was brought by colonel Cathcart to Europe. That instrument was considered by the king's government as utterly inadmissible, and he (lord A.) received instructions to disclaim it, and at the same time to open a negotiation explanatory of the commercial advantages and protection which his majesty would be disposed to give to the French subjects in the East Indies. His proceedings met with some interruption from the illness and death of that enlightened minister the comte de Vergennes, who in all their conferences had admitted the British sovereignty in India. But on the 1st of March 1787, he (lord A.) delivered to the comte de Montmorin a paper, entitled, "Explication Confidentielle," which their lordships would be pleased to hear. [He proceeded to read it accordingly.] The purport of that paper was, that the proposed convention must rest on the basis of the entire and undisputed sovereignty of Great Britain in India; and that France could be admitted to treat as having commercial interests only. In the subsequent arrangement of the articles, he had refused to insert any stipulation as to the duties to be paid in India by the French vessels, and also as to certain points of interior jurisdiction; lest such admissions should seem to imply any derogation from our rights of sovereignty. And, for the same reason, he had specifically refused to give a small provision to the family of the man who had been unfortunately killed by our cannon on board the French vessel in the Ganges; although such a provision had been stipulated in the agreement signed at the Mauritius. He thought it material to mention farther, that, previous to the signing the convention, and with that explicit frankness which he had maintained through the whole negotiation, he communicated to the French ministers a copy of the letter prepared by the Board of Control in England, and proposed to be sent with the convention to the supreme government in Bengal. That letter, the work of persons to whom their country has great and eternal obligations (Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas), stated unequivocally that we had considered the French subjects in India as having no existence there, but as inhabitants of factories for mere commercial purposes, and subject to all the restrictions and regulations which the exercise of our sovereignty might impose. The convention thus originated, thus constructed, and thus explained, was signed on the 30th August, 1787, and was afterwards ratified. And, from that period to the opening of the war, six years afterwards, it guided and governed without disturbance the whole course of the French commerce and French existence in India. What, then, must be the consequence of the non-renewal of a treaty so circumstanced, and of a relative situation so recognised and established, previous to the commencement of the war? He could not hesitate to assert, that the consequence with respect to us would be a strengthening, if it were possible, of our exercise and right of empire. The consequence with respect to France would be, if we were disposed to enforce it, the evident loss and implied renunciation of all the advantages and privileges which the convention of 1787 had given to her. He could not hesitate to add, that France retains no possible claim in India beyond the peaceable possession of the factories restored to her, and such liberal protection as may be granted by us to every nation with which we are at peace.—He found it impossible to close this subject without referring to the marquis Wellesley, whose provident and energetic mind had done so much towards extending and strengthening our Indian empire. That noble person, who had made such gigantic strides in the paths of fair conquest and of glory, would indeed be much astonished if he were told that, because our forty years sovereignty is not recited in the definitive articles, it may be questioned by a power which holds Brabant, Flanders, Savoy, and great parts of Germany and Italy, by the mere pretension of recent conquests. Still it may be repeated again and again, that France may revive her old and litigated claims; and so she certainly may. She may claim Gibraltar and Jamaica; she may assert a right to the free navigation of the Thames; but if she be disposed to bring forward absurd and hostile pretensions, will any clause in any treaty prevent her? If she be disposed to dispute our Indian empire, would the renewal of the convention of 1787 be an obstacle?—He would pursue the discussion no farther; nor would he have said so much if he had not thought it a duty, on a question of such essential importance, to clear away every possible doubt. He hoped and trusted that France, for her own sake, would show herself capable of maintaining the relations of peace and amity with other states: and that with the name of peace we shall gradually obtain all the attributes, and all the blessings and security of peace. If she be fairly disposed to heal the wounds of war, and to make compensation for those calamities which she has, during so many years, accumulated on mankind, she will now act towards us, not only in India but in every part of the world, with the same spirit of conciliation, and with the same good faith, which she is sure to experience at our hands. He, for one, however, would watch her conduct, both in the East and in the West, with jealousy, but without acrimony; with anxiety, but without fear. It had often been remarked, with respect to the great events and conjunctures of human life, that they are seldom either so good or so bad as they seem to be in their first impression. The strange occurrences of the last ten years had shown the fallibility of political speculations, and had taught him a due diffidence both in his own judgment and in the judgment of others. Still, however, he knew, beyond all possible doubt, that though we have made great sacrifices for peace, we retain every advantage of internal prosperity and extensive dominion: and that though his countrymen had been somewhat impatient for peace, still that the national spirit is unbroken, and as high as ever. The sense of our naval and military glories will long be warm upon our minds. We know the effect and force of the public resources and the public energy. We know that, in despite of all the expense of the war, we have already a sinking fund of nearly six millions sterling. We are prepared to resist and repel any real injury, and the United Kingdom (in that word alone we are indemnified for a great proportion of the expenses of the war) will remain happy, pre-eminent, and unassailable, as long as she shall remain true to herself, to her sovereign, and to her constitution.

The Earl of Carnarvon said:—If parliament could remain silent after the communication of the definitive treaty, without an implied approbation and admission, that it was adequate to the just expectations of the country, and consistent with the honour and dignity of the national character, he might have been glad that public discussion could have been avoided, in the perilous state in which this ill-omened peace has placed us; but the very dangers with which we are threatened, and the peculiar circumstances attending this peace, makes it the duty of parliament, not to shrink from the investigation of our alarming position under the operations of the definitive treaty, to which the public faith has been pledged by the king's ministers, but to examine and point out the errors committed, and the future dangers to which those errors must expose us, and in some such terms as the noble mover has suggested, keep awake the watchful eye of jealousy to secure all that is not yet surrendered to France, though left exposed to her ambition, and her talents for cavil. Nothing in the situation of the two countries, or in the events of the war, had prepared us for terms so disgraceful and humiliating. With all possible respect for the private virtues of those who compose the present administration, I could not look with confidence, or trust to their experience or abilities, for security amidst the difficulties which surrounded us; the country at large felt more astonishment than confidence, when, on their accession to power, they desired not to be judged incapable of the arduous task they had undertaken, till they had been tried and found deficient; they seemed to think it of trivial importance to the public, whether the state vessel, exposed to the most turbulent and dangerous sea with which it had ever been assailed, should be entrusted to known and approved abilities, or to persons who had never arrested the attention of the public, till they were placed where their errors might be irretrievably fatal to the country. They no sooner occupied the helm, than, as if inexperience was essential to the management of public interests, they pressed to their aid a noble lord, beloved indeed by all men, but one whom flattery would not venture to qualify with the character of an able and experienced negociator: thus seconded, they undertook the conduct and management of the most intricate and involved interests, and opposed their private virtues and unpractised abilities to the crafty experience of men, who for nine long years of duplicity and chicanery, had practised on the hopes, fears, and credulity, of the whole world, till by force and cunning, unrestrained by any moral virtue, they had raised their country to that formidable eminence, from which they impressed, with terror and mistrust, every nation with whom they had any political relations. Under such unequal negociators some disadvantages might naturally be expected, though the two nations were placed by the war in situations of no great disparity, though the respective countries felt equally the oppressions and burthens of the war, and looked with equal ardour for the blessings of peace. The preliminary articles, however, or rather the catalogue of uncompensated advantages to France and her allies, at the expense of Great Britain and her allies, staggered the most desponding advocates for peace; but the earnest wish for the return of its blessings, for the revival of all the relations of amity, and the peaceful renewal of friendly and commercial intercourse, and the extinction of all the horrors of war, overweighed all other considerations, and the preliminary articles, approved by no person, gave a species of joy to all classes, not indeed without hopes, and even assurances, that some articles respecting our allies, affecting our national honour, would be altered. But the definitive treaty has destroyed all those hopes; for it has only heaped concession on concession, and added disgrace to our disgrace, and even contrived to remove all security for those rights which still remain unconceded, and, with the security to those rights, they have removed even the hopes of stability from that peace, which they have purchased by such large concessions. They have wilfully deviated, or (which I rather suspect to be the case) submitted to a deviation from the uniform practice and caution of their predecessors, by not renewing all former treaties applicable to the present state of affairs; for it is no answer to say, as my noble friend has just observed, that many treaties formerly renewed bear no possible relation to existing circumstances. By the omission to renew any treaties, ministers have, as far as in them lay, unadjusted all former adjusted disputes, and this they themselves seem to admit, and, what is more extraordinary, claim merit for it; at least, they have left us to the honour and justice of France, without the customary acknowledgment of our rights, or a pledge that she would not dispute them hereafter. They have thrown such mystery over this part of their conduct, and have defended themselves so ambiguously on this subject, that it is difficult to understand whether they avow this omission as a deliberate act of theirs, productive of advantages which they sought, and have obtained ingeniously, over the baffled negociators of France; or whether, on the contrary, they have more prudently sought the renewal, and weakly submitted to a positive refusal on the part of France. The country have a right to know the truth; and I call upon them, in fairness, to declare on what footing this omission stands; for whatever may be the opinions of noble lords on the first supposition, it must follow from the last, that the deliberate refusal to renew any treaty is a distinct abrogation and a distinct reservation of formerly-adjusted discussions and disputes.—On the former supposition of a simple omission to renew treaties, I shall make a few observations, as I do not quite coincide in opinion with my noble relation, though I concur with him in the inference. It has been nearly admitted by ministers, that former treaties, by the omission of renewal, are abrogated: my noble relation does not go that length, but he thinks we have lost our title-deeds in most cases, and has affirmed, that we have thereby totally lost the gum trade. I am far from thinking any of these consequences follow simply from the tacit omission of the renewals. War does not abrogate any right, or interfere with the right, though it does with the exercise, but such as it professes to litigate by the war. It suspends, it is true, all relations of amity and commerce, all amicable intercourse; but nothing seems so obvious to common sense, as that peace has the same effect upon war, as war on the preceding peace, namely, that it removes all its operations; war oppresses all the relations of peace, peace removes all that pressure; the oppressed energies of peace revive. The subject whose litigation made the war, must be adjusted by the treaty of peace which terminates the war, or it would continue to be a subject undecided, and consequently subject to renewed litigation; but no reason can be shown, why formerly adjusted disputes, which have made no part of the reason of the the last war, should be re-adjusted; they may be the subject of revision at the will of the parties, but are not necessarily so. All the writers on the law of nations distinctly affirm, that peace has only relation to the war which it terminates, leaving all the former relative situations of the two countries as before the war; and that former treaties, though not expressly renewed, remain in full effect, if not expressly abrogated in the treaty of peace, or by private consent and acknowledgment. The uniform practice of renewing treaties makes some little deduction from the force of this doctrine, and leaves no excuse for ministers who have neglected the security from renewed treaties, when they might have obtained it. If, as I suspect, it has been refused by France to our requisition, the advantages of the peace, and its stability, stand upon a different footing from that which has been made known to parliament. We may have rights founded on the best title, supported by the best arguments, but we have no undisputed rights, all former disputes being let loose. The stability of peace depends more upon acknowledged and undisputed rights, than upon good and sufficient title. The noble secretary, who did not attempt to answer any of the objections so ably detailed by my noble relation, in lieu of argument, supposes that the whole drift of the noble mover's speech and motion had been against any peace on any terms—a supposition justified by no one sentence which he uttered. He certainly considered the peace as inadequate to our fair expectations, but that, such as it was, the country was pledged to its observance. He complained that the definitive treaty was rather the preliminary of war, than a confirmation of peace. He unanswerably proved, that we were exposed to the renewal of disputes endangering peace, by not renewing treaties which had adjusted them. In which of these positions the noble secretary finds an objection to the termination of the war on any terms, is not easily to be imagined. With respect to the loss of right to the gum trade, by the omission to renew the treaty which relates to it, I wish to say a few words. If I am right, that peace, by removing the pressure of war (except as far as conquest has altered possession), restores all other rights to their former state as before the war, in which doctrine I stand confirmed by the writers on the law of nations, the case of the gum trade will stand thus—By the treaty of 1783, Great Britain ceded to France, in full right, the river Senegal and its dependencies, with certain forts, on condition that the English shall have the liberty of carrying on a trade for gum, from the mouth of the river St. John to the bay and fort Portendic: for it is impossible not to consider a right reserved in a treaty that cedes the very subject which supplies that right, as a condition of the cession, and inseparably involved in the cession. We conquered the possessions thus ceded in the course of this war: by the treaty of peace now under discussion, we cede all the conquests of this war. We did not conquer that which we enjoyed by reservation from our former grant; we did not, therefore cede that which we had so reserved. This, however, is a matter of opinion; and both the conduct and the arguments of ministers leave it a matter of possible dispute. They therefore have made a peace with the reservation of a subject of quarrel in this instance. Indeed, it is a peace productive of no symptom or relation of friendship and amity; it has terminated the war, as if for the sole purpose of giving leisure to France to take possession of the cessions made to her: but, lest any friendly intercourse should appear intended on her part, she has carefully shut her ports to us. In the East Indies, my noble friend who spoke last has proved, by his private notes, that he had asserted, in the convention of 1787, our sovereignty; but the treaties of 1783, and 1787, containing no such word, seem to prove that it had been ineffectually assented. And it appears, by both those treaties, that we had ceded the independent trade over all our possessions, which, by force of the term, cannot be dependent on any thing, not even on the treaty which stipulates that such grant shall be, and becomes only evidence of the independent right. The limitations respecting salt, in the convention of 1787, are merely conventional, and fall with the treaty. But should all this be disputed by noble lords, it becomes a proof that ministers have left unsettled, points which may, and are likely to be disputed. The motion made by the noble lord is therefore necessary to our situation, is the only possible corrective, or, at least, palliation to the mismanagement of ministers, who have pledged the country to the peace as it stands; for the king's prerogative to make peace and war is indisputable, but it is not in his power to make a bad peace a good one. It is equally the king's prerogative to appoint his counsellors and ministers, but he has not the power to give them experience and ability to manage the complicated affairs and interests of a great nation. Good intention and private virtues are not excuses for rashness in undertaking, and errors in the management of interests on which the peace, commerce, and future importance and prosperity of this country must depend.

The Earl of Westmorland defended the definitive treaty and said, there were very strong reasons why the commercial treaties with France and the other powers ought not to be renewed. When former treaties had been renewed, great doubts existed as to the propriety of doing so. But he would ask, would it be wise to refuse to treat with Holland and Spain through the medium of France? The treaty of 1787 had been made merely to correct the inadvertency of 1783. If it was said, that we gained nothing by the late war, he would desire noble lords to look at the different states of Europe, to see what they had lost, and how little we had lost in comparison. We had fortunately a great and able statesman at the head of our affairs; and if every other power engaged in the war had had such ministers, we should not now have to regret the desolation of the greater part of Europe. Much stress had been laid upon the appointment of Buonaparté to the presidency of the Italian republic; but he would ask, had France gained a single inch of territory in Italy by that act? Certainly not: her power there could not be increased. As to the Isle of Elba, where was the difference, whether it belonged to France, or to the king of Etruria? So far from the occupation of Louisiana by the French being dangerous to the American states, it would only serve to awaken their jealousy against a power which would never be able to attack them in that quarter with any success; and he trusted, that in any future contest between us and France, we should find these states to be most friendly and watchful allies. None of the things complained of had made such an alteration in the affairs of France as would justify ministers in breaking off the treaty and renewing the war. There was one reason predominating over every other, which made it necessary for ministers to conclude a peace—that was the general wish of the people; for though he would not have ministers be guided by speeches pronounced in Guildhall or Palace-yard, they were bound to regulate their conduct by the sentiments of the people at large. The noble earl then drew a comparison between the state of France and Great Britain: the former was distracted by parties, the existence of its present government depended on the life of one man, and the country was not in a condition to restore either its commerce or its navy. How different was the state of Great Britain, whose commerce and wealth gave her strength, and enabled her to call forth at any time all the energies of the people, who now enjoyed a state of unexampled tranquillity.

The earl of Darnley and lord Ellenborough rose together. A strong cry of lord Ellenborough! prevailed.

Lord Ellenborough began with declaring that he was sorry to delay, for a few minutes, the great share of entertainment and information which their lordships would, doubtless, derive from the speech of the noble earl, but that he was anxious to discharge his mind, by saying to their lordships what his duty compelled him to address to them. His lordship then made an apology for obtruding himself upon the House after so recently taking his seat in it, but what he had heard in the course of the debate rendered it impossible for him to resist what he held to be his indispensable duty. He would, therefore, though with great diffidence, submit his sentiments to their lordships; and first, he would take notice of the extraordinary complaint urged by the noble lord who moved the address, that he had not been fairly dealt with, because, forsooth, ministers had not thought proper, prematurely, to open their defence of the definitive treaty in any of the preliminary debates that had taken place, in detail, on separate articles of it. Had that noble lord any right to complain, when he had himself been indulged, again and again, in discussing, at considerable length, those topics upon which he, and those noble lords who acted with him, chose to descant, although the noble lord had himself moved and named a day for taking the definitive treaty into consideration? After having, with great animation and severity, expressed his indignation at the noble lord's having dwelt on the complaint that his majesty's ministers had left him still at a loss to know in what manner they intended to answer the objections urged by him and other noble lords, respecting the various omissions in the treaty, lord Ellenborough proceeded to notice the adverse arguments advanced by the opposers of the treaty in the present debate. He emphatically begged leave, in the first place, to return his most grateful thanks, as an individual, to those ministers who had restored the blessings of peace to their country. The objections that he had heard against the definitive treaty, in his mind, weighed not a feather in comparison with the inestimable advantages of a cessation of hostilities under the present circumstances of the country. With regard to the noble lord's argument, that the public law of Europe was become a dead letter, because certain treaties were not renewed, he was astonished to hear men of talents lay any stress upon such a point of reasoning. To what use would the revival of all the solemn nonsense and important absurdity contained in those treaties have contributed? Were they not replete with articles totally inapplicable to the present situation of Europe; and were they not, for that reason, converted into useless trash and absolute waste paper? It was not in the immediate line of his professional studies to dedicate much time to treaties, but he had read over those in question with aching eyes, and was no stranger to the law of nations, which was founded on principles of immutable justice, was less liable to misconstruction and abstract reasoning, and more to be relied on than any single treaty, or collection of treaties; and he could assure the noble lord, that there were very few deviations in the writers on the law of nations upon the subject. Noble lords might, therefore, as well talk of the revival of the condition of mankind at some very remote period, and of the ancient treaties which had become, from the change of circumstances in Europe, obsolete and inapplicable. The noble mover was not always the strenuous advocate for the renewal of treaties; for it would be found, from the instructions to our negociator at Lisle, in the drawing up of which the noble lord must have had no inconsiderable share, that there was a particular injunction against the renewal of certain stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht. Our sovereignty in India, upon the violation of which, by the non-renewal of treaties, so much stress had been laid, he thanked God, depended upon surer and stronger ties than all the treaties that ever were made could give: it depended upon the right of conquest in a legitimate war, a war of defence; upon the public and repeated recognition of all the powers of Europe connected with commerce; and upon the established right of possession—the best right of all. Our sovereignty in India was now upwards of forty years in duration, and is older than any existing government in India. It could not be strengthened by all the treaties that could be devised; and the power that could meditate to dispute that title, must be so divested of all justice and moderation, that she would not be bound by any treaties that could be devised or entered into. His lordship took a rapid view of all the transitions of our acquisitions of territory and dominion in India, naming the various powers through whose hands it had devolved to us, and thus making out his assertion, that our sovereignty of India was founded on the right of conquest in a legitimate war. In the course of this historical detail, his lordship said, our acceptance of the Dewannee was a foolish thing, although he did not, by any means, intend to detract from the merit or gallantry of lord Clive.—He next adverted to Malta, and insisted that the arrangement with respect to that island, was wise and prudent. He contended that the order was not in such a state of poverty as had been represented, and that it was not probable that it would fall into the hands of France. With regard to the Cape of Good Hope, the cession of which was so much deplored, he thought we were well rid of it. The expense of that post would have been so great, that the country would very soon have had reason to complain of its retention. We could not send a chaldron of coals thither without an expense of 26*l*. 10*s*.; and it was well known, that at the time the Dutch were sending home, during our scarcity, a small and scanty supply of grain to this country, the government there was obliged to send ships to India, to get rice and other provisions, and an urgent request came home for a supply of biscuit, not for the troops only, but even for the Dutch themselves. It had been urged by the noble lord, that, deprived of the Cape, our fleets must be employed in convoying our trade and our troops to India; but could it be forgotten, that in the war before the last we had France, Spain, and Holland against us, with a fleet more equal in power than what they now could boast of? A great deal of clamour had been raised about the free navigation of the Indian seas: he would ask, whether a single British ship had been stopped in those seas by the Dutch? And, with respect to the idle and paltry compliment of the Dutch striking their flag to us, he thought there was not much magnanimity in enforcing that from the weaker power, which we did not require from the stronger.—Of Portugal much had been said, but he believed that that country was truly thankful for what we had done for it in the definitive arrangement for peace. With regard to the address moved by the noble lord, it was insidious. It did that by insinuation which it did not dare to avow in terms. It would have been much more manly and dignified in that noble lord, if he really thought that ministers deserved to be vilified and aspersed in the manner in which they had been that day, to have moved an explicit address to advise his majesty to dismiss his present ministers as wholly unworthy of his confidence. The country in general, he was persuaded, entertained very different sentiments of their conduct, and most especially in respect to the peace which they had obtained. The country had not forgotten the circumstances of gloom and depression under which they came into office, and in consequence of which men of less determined spirit than themselves might have shrunk from the acceptance of situations of responsibility. He was persuaded the country joined heartily with him, when he gave ministers his most grateful thanks for that spirit and moderation, that wisdom and firmness, which had enabled them to rescue the British empire from the dangers and difficulties with which it was surrounded. His lordship declared he should vote for the amendment.

The Earl of Darnley said, he agreed with the learned lord, in thinking the present government deserving of approbation, for the spirited manner in which they had undertaken to manage the affairs of the country in a period of unexampled difficulty, as well as for the mixture of firmness and moderation which their conduct had displayed till the period of the signature of the preliminary articles of the peace, to which he had already given a silent vote of approbation. He must now, however, beg leave to state the grounds upon which that unqualified vote of approbation had been given to the preliminaries, as well as those upon which he felt it his duty to refuse it to the definitive treaty. His opinion of the preliminaries was, that, although they contained nothing splendid, nothing gratifying to national pride, or that afforded fit subject of exultation, they nevertheless contained nothing absolutely degrading; and though, perhaps, they had gone as far in concession as it was possible, short of humiliation, he did not think they had passed those bounds; and therefore, taking such a peace as the least of two evils, when compared with that of carrying on the war any longer without a reasonable hope of improving our situation, he had thought ministers perfectly justified in the part they had taken, and had supported them accordingly.—There were a few points which remained to be finally settled by the definitive treaty, and to these he could not help calling the particular attention of the House. He certainly had flattered himself that they were not points of complicated arrangement, but that they would have been easily, speedily, and satisfactorily settled. He took for granted, that the money due on account of prisoners would either have been put in a train of immediate payment, or some substantial pledge given to secure future payment; that the emperor of Russia was ready and willing to take Malta under his protection; and that the acknowledged defect in the preliminaries, in not specifically providing for the interests of the prince of Orange, would have been effectually remedied in the definitive treaty. A noble lord had endeavoured to prove, that there was no essential difference between the two. He began with the article that regards Malta, justly considering it the most important: but he certainly had failed to prove that the definitive treaty had not placed that important island in a situation far more disadvantageous to this country, than it would have been if the spirit of the preliminaries had been followed up. It was generally admitted, that the most desirable arrangement would have been the cession of Malta in full sovereignty to Great Britain. That was supposed unattainable, and the next best, namely, the placing it completely out of the power and influence of France, by ensuring the protection of a third great and powerful nation, was promised by the preliminaries: whereas the definitive treaty leaves it open to the intrigues of France, and, in all probability, an easy prey to her power. In this essential article, therefore, we have lost much by the manifest difference between the treaty and the preliminaries.—The article respecting the prisoners of war had been arranged in a manner equally unsatisfactorily. The noble earl states, that the Ottoman Porte, the ally of Great Britain, was not admitted to the congress at Amiens, because the Porte had no cessions to make. If the noble earl had not immediately proceeded to speak of Portugal, he should have thought he had forgotten that Portugal was also the ally of Great Britain, and not only had cessions to make, but that she actually had made very material cessions. At so very late an hour, he would not enter into detail upon other parts of the subject; but he must enter his protest against the presumption, that the definitive treaty did not differ from the preliminary articles, because nothing could be more self-evident than that it did differ from them most essentially. Although he felt that the address moved by the noble lord contained a good deal that could not be controverted, yet as it also contained a strong implied censure upon ministers, to whom upon this and every other occasion he would give full credit for the best intentions, he should content himself with having thus briefly stated his sentiments.

The Earl of Rosslyn said, he rose chiefly to correct a mistake which his learned friend had fallen into. What he alluded to was, the honour due to the British flag from the Dutch in the narrow seas, and within a certain boundary of our coasts.

It was not an idle and trifling ceremony, not a mere form, and therefore to be undervalued; but an important right, which implied our dominion of the sea. The maintenance of that right warmed the heart of every British seaman, and filled it with pride and exultation. He must feel great regret if the insisting on an honour, so flattering to the prejudices of our seamen, was to be forborne. Nor was our claim to this honour in the British and St. George's Channel, confined to the Dutch alone; it was due to us from all nations navigating those seas. At the same time, it was no claim of modern date. Our right of sovereignty at sea originated nearly three centuries since. In the reign of James the 1st the Dutch disputed it, and that eminent expounder of the law of nations, Grotius, wrote a learned book against it; but it was answered most satisfactorily by Mr. Shelden, whose book made such a powerful impression on men's minds, that the right was fully established.—With respect to the definitive treaty, he heartily regretted that more was not obtained than had been obtained; and, indeed, considering the attainment of two great and important objects, in the accomplishment of which the noble and illustrious hero opposite (lord Nelson) had so gloriously distinguished himself, we were entitled to have expected more advantageous terms. He alluded to the expeditions to Egypt and the Baltic. It was agreed, on all hands, that his majesty ought to be supported, in order to enable him to carry the treaty into complete execution. From certain words contained in the address moved by his noble friend, he lamented that, for the first time in his life, he should feel himself obliged to give his vote against him, and in favour of the amendment.

The Lord Chancellor entered into an elaborate argument in defence of the definitive treaty, declaring that as the House had, by a great majority, given their sanction to the preliminary articles, it was neither a usual nor a very candid proceeding, to discuss each article of the definitive treaty separately. The peace ought to be taken as a whole, and viewed collectively, upon a fair comparison of the relative situation of Great Britain, of France, and of Europe. He had heard many objections to the definitive treaty from his noble friend (for so he would still call him) which were certainly of some weight; but he had also heard many that were so insignificant, that he was surprised at their coming from so respectable a quarter. He was not ready to say, that the present was a glorious peace, but he had discharged his duty conscientiously in advising his majesty to sign it; and he trusted, that, if candidly viewed, it would be found to be as good a peace, as was likely to be obtained, all the circumstances under which it was made taken into consideration. His noble friend had complained of variances in the definitive treaty from the preliminary articles, and of omissions of matters of considerable importance. The first, he believed, were only two in number:—the stipulations relative to the limits of French Guiana, and those relative to Malta. The omissions stated were of greater importance: they were the non-renewal of old treaties, the not having made a more specific stipulation to secure an adequate compensation to the prince of Orange for his losses, the not providing for keeping the Cape and Cochin, and the want of stipulation for the right of cutting logwood in the bay of Honduras, and of bringing the gum from Senegal and the coast of Africa. He would consider the omissions first. And here he must differ a little from his learned friend in respect to the importance of treaties solemnly executed between nation and nation. He had, during twenty years of his professional life, witnessed the growth and improvement of the distinguished talents of his learned brother, with whom he had lived in habits of uninterrupted friendship: he could not, however, agree with him in thinking, that treaties deserved to be treated in the light manner he had treated them. He would, however, assert, with his learned friend, that most of the conditions of the treaties, the omission of the revival of which were complained of by the noble mover, were from the violent change that the circumstances of Europe, and more especially of France, had undergone within the last twenty years, wholly inapplicable to the present treaty; and at the same time, all the great and important rights, which his noble friend thought lost and abandoned, because they were not recognized in the definitive treaty, stood secured on a much stronger basis than any recognition of them by any treaty whatsoever. With regard to the sovereignty of India, he agreed completely with the whole of the argument contained in a speech adverted to by his noble friend.

Let his noble friend recollect, that the argument in question was that of a lawyer and a statesman (Mr. Dundas); better qualified, perhaps, from the public situation he had filled for the last ten years, to judge with accuracy of every right and interest connected with our possessions in India, than any other man in existence. His noble friend (lord Auckland) had already, he flattered himself, convinced the House, that our right of sovereignty of India stood recognized and secured beyond the reach of future doubt.—With regard to the compensation to the prince of Orange, it certainly was said, in the debate on the preliminary articles, that a full security for an adequate compensation to that unfortunate prince for his losses would be obtained, and if there was any reliance to be placed on the faith of nations, solemnly pledged, an adequate compensation would be secured, agreeably to the 18th article of the definitive treaty. A noble earl (Carlisle) had, in a previous debate, laid great stress on the negotiation of a guarantee, stated to have been privately executed on the day when the plenipotentiaries of the four contracting powers had signed the definitive treaty, between the ambassador of Holland and the plenipotentiary of France, to secure the former power from being liable to claim on them for any compensation to be made good to them. But no convention of that sort, privately and separately executed between two of the contracting parties, could absolve either France or Holland from their solemn obligation to Spain and Great Britain, under a definitive treaty signed and executed by four contracting parties.—Much argument had been urged respecting the importance of the Cape, but did his noble friend who commenced the debate recollect the immense charge the holding it in our hands, for so short a time, had been to the country? Neither, if he had been rightly informed, was it of any material importance to the East India company, as a port for their ships to touch at in their passage to and from India. When it was so long possessed by the Dutch, every desirable advantage was easily obtained from it; and so, he doubted not, the case would be again.—As to all the noble lord's reasoning upon the idea of France, Holland, and Spain having a right, under the article in the definitive treaty, to have a more formidable united fleet than us at the Cape, in the proportion of three to one, it was altogether visionary. Had it ever been the case in former wars between this country and those powers, or was it at all likely that it should ever be the case in the course of hostilities that might be commenced in future? He assured the House, that no danger was to be dreaded on account of the Cape being delivered over to that power, in the hands of which it had remained for so many years, without injury to this country or its interests. As little danger of our losing the right to cut logwood in the bay of Honduras was to be apprehended, as there was of danger from the Dutch being allowed to resume the possession of the Cape. Let it be held in mind, that Honduras became the rightful property of Great Britain by conquest, and was never ceded to Spain, without an acknowledgment, on the part of the court of Madrid, of our undoubted right to cut logwood. In proportion as the right of conquest was paramount to the effect of treaties, in which that right was not specifically abandoned and resigned, our right to cut logwood in the bay of Honduras remained more secure and free from challenge, than it could have done, if it had been mentioned in the definitive treaty. With regard to the gum trade from Senegal and the coast of Africa, he saw no ground for imagining that it was at an end, from what was stated to be a culpable omission in the treaty under consideration. It had been carried on by us uninterruptedly during the war, and he had no doubt it would continue to be exercised by us without molestation.—As to the right of the flag, he could not regard it as a matter of so trivial a nature, as his learned friend had seemed to consider it. It was a right of great national importance, as his learned friend who had spoken last had truly stated. But in order to account for its not having been insisted on in the definitive treaty their lordships ought to carry their minds back to historical facts, and to compare them with the present treaty. Holland had long submitted to the right claimed and exercised by this country of the honour due to the British flag. France and Spain had pertinaciously refused to acknowledge it. Could his majesty's negotiator, therefore, in the discharge of his duty as a plenipotentiary, vested with powers to negotiate a treaty between four contracting powers, expect to be able to persuade the other plenipotentiaries to admit a stipulation of the recognition of a right, of which two of the contracting powers had never acknowledged, though the other had done so ever since the year 1515? In no treaty with France or Spain was the recognition of this right to be found, and it must remain as it had hitherto done on the power of practically enforcing it. His lordship next came to speak of the stated variances between the definitive treaty and the preliminary articles, the first of which was, the supposed departure from the sixth article of the latter, which stipulates, "That the territories and possessions of her most faithful majesty shall be preserved entire." He reminded the House, that under the words of that article of the preliminary treaty, this country could not possibly be understood to undertake for more, than to obtain a restitution of any territory obtained from Portugal by force of arms. The settlements of the limits of Guiana between the French and Portuguese was an arrangement adjusted by the treaty of Badajos, to which this country was no party, nor could it possibly exercise any influence over it. But he did not, on a geographical examination of the limits specified in the 7th article of the definitive treaty, find the smallest reason to entertain the apprehensions which the noble mover had declared to have forcibly impressed his mind. With respect to her most faithful majesty having ceded a part of her domestic territory to Spain, that was in like manner the result of an arrangement adjusted between the courts of Lisbon and Madrid, but of a very unimportant nature; it being universally declared, that the ceded territory was unproductive and of little value, beyond the reach of the defence or protection of the Portuguese government, and had been, insignificant as it was, the subject of long and repeated disputes between the two crowns.—The disposal of Malta had been another theme for the display of his noble friend's eloquence, and he had argued upon it under the idea, that Malta must soon fall into the hands of the French republic; but a view of the tenth article of the definitive treaty would convince every impartial man, that there was not the smallest probability of such a result. The French and English languages were put an end to, and a Maltese language was directed to be established, the forces of his Britannic majesty were to evacuate the island and its dependencies in three months after the ratification, or sooner, if it can be done, and the island was to be delivered to the grand master, or commissioners properly empowered to receive possession. The garrison was to be half Maltese, and the supreme command as well as the appointment of the officers, was to be vested in the grand master, upon certain conditions, and the ports were to be open to all nations. Could any man hear these facts, and not be convinced that abundant care had been taken to guard against the influence and dominion of the French. Supposing for a moment, what was almost incredible, that his Sicilian majesty should, through the predominating influence or power of France, be induced to betray his trust, did any man believe, that if this country saw France preparing to send a force against Malta, she would not instantly dispatch a superior force to protect the island; and, with the assistance of the Maltese, allowed on all hands to entertain a strong predilection for this country, could much doubt be entertained of our success in counteracting the efforts of France?—With regard to the restoration of Egypt to the Porte, that important event had been effected even prior to the cessation of hostilities, through the distinguished valour and brilliant success of the noble admiral he saw near him (lord Nelson), and the bravery and skill manifested by the commander, officers, and soldiers of his majesty's forces, who had subsequently landed and subdued the army of the French republic, checked their progress, and finally compelled them to evacuate the country. It was to be remembered, that one reason why our forces could not more essentially conduce to the protection of Portugal was, that they were necessarily withdrawn for the purpose of achieving an object in Egypt of infinitely higher importance, as the safety of our Indian possessions depended on it.—His lordship spoke of the late ministers in terms of great respect, acknowledging that their spirited exertions had not only led to our successes in Egypt, but at Copenhagen, where the same gallant hero to whom he had just alluded, had equally distinguished himself, and secured the admiration and gratitude of his country. He adverted to the argument that had been advanced respecting the Russians made prisoners by France, while they served as auxiliaries to the British army, and treated the conclusion of the noble lord who moved the address, that we were liable, under the treaty, to be called on to pay for furnishing them with clothes, arms, and ammunition, which they were to direct against us, as scarcely worth a serious argument.—After having examined every objection that had been urged against the different articles of the definitive treaty, his lordship came to the consideration of the address itself. His learned friend (lord Ellenborough) had said, that it would have been more manly and more dignified in the noble mover, if he really thought that his majesty's ministers had made the bad peace he had described it to be, to have come forward with an unqualified address to his majesty, advising him to dismiss his servants as wholly unworthy of his confidence. His reason for objecting to the address moved by his noble friend was, that in substance and effect, though not in terms, it amounted to the very address that his learned friend described; it was, in fact, an address of censure and removal; and as to that part of it, which recommended instant negotiation and remonstrance upon important points, stated to have been neglected in negotiating the present treaty, he agreed with the noble duke who moved the first amendment, that to open a new negotiation upon such grounds, after a definitive treaty had been concluded in all its forms, would be to negotiate with a drawn sword in our hands, and would inevitably lead to a renewal of the war.

Earl Camden said, that in many of the arguments that had been urged by the noble mover, he entirely coincided. He was neither satisfied with the preliminary articles nor with the definitive treaty; he thought the cessions made on our part were many and valuable, and that nothing equal to a fair balance had been ceded to, or retained by us; there was not, therefore, a reciprocity visible on the face of the treaties. Nevertheless, as the country anxiously panted for peace, and their hopes and prospects of soon obtaining it had been raised and encouraged by the preliminary treaty, perhaps what had taken place in the interim, unwarrantable as the transactions on the part of France had been, would not have justified a rupture of the negotiation; and, therefore, it might be right to advise his majesty to order the definitive treaty to be signed. As the noble secretary of state's amendment contained the best and most essential parts of his noble friend's address, and particularly that very important advice to his majesty, to declare that he would concur in no farther encroachment or aggrandizement on the part of the French republic, he should vote for it.

The Duke of Richmond said, he had listened with great attention to the masterly arguments of the noble mover, and he owned he felt conviction upon many of the points which the noble lord reasoned upon. At the same time, he was not one of those who approved of the conduct of the war. He thought it had not been wisely or economically conducted. In particular, he must complain of the lavish manner in which the public money had been squandered in running after every petty German prince to beg that he would take some of our cash; not that he was an enemy to subsidies when properly applied, and due care was taken that we should receive the advantages proposed in granting each subsidy. He wished there could have been unanimity on so important a question. But, exclusive of the several omissions in the definitive treaty, he could not but think that nothing short of the strongest necessity could have justified the making of such a disadvantageous peace. Was it for the honour of the country to offer peace to the enemy, and to submit to the most humiliating terms during the expectation of a threatened invasion? Did it indicate the high spirit of a brave nation, which had carried on the war single handed, with the greatest success, in all quarters of the globe? Were we not prepared at all points to repel the invaders, if they had dared to carry their menaces into execution? Had we not insulted their coasts and braved them in their ports, after having broken the northern confederacy by the intrepid conduct of the hero who sat on the bench below him? He disapproved of a change of system under such circumstances. He must therefore consider that the negotiations had been pressed to a conclusion in an inauspicious hour. He did not doubt that the present ministers meant well; and they should have his support to every prudent and efficient measure that they should bring forward; but he must stop short on the present occasion, as he could not vote for the amendment.

Lord Hobart said, he trusted the situation in which he stood, as one of the ministers whose character was materially involved in the opinion the House might form upon the question before them, would be his excuse for venturing to hope for the indulgence of their lordships at so late an hour. He had listened to the noble duke with that attention that was due to a person of his respectable talents and parliamentary experience; and, however strongly he might feel the advantage of obtaining his grace's concurrence on the present occasion, more especially if it should be accompanied by an unanimous vote, he could not think that the government ought to forego their just pretension to call upon the House for an approbation of their conduct in having concluded a definitive treaty upon the basis of the preliminary articles, even at the hazard of that unanimity which would otherwise be so extremely desirable. The noble duke, indeed, who had not voted upon the preliminaries, might consider himself perfectly at liberty with respect to the definitive treaty; but he was at a loss to understand, upon what ground any noble lord who had supported the preliminaries could withhold his assent from the treaty then under consideration. The noble duke had disapproved of the peace on account of the time at which it was negotiated. He had disapproved of negotiation when invasion was threatened. He disliked a change of system under such circumstances. Lord Hobart denied that any change of system had taken place in that respect, since the present administration had come into office. The noble lord opposite (Grenville) some time before he relinquished his official situation, had repeatedly assured the House, that the question of peace was reduced to a question of terms. The present administration, immediately after their accession to office, had expressly declared, upon being pressed for a communication of their sentiments respecting peace, that they would make no professions upon that subject, and only desired to be judged by their actions. It, however, was now evident, that they had lost no time in opening a negotiation. That negotiation had indeed been protracted from various circumstances: but principally from the situation of affairs in Egypt. The French, in the expectation of a successful issue to the contest in which they were engaged, in that country, were not disposed to conclude a treaty founded upon the presumption of their failure in that enterprise; his majesty's ministers would agree to no terms which admitted the possibility of a contrary result, and thus the negotiation was protracted, until the persevering valour of the British troops had nearly effected the expulsion of the French from Egypt. With respect to a threatened invasion, there might have been a time when the reinforcements which it was judged necessary to send in support of our gallant countrymen in Egypt, might, to a certain degree, have created an idea that we had weakened ourselves at home. But, long before the negociation was brought to a conclusion, our preparations were such as to leave no apprehension upon any man's mind for the consequences of any attack which the French might have ventured to undertake. Upon the ground, therefore, of threatened invasion, the objection of the noble duke could not apply. In other respects, the time of concluding the treaty was peculiarly well chosen. No doubt was then entertained of the prevailing sentiments of the people in favour of peace. Delay would inevitably have produced petitions upon the subject from every part of the country; and it could hardly be necessary for him to point out to the House the disadvantages which must have attended a negotiation commenced under such circumstances; disadvantages, indeed, of such a nature, as could leave no hope of the treaty so undertaken being concluded upon terms, to which a government, that really valued the honour and interest of the empire, could possibly accede; delay therefore could only have rendered peace unattainable, and have led to dishonourable conditions.—He could not refrain from making some few remarks upon certain topics which had been urged by the noble mover in the course of his speech; and, first, with respect to the Cape. He had formed a decided opinion upon that subject, in some degree from his own observations; but principally from communications with a variety of persons connected with India; and he could add the high and respectable authority of the noble lord at the head of the Admiralty, who from indisposition had been obliged to leave the House, and he could explicitly declare, that he had scarcely ever met with one person who did not consider the Cape a burthen rather than an advantage to this country.—Lord Hobart here took occasion to advert to the opinion of Mr. Dundas, which had been publicly pronounced in favour of the Cape. He next went into a detail of his reasons for the opinion he had offered to the House respecting the Cape; that the expense of it had been enormous, that its revenue did not pay its civil establishment; that it was a peculiarly expensive station for ships; that for the six months they could be in Table Bay, it was not a perfectly safe one; and that for the other six months, when they were forced to go into Table Bay, it was extremely inconvenient as a port of refreshment; that no firewood could be procured except at an enormous price; that as a situation from whence the enemy might interrupt our trade to and from India, little apprehension need be entertained. Ships on their voyage to Europe from China and India, at the proper seasons, are able to take so wide a range on going round the Cape, as to be out of danger from enemy's cruizers from that station. As to its being a port of refreshment, our India ships (such was the improved skill of our navigators) touched no where on their passage to India, and on their return St. Helena answered every purpose. Ships of war on their way out might, indeed, have occasion to go to some port for water and refreshments; but had they not the island of Madeira, the Cape de Verd Islands, and Madagascar? Upon the subject of Rio Janeiro, he should have occasion, in the course of what he had to state to their lordships respecting the Arawari, to notice a notable discovery that had been made by the noble mover. That noble lord had again dwelt upon the advantages we should have derived from the possession of Cochin, which he had told us we might have; that it was well known that the Dutch set scarcely any value upon it;—information to which he was inclined to give implicit credit. Cochin, previous to the destruction of Tippoo and his empire, in a political point of view, was undoubtedly of great importance, either as it afforded us the means of entering the valuable districts which he possessed upon the Malabar coast, or as it would have given to any European power who was master of it, a facility of communication and of affording military assistance to that prince. But by the late glorious successes of the British arms against Tippoo, the whole of the districts in question have been placed under the Company's government, and Cochin is thus reduced to a position so circumscribed by those districts on the one side, and by the rajah of Travancore on the other, that a garrison stationed there could not subsist but by the indulgence of the British officers. Under these circumstances, the exchange of Negapatam for Cochin, even if it were not an unhealthy situation, was no longer a desirable object for this country.—It was impossible for him to pass unnoticed that part of the noble mover's speech which related to the river Arawari. It had been represented as a naval station, from whence the commerce carried on by the Portuguese in the river Amazon, might be completely destroyed; and this statement, he conceived, had been founded upon a chart that had been reduced and annexed to a periodical newspaper. Having minutely examined the subject, he should take the liberty of stating, that the great depôt of the Portuguese trade in that part of the world was not, as appears to have been generally supposed, within the Amazon river; that it was at the city of Para, situated in the province of Maragnon, near the river Tocantine, that discharges itself into the sea at Cape Meguari, which forms one extremity of the gulf, that may be called the mouth of the Amazon river, but which cannot be less than 150 miles south east of the Arawari: that the Tocantine receives the waters of various other considerable rivers, by which the produce of the neighbouring countries is brought to Para; and that the productions of the countries bordering on the Amazon, as well as those conveyed down the several streams which lose themselves in that great river, make their way to Para, along the Tagipura, which communicates with the great river on which the city of Para is situated. In order to place this subject in its true point of view before the House, he hoped he might be allowed to communicate some of the information he had collected concerning it, principally for the purpose of showing that the mouth of the Arawari was ill-calculated for a naval station, and that it was not so situated as to obstruct the communication of the Portuguese traders with the Amazon river. The celebrated academician, M. de la Condamine, who visited Para in 1743, states, that by means of the direct commerce between Para and Lisbon, European articles are received at the former place in exchange for the commodities of the country, which, besides those brought from the interior of Brazil, consist of various useful productions from the rivers that lose themselves in the Amazon, as well as from the territories bordering on that stream. These articles are conveyed to Para by the channels which Condamine himself navigated; that is to say, either by the Tapiguru river, which insulates the island Marago, or along the northern shore of that island. The count de Pagan, who drew up an account of the Amazon river and country, for the purpose of inducing cardinal Mazarine to undertake the conquest of it, particularly points out the track to be pursued in entering the Amazon river from the ocean, to be along the coasts of Brazil, of the province of Macagnan, and of the island Magajo, to the south of the line: and the general course thus described (allowances being made for an imperfect projection of the coast) has the assent of that distinguished geographer M. de la Rochette. The channel of the Amazon from the North Cape, laid down in the Dutch coasting pilot of Guiana, however useful it may be for vessels entering the river from the northward, cannot, without error, be considered as describing the course requisite to be considered by the traders between Portugal and the provinces on the Amazon. It appears manifestly designed to delineate the tract of the country trade. "From the Arawari river," says the author of the Description Geographique de la Guianne, "the coast runs twenty leagues to the south-west, during which course islands of different magnitudes form a canal or passage, along which the barks and small craft of the country pass in going from Macapa to the North Cape." But even in this point of view, the mouth of the Arawari, that limits the French and Portuguese Guiana, could not afford to ships of force a station from whence they might obstruct the navigation, because the coast is then subject to the continual recurrence of a periodical and formidable phenomenon, called by the natives the Pororoco; and which is thus described by De la Condamine: "Between Macapa and the North Cape, where the great head of the river is chiefly narrowed by the islands, especially opposite the great mouth of the Arawari, the tides offer a singular phenomenon: during the three days nearest to the full and new moons (the periods of the high tides) the sea, instead of taking six hours to rise, attains its highest elevation in the space of one or two minutes. It may be supposed this effect does not take place quietly: a frightful noise, from the distance of one or two leagues, announces the Pororoco, so called by the Indians of the district. As it approaches, the noise increases, and presently a promontory of water from twelve to fifteen feet in height, appears followed closely by a second, a third, and sometimes a fourth, which occupies the whole breadth of the canal, destroying and carrying before it every thing opposed to it. I have in some places seen a large tract of ground carried away by the Pororoco, large trees forced up by the roots, and every species of devastation. Wherever it passes, the shore is as smooth as if it had been carefully swept. Canoes, boats, and even ships, can only avoid it by anchoring where there are deep soundings. The fear entertained by the chief of my Indians of not being able, in the five remaining days in the spring tides, to reach the Cape, from which we were distant only fifteen leagues, made them determine to wait nine days upon a desert island, until the full moon should be entirely past."—Before he quitted this part of the subject, he must advert to that extraordinary discovery which the noble mover had made, of the danger that would arise to our ships bound to Rio Janeiro, in their way to India, from the extension of French Guiana, to the river Arawari. He would not comment upon the noble lord's apprehensions in that respect; he would simply state, that the Arawari was situated about 2 degrees north of the line, and Rio Janeiro in latitude 23 degrees south, being a distance of 25 degrees. There were other points upon which he should have wished to have stated his sentiments, but with which at that hour he would not trouble the House.

Lord Grenville said, he did not at that late hour [Seven in the morning] rise to reply, though he should have been extremely glad to have done so. He would only say one word in explanation of a gross misrepresentation of the noble secretary. He had not mentioned Rio Janeiro, because he well knew where it lay; but had said that the French possession of the part of Guiana bounded by the river Arawari, would, during a war, enable them to oblige the Portuguese to shut British ships out from the Brazils, where it was sometimes useful for our ships for India to call, water, and obtain provisions; and then we could put in no where nearer than Madagascar, where we should find but poor accommodation.

Lord Holland said, that at that hour he should move the resolution he held in his hand with no other preface than this, that their lordships had sanctioned the treaty of peace with France; that nothing but necessity could justify such a treaty; but that that necessity had, he believed, existed; and it became the character of their lordships to record on their Journals the circumstances which had induced them to acquiesce in such extensive sacrifices. For this purpose he moved—"That the omission of various opportunities of negotiating a peace with advantage to this country, and more particularly the rejection of the overtures made by the chief consul in January 1800, appears to this House to have led to a state of affairs which rendered peace so necessary to the preservation and safety of the empire, as to justify the important and painful sacrifices which his majesty had been advised to make for the attainment thereof."

The Duke of Montrose said, that when first the noble lord had given notice of a motion to censure the late administration, he, conceiving that the censure intended to be moved was of a more general nature, had announced his attention of converting by an amendment the motion of censure into a motion of approbation. As it was, he should confine himself to this observation, that the rejection of Buonaparté's overtures was to be judged by the circumstances which then existed, and not by any subsequent events. When Buonaparté sent his letter to his majesty, it was to solicit the negotiation of a separate peace with Great Britain; he wrote also at the same time to Vienna and to Petersburg, to solicit Austria and Russia to make a distinct peace each of them with the French republic. This was ob-

Debate in the Commons on the Definitive Treaty of Peace.] May 13. The order of the day for taking into consideration the Definitive Treaty of Peace being read,

Mr. Windham rose and said;—Upon a subject which has already received a good deal of discussion in several important points of detail, I hope I shall not be under the necessity of troubling the House with any argument of great length. If, however, I am relieved from such necessity, I owe it to that mode of proceeding to which some have objected as irregular. The best proof of the propriety of the conduct of those who brought various points of the definitive treaty separately before the House, will be, the manner of our now coming to the general examination. Who can deny that every man who has attended those discussions must find himself better prepared, better informed, more competent to form a fair and accurate judgment on the whole subject, from the separate explanations, and the additional lights which have been derived from the preliminary debates? By having investigated the points in detail, we are qualified to pronounce a decision on the whole case. Much ground has been cleared, many questions have been answered, many difficulties have been elucidated, which must otherwise have perplexed the consideration of a subject, in itself so full of matter, and so little susceptible of being reduced into a short compass. Assisted by those previous inquiries, we are enabled the better to shape the argument to such parts of so complicated a subject as are the most deserving of consideration.

I therefore proceed to take a view of the leading points of the Definitive Treaty. The order is indifferent, and I begin with Malta. After the discussions that we have already had regarding the situation in which our interests in that island are left by the treaty, it is unnecessary to enlarge upon the advantages which the French have gained by the stipulation of neutrality. It is clear that, including the force of their allies, Spain and Holland, they may have eighteen ships of the line in its neutral port, while we have no more than six. But these points of detail are of inferior importance.

The whole disposition of the island of Malta renders the stipulation of neutrality fictitious. The garrison must in fact be French. It is in vain to talk of the mummery that there shall not be this language or the other language. The whole is French. If any man denies this to be the case, I shall be very happy to see his opinions and his reasons recorded, that they may be compared with the future result. So far from having restored the order of Malta, we have by the arrangements of this treaty made war upon it in the very spirit of French principles. This little order, which contained in itself the great characteristics and distinctive qualities of that which the French revolution served to destroy, we have now concurred to overthrow. The little phial which contained the essence of the old principles, ministers have diluted, and not even with common water, but with water from the puddle. In this degradation, how can its ancient spirit be kept up? Nay, it is already understood, that the German knights refuse to serve in a body so degraded and fallen off from its original and peculiar character. Who does not see that Neapolitan soldiers can never form any security for the independence of the island? The thing is ridiculous. The argument may be put into the shape of a syllogism. If France controls, Naples puts in the garrison, and the garrison holds the island of Malta; what is the conclusion? In truth the state of Malta is a virtual and total surrender, with a ridicule in the manner infinitely disgraceful to the reputation of our national counsels. Far better would it have been to have made an absolute cession of it, and thus have acquired a claim to compensation and equivalent, than to have formed a vain and futile pretence to establish its neutrality and independence. At present our footing and interest in the Mediterranean, which used to be reckoned of so much importance, are utterly abandoned. In this and in various other points there is a marked variation between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, to the disadvantage of this country.—The Cape of Good Hope is given up in full sovereignty to the Dutch; so that the latter may, whenever they please, surrender it to the French. The question of its being made a free port is left entirely at the option of France; and in such an alternative we can only expect that it will be made a free port, if that mode of keeping it were to be less favourable to England than any other. But it is said, that the Cape is but a tavern. Be it so. Is not a tavern in the middle of so long a voyage a very important accommodation? Nay, without it how can troops be sent out for the protection of your Eastern empire? Without the refreshment of that tavern, troops must be sent to India in such a state as to endanger their health, and to land them probably unfit for service for six weeks, perhaps too on an emergency when their immediate service would be required. The only other place of stopping at is the Brazils, and how can we calculate that in time of war we should continue that facility? Our Indian empire then being our sheet anchor, every thing accessory to its preservation and defence is of the utmost importance. While we lose any advantages from the Cape, see what France gains! what she gains likewise by the restitution of Cochin to the Dutch, and the additional means of annoying our possessions which her coalition with the Dutch must afford!—With respect to the boundaries of French and Portuguese Guiana, it appears to me, that even with the benefit of all the previous consideration, this subject, which could not before have been understood at all, is now very imperfectly understood. Ministers seem to have been puzzled with the Catapanatuba, the Arawari, &c. The Arawari is at last agreed to be the limit; but in fact there is little difference between the treaty of Madrid and that of Badajos as to the boundary. The object of the French is gained by the latter as well as the former. They obtained the complete command of the navigation of the river of Amazons. But why, instead of describing the boundary in the preliminary articles, was it not expressly said it should be the Arawari? That the boundary of the Arawari still leaves the Portuguese settlement exposed to the designs of France, is what I contend. It is a point, indeed, which is to be ascertained by maps; and on their authority I rest the assertion, that the Portuguese have not acquired that security which it was their object to procure.—When I look also at the cession of Louisiana to France, a point acquiesced in by the definitive treaty, it is of a magnitude that I am at a loss to describe in adequate terms. Taking the indefinite extent of Guiana, and the cession of Louisiana, we may be said to have given away a fourth part of the globe. We have given the command of the two greatest rivers in the world—the Mississippi in the North of America, and the river of Amazons in the South. Rivers are the vital parts of countries; we may be said, therefore, without hyperbole, to have given away a brace of continents. Never was there such a lavish, prodigal, thoughtless spirit of cession! Ministers have really scattered pearls like barley-corns: and I am amazed to see with what indifference the country has viewed transactions of such importance, by which so many of the most valuable interests have been lavished upon their rivals, and in which so many stipulations pregnant with danger and pain to themselves, are contained.

In addition to their consideration with regard to foreign objects, the whole continent of Europe is abandoned to France. I should think, indeed, that instead of our being called upon to allow the danger of such a state of things, those who have acquiesced in so monstrous an innovation, are bound to show that it is consistent with the public safety. While they are letting in tides which are spreading so furiously in every direction, it is their business to show us what they will not inundate, what they will spare. We follow this torrent, threatening our rights, in many different tracts. We see it endangering us at Honduras, we see it menacing to shake and unsettle in India the dearest part of our foreign empire. But this matter will require a more particular discussion, and I am glad that it has already been the subject of debate. That the definitive treaty has not settled our rights in such a manner as to preclude all doubts, I perceive from the fact admitted last night by my right hon. friend (Mr. Dundas), a person so fully conversant in the affairs of India, that in the first instance he was alarmed lest, by the non-renewal of treaties, particularly the convention of 1787, some danger to our Indian dominions might arise. That any uncertainty was ever felt by him, is at least a proof of the fact that uncertainty may exist. We contended, that by the abrogation of the convention of 1787, founded upon and referring to the treaties of 1783 and 1763, something was taken away, which had formerly quieted the claims of France, and secured the rights of this country. But it was said, that it was better to get rid both of the disease and of the remedy; and, doubtless, it is possible that a constitution may be improved by such an operation. This argument was at least to the point, whether it was conclusive or not. With regard to the arguments to prove the clearness of our Indian rights, they seemed rather less to the point. We were told in lofty and magnificent phrases of the justice of our cause. But who had said that our cause was not good, that our rights were not clear? We have to contend with an adversary who may not choose to appeal to the House of Commons. The argument was all thrown away, for it was coram non judice. The question is, what will the enemy say, and how should you have acted to meet his objections? If disputes were to be settled by a man and his own attorney, the business of Westminster-hall would not be a little diminished; but, unfortunately, when the matter is very amicably settled, the adversary comes and drags the suitor into court. So, to discuss the justice of the cause here, when nobody disputes it, seems to be a waste of very excellent argument. The right hon. gentleman, like Ajax, rushes tremendous forth, felling down us poor cattle, instead of reserving his might for the foes who may resist him. We all know, that previous not only to the convention of 1787, but to 1783, claims respecting Indian trade and territory had been set up by the French. What reason have we to think that the present government of France will drop any pretensions hostile to this country which former governments had advanced? In 1783, as I am afraid will appear to have been the case in 1802, points were left unsettled, and new explanations became necessary. The convention of 1787 was more favourable to us, because concluded in a moment when England could negotiate with greater effect, and it gave us the most satisfactory security. The French abandoned the means of enforcing any claims of a kind that could have proved injurious to us. But why were not means taken to prevent the possibility of claims by which our empire in the East may be disturbed? What has been doing for the last seven months? Our rights, whether of conquest or treaty (as so ably distinguished and demonstrated last night), are unquestionable; but is there not reason to apprehend a renewal of former cavils? From some parts of the speech of my right hon. friend (Mr. Dundas), I should have been led to think that he had been napping, and on his awaking had imagined that we were still at open war. He talked of drawing the sword against any power that should dispute our rights, and exultingly dwelt upon our strength in India. It is very true, our strength in India may defy all attack; but does he not know that, though the dispute is in India, the battle may be fought in Europe? Like an action at law, the right may lie in Cumberland, and the issue be tried in Westminster-hall. The French may think us strong in India, and weak in Europe. We have seen already how, by a close squeeze in Europe, they have made us vomit up what we had gorged elsewhere.

With regard to the sincerity and faith of France, let us only look to other countries. The archduke was driven out of Tuscany; but Austria and the neighbouring powers thought that at least the territory was to remain as before. It was, however, disposed of in compliment to Spain, and the prince of Parma placed upon a new-raised throne. France, at the same time, had its eyes on the Isle of Elba, but was not so uncourteous as at once peremptorily to demand this garnish of the king of Etruria on his entering into the new spunging-house. It took away Piombino from the king of Naples, and generously gave it to the Etrurian prince, in exchange for the important fortress of Porto Ferrajo. These are some of the materials from which we are to arrange our proceedings. When we cast our eyes upon the map of Europe, and survey the growth of France, the prospect is so immense, as not to admit of a summary. The subject requires that we should look into the history of the revolution and of the war, and consider what France has done, what she can do, and what no doubt she will do, compared with what Great Britain also can and will effect. As an instance of what France can do, now that it is distinctly a body of new Romans meditating the conquest of the world, let us recollect that France has effected in ten years, what Polybius, the historian, boasted Rome had accomplished in fifty-three years, or about half a century. Their achievements resembled what was related in the popular ballad of Hosier's Ghost, when it says to admiral Vernon—

“What I wish'd twenty ships t'have done,
“You have achiev'd with six alone.”

The French have taken the Romans for their model, and affect to imitate them in every thing. Independent of their territories, the map of Europe is but small, and only two great powers are left standing. Russia is powerful, but at a great distance from them; Austria alone remains strong, and perhaps not impaired, in territories; but the loss of all those strong holds and fortresses, in the late war, which constituted her stays, has made her such a wreck, that, in the next storm, the mast of that vessel must inevitably go by the board. In fact, there is no single continental power which can again dare to face France, without being instantly crushed by that enormous mace with which she is now armed. The French avow that they act upon the Roman model; they fairly acknowledge what they mean to be, and frankly tell us also what they mean us to be.—Some, indeed, admit that Europe is gone, and they say peace be with it! they think that, come what will, we may take to our boat and escape. That might have been said formerly; but the spectre of French power now pursues us in every direction. In Europe, in Asia, in America, it follows, continually scaring us with its threatening aspect. Look at the West Indies, and see France in possession, by cession, of Martinique, Guadaloupe, and St. Domingo, since the preliminaries, by the permission of ministers. It is pretended, indeed, that the recovery of that island from the Blacks was necessary to the security of our own colonies. Such is the opinion of those who are interested in the West India islands; but is that authority conclusive? Allowing the fidelity and patriotism of these men to be unimpeached, (as they certainly are), is it not possible that regard for their property may induce them to form an opinion of the policy of our facilitating the recovery of St. Domingo, that may be inconsistent with the interest of the nation? For my part, I conceive that the power of the blacks, confined to St. Domingo, and without the means of extending beyond it, was much less formidable to this country than the establishment of the power of France. Even though the emissaries or the example of the blacks might have reached the other islands, still, though private property might have been endangered, the political interest of the state was less endangered. The West India proprietors might think, that, if the negroes obtained the ascendancy, their property would be ruined, while, if the islands fell under the power of France, though the value of their property might fall, it would not be entirely destroyed. This was a view of the case, however, which, politically speaking, would not lessen the injury to England. Indeed, with the possession of St. Domingo, with a port which almost commands our communication with our most important islands, it would become a most formidable neighbourhood to our colonial power, and in time of war would become a military station, from which we should be attacked; and a point which would give the enemy an opportunity to harass our trade. In fact, we have given up two continents to France. We have allowed her to be placed in a situation in which she will acquire such an influence over the American states, as at a future period, may enable her to employ them with advantage against our most important interests.—Such being the means of France, what is her will? Those who expected that the peace would disarm France of her hostility, who thought that she would be contented to cultivate the advantages of commerce and manufactures without animosity towards England, must now see that she pursues more than ever the grand object of universal empire. At every period before the preliminaries, and since, she has expressed, without disguise, the spirit by which she is animated; she proceeds like a general, changing his guards, sending out his parties, marking out his ground, and arranging his plan of operations. Every thing is conceived and conducted in the spirit of hostility; and after having succeeded in the war of swords, now terminated, she enters with the same disposition and with the same hopes upon the war of the Custom House.

What, then, are the means which Britain possesses, and how ought she to call them forth to ward off the dangers that assail us? In considering this, we must inquire what are moral resources, taking that word a good deal in the French sense. What is the mind to call forth, and how employ the physical means? In all animal life (and states may be considered as living bodies subject to the general laws of animated nature), it is observed that the foresight of danger is generally in proportion to the force and means which are enjoyed to escape from that danger. It appears to me that this nation has been more defective in the foresight of danger than in the means of repelling it. From this defect a great part of the calamities of the country at this crisis have arisen. The nation has too much undervalued its danger, and its exertions have fallen short both of its means and of the occasion. At first, when the principles of the French revolution were at work, when other nations were actually in conflict with it, when the havock that it produced was seen in the example of others, it was said that all this would never reach us, that the menstruum might dissolve the base metals with which it came in contact, but would pass harmless over the pure gold of the British constitution. Men were not aware, that the character of the revolutionary principle was to prey both on good and bad, nay on the former in preference. In the year 1792 it was found, that the pure gold of the British constitution was as susceptible of the rage of Jacobinism, as copper of the corrosion of aqua fortis. But nevertheless there seemed to be a strange and extraordinary indifference to the state of Europe and to the progress of the hostile principle. "Snug" was the word. People were for leaving other nations to shift for themselves; the high spirit and the politic maxims of our ancestors were forgotten. Even when other nations stood forward in the common cause of nations, in our defence as well as their own, there was no alacrity to participate in their exertions. The nation seemed not only to have no disposition to engage in the war, but to display a new and singular anxiety to avoid it. From this view of the state of Europe, from this estimate of the nature of the danger, arose the conduct of the war after it had become inevitable. Differences of opinion existed as to the mode of carrying it on. There were persons of great abilities and high situations with whom I had the misfortune to differ on these views of things. Agreeing in many points with them, co-operating with them in a public capacity in leading objects, and respecting their talents and their motives, I was obliged to differ from them on the grounds at which I have hinted. The war was to be viewed either as an ordinary contest between two nations, and carried on upon the usual principle of annoying and weakening your antagonist, till he was brought to equitable sentiments; or we were to consider it as a new and extraordinary war, which could be carried on with a system suited to its portentous nature. Hence, therefore, it was to be carried on by attacking enemies colonies, capturing their ships, &c. or it was to be carried on by aiming decisive blows at the seat or centre of the system from which the true principle of the war and danger proceeded. I do not mean to say that these different plans were exclusive. I only mean that the one more peculiarly arose out of the one view of the case, the other out of the other. Those who preferred attacking the centre of the evil, did not think it wrong to aim at the advantages of the other, if the first failed; while those who directed their efforts to the colonies and marine of the enemy, were equally agreed that the restoration of monarchy was a desirable object. In none, however, as I have said, was the system exclusive. I shall not inquire which of these was the best. The one was tried, the other not; and whether that which was not tried would have succeeded, must remain a matter of judgment. I may add, however, that the plan which was not pursued, was that most conformable to my own opinions. Except early in the war at Toulon, and afterwards in the melancholy affair of Quiberon, there was little or nothing attempted upon what I thought the peculiar principle of the war, and upon that plan of conduct appropriate to it. As to the Quiberon expedition, at a time when the clamour was loudest against it, a right hon. friend of mine (Mr. Pitt), with great manliness and liberality, said in this House, that he took his full share of the responsibility. Yet, fully acknowledging the generosity of that conduct, I am ready to avow—

Mr. Pitt. I submit to the House, whether it be consistent with order for my right hon. friend to go into an historical account of opinions respecting the conduct of the war, particularly as that inquiry is not connected with any subject immediately under the consideration of the House. I beg leave also to submit to my right hon. friend, whether he can consider that the obligations of secrecy which were in force when he and others were his majesty's confidential servants, are now dispensed with?

Mr. Windham. I conceive that I was merely stating a circumstance personal to myself; and my right hon. friend would have seen, by the application that my explanation could not have been considered as any disclosure of state secrets. I was going to show, that, the country having misjudged the war, the conduct of it naturally partook of what I conceive to have been error.

What I say of the system of war, as in my judgment best suited to the circumstances of the late contest, is not an arraignment of my right hon. friend to whose department its conduct particularly belonged (Mr. Dundas). I can bear testimony to the diligence, the zeal, the activity, the ardour, and all the other great qualities which my right hon. friend displayed. I do not arraign the plan of my right hon. friend, neither do I divulge state secrets. I state what was no secret—that previous to the time when I came into public station, my right hon. friend had marked opinions on the subject of the war, and that we did differ in our views on the subject. When I was interrupted, I was labouring to show that the country had not rightly judged its situation, and that the mode of war pursued contributed to confirm their error. The country never knew sufficiently why it was at war. It has been said with great force and eloquence by my right hon. friend (Mr. Pitt), on different occasions, that we were at war for security; we were indeed at war, because we could not be at peace; we were at sea, because we could not be on shore. Yet though reminded of this, the character of the war itself, the grand monitor was wanting. The manner in which it was carried on did not sufficiently mark its nature. The force was centrifugal. It never converged enough towards the focus from which the danger proceeded. The question why we were at war, perpetually recurred; and people were not enough taught to see that we were at war, because the French government was such as to leave us no peace, and was necessarily in perpetual hostility with every thing which, as individuals and as a nation, it was our interest to defend. This error has pursued us into peace. No person who looked at the causes of war, could have looked at the terms of peace without alarm. The country, however, is not sufficiently impressed with the dangers of peace, because it was never perfectly alive to the character of the war.—But to return to the conduct of the war: although it has been unsuccessful in securing those objects which I thought peculiarly at stake, I do not say that it was wrong; I do not say that the course which I more approved would have been more fortunate. If I think it would, it is, as it were, reasoning from symptoms after death, that another method might have succeeded. It is, however, a matter of judgment. Entertaining this opinion still, I conceive it to be the duty of every man to correct the public error. It is better to think that the country had not seen its situation in a proper light, than that, aware of its real danger, we had failed in the means of repelling it. Great as the exertions of the nation have been, they have not been so great as they ought to have been compared either with the objects at stake, or the means we possessed. It is consolatory to think that the nation, not having seen the danger, will, seeing it, take the steps necessary to maintain its character and to ensure its safety. It is true, indeed, that there were those who perpetually urged the French cause, and by every act endeavoured to counteract those feelings of honour, magnanimity, and independence, by which nations can alone become great. If, however, the people of this country have utterly abandoned the feelings which every great nation should cultivate, and that policy without which no nation can flourish, we must have insensibly degenerated from the principles of our ancestors; and it will confirm the remark of the writer, who says, that sometimes a silent revolution takes place in the character of nations, as decisive as could be produced by the most violent convulsions. Never was there a war carried on with such an incessant cry for peace from the very beginning of it. In any other war, would it have been tolerated that the justice of our cause should be incessantly arraigned, and that of the enemy defended, in newspapers and other publications; that every one who endeavoured to rouse the public spirit should be vilified and abused? How could it have happened (if the people had been sufficiently impressed with the nature of the war), that it was doubtful whether the processions to St. Paul's to celebrate three of the most splendid victories this nation had ever gained, would have been received with applause? How else could it have happened, that attempts should be made to depreciate one of our most brilliant naval victories, and to show that the advantage was on the side of the enemy? To prove these circumstances, I should be obliged to produce files of newspapers and pamphlets. Yet what do I infer? Why, that such writings never could have obtained circulation, had there not been an indecision in the public mind on the subject of the war. It is with reluctance that I acknowledge this state of the public mind to have prevailed. It certainly was not sufficiently awakened to a full sense of the nature of the danger that existed, or the extent of the exertion required. I am afraid that I shall be obliged to speak in a style not more pleasing of the means and resources which we possessed. Perhaps we have been too much in the habit of flattering ourselves on this subject on the efforts that we have made. Certainly, nothing is more agreeable than to "praise the Athenians among the Athenians;" but I rather consider it the duty of public men to speak wholesome truths. We must compare our exertions with the object. If the war was not originally just and necessary, every shilling spent was too much. If it was, as some have considered it, merely a war of experiment for a short time, to see what we could make of it, we have made too great sacrifices. If, however, it was a war for the very existence of the country, the exertions that we have made have been too little for the object, too little even for our means. That our exertions, however, had not injured us, would appear by considering whether the country has pined or thriven, whether it has become fat or lean, by its efforts. Surely if, as some pretend, the country has been ruined by the war, it has not been thrown into a galloping consumption. I have, indeed, heard it argued, in the true spirit of Jacobinism, that, though individuals are rich, the country is poor; every distress incident to man and to the social state has been insidiously represented to be the offspring of war: as if the same distress did not exist in all wars, nay, in all times; as if it were not obvious that poverty must ever accompany great wealth; as if poverty were not a sort of secretion from the plethoric habit of wealth. Indeed, it is easy to show how commercial wealth and poverty must be connected, because, in the fluctuations of trade and manufactures, numbers are occasionally deprived of their usual employment in one place, while the tide of prosperity rises higher in another. No less absurd is it to say, that the wealth with which the country abounds is in a few hands, as if it were possible that a country could have much wealth while it was monopolised by a few. Unhappily, indeed, it seems to be thought by some, who acknowledge both the wealth and comfort which this country enjoys, that these blessings may be preserved without the aid of arms. The balance of power is treated as an idle chimera; and we are told, that from our insular situation we may look with indifference on the confusion and derangement of the continent. It is very well, indeed, to tell us to preserve our own comforts; it reminds me of what a king of England said, when he was told that his subjects were dying of famine;—"Why," observed he, "do they not eat bread and cheese?" They could not get bread and cheese to eat. So we are told to be satisfied with our own comforts and happiness, with our commerce, with our prosperity. Doubtless; but will the French allow us? Do we not see that France is acting upon a contest with us in peace, that she is lowering our dignity, plucking our honours? The notion that peace would hush up all our dangers had induced us to give up to Holland the honour of the flag; which, though perhaps of itself of no essential importance, kept up the pride and spirit of the service, and has been maintained by us for a century and a half. This it was also which induced us to submit to have the cockades taken out of our soldiers' hats in Portugal. We also allowed, under the same idea, our ambassador to remain at Paris, kicking his heels near the hall of audience, as a lacquey, while Buonaparté, instead of communicating with him, sat off for Lyons, designedly, as it should seem, to furnish a precedent for similar insults on any future occasion.

Such being the situation and the feelings of the country, the next consideration is, what we ought now to do. On the supposition that Great Britain is at present in a state of infinitely less security than it was on the night when this treaty was signed, and comparing what it has given up with what remains to it, I have no hesitation in repeating my former assertion, that the fee-simple of the country was worth more on the 30th of September last, than it has been since, or perhaps ever will be again. We have now, however, signed and sealed the bond; and as Dogberry says—"I fear we shall never be our own men again." Our study should now be to correct those fatal dissensions which the treaty of peace may create. As to India, our rights are manifest, though we may depend on those same claims being renewed which were set up by France anterior to the treaty of 1783. But while our right is liable to be called into dispute, we should keep in our hands better means of asserting it than we can have after the surrender of Malta, the Cape, and Cochin. The First Consul would not, during the negotiation, have gone to Lyons, if he did not mean to produce suspicion and uneasiness with respect to the peace. The ministers think that we have gone too far, and tried to remove the impediments to the renewal of claims, as if the foolish and silly French want us to point out to them the nature of their claims! Have they not shown, during the war, any designs upon India? Has not the capture of Seringapatam revealed any of their intrigues? What are we to surmise from their steadiness in insisting on the possession of Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, and Cochin? Was not the expedition to Egypt projected in the view of a triumphant march into Hindostan? And are we, like ostriches, to put our heads in a hole, and suppose ourselves perfectly safe from our pursuers, or act as persons in embarrassed circumstances, who are afraid to look at the state of their own affairs? If France means not to pursue its claims, why not send to Paris for explanations to that effect, before we give up what she never has put into our hands? A similar explanation should be required respecting the Bay of Honduras, and many other points. Let us have a fair understanding as to the extent of our danger. I know that some may be disposed to calculate the life of a nation like that of an individual; and, regardless of posterity, say,—“though our commerce may fail in the end, it cannot do so for a long series of years, and will, at least, last during our time.” The nation which has not more foresight than that, must inevitably perish. Great stress has been laid on what is called the failure of the predictions respecting the result of the American war. These predictions, however, have been realized. If we had had America to support us, we never could have consented to such a peace. America has been of great service to the enemy during the war; and the convoy which entered France at the time of lord Howe's victory, was thought a sufficient compensation to that country for the destruction of its fleet. Let those who think this peace will furnish life and heat for their own ephemeral existence and that of the nation, take care that they do not deceive themselves. They may calculate ill who suppose the misfortune may not reach them. The fate of nations often comes quick upon them; in this manner is Spain, of late a rich and powerful nation, all on a sudden become one of those states which are now the vassals of France.”—Mr. Windham concluded with moving,

“That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to assure his majesty that we have taken into our most serious consideration the definitive treaty of peace which his majesty has been graciously pleased to communicate to this House:

“That we acknowledge, with all humility and submission, his majesty's undoubted prerogative of peace and war: and that we shall consider it to be our first duty, as far as may depend on us, to maintain inviolate the public faith, as it is pledged by this treaty, and to assist his majesty in performing, with uprightness and punctuality, the engagements into which his majesty has been advised to enter:

“But that we cannot conceal the painful apprehensions with which we consider the result of those engagements; nor can we forbear to offer to his majesty our humble and dutiful advice for the adoption of such measures as can alone, in our opinion, under the blessing of Providence, avert from us the dangers with which we are now surrounded:

“That it is impossible for us to have seen, without the utmost anxiety and alarm, all the unexampled circumstances which have attended the final conclusion of the present peace: the extensive and important sacrifices, which, without any corresponding concession, this treaty has added to those already made on our part by the preliminary articles: the unlooked-for and immense accessions of territory, influence, and power, which it has tacitly confirmed to France: the numerous subjects of clashing interest and unavoidable dispute which it has left entirely unadjusted: and, above all, those continued and systematic projects of aggrandisement, of which, in the very moment of peace, we have seen unhappily such undeniable and convincing evidence:

“That, by relinquishing so many sources of prosperity in peace, and so many bulwarks of defence in war, and by renouncing at the same time the advantage and security always hitherto derived from the accustomed renewal of former treaties, the British government has imposed on itself a greater necessity than has ever before existed for measures of increased precaution, and for determinations of unshaken constancy:

"That we, therefore, rely on his majesty's paternal wisdom for a watchful and unremitted attention to the situation and future conduct of the power with whom we have negotiated; and we think it necessary, more especially, to assure his majesty of our ready and firm support in that determination which we trust his majesty will henceforward steadily pursue, of resisting every fresh encroachment (of whatever nature) which shall be attempted on the maritime, commercial, or colonial rights and interests of the British empire:

"This our solemn declaration must, as we believe, materially conduce to prevent the necessity which it is calculated to meet; and we trust that his majesty will also approve of our desire to support it by a scale of naval and military defence, adequate to the extent of our danger, and to the importance of the interests which we have to maintain.

"The anxiety which we feel in this respect, is the necessary consequence of our sincere wish for the permanence of the public tranquillity which his majesty has now re-established: and it is for the same important purpose that we also most earnestly recommend to his majesty's wisdom, the pressing necessity of arranging, by immediate and amicable discussion, those points of essential interest which had been adjusted by former treaties, but for which no provision has been made in this negotiation:

Lord Folkestone seconded the motion, and observed, that the subject had been so ably argued by his right hon. friend, that little remained for him to add to it. He however could not avoid remarking, that in this treaty, not only a neglect, but a dereliction of our naval rights, was apparent, and the flag of Old England degraded. It was, therefore, impossible to approve of such a treaty: and he was unable to conceal that opinion; unable also was he to conceal, that when all other countries were supporting the faith of their ancient and respective treaties, Great Britain alone was neglectful of hers; and that when it was a first-rate principle with all other nations, to respect and value, as well as to protect their allies, Great Britain alone was regardless of hers, and ungrateful to those who had sacrificed all that was dear to them as nations in the general cause. We had entered into the contest under the avowed principle of asserting and protecting the rights of the house of Orange, and we had basely deserted her. We had made a show of our attention to that illustrious house, than which none ought to be more respected or valued in the eyes of this country, whose cause she early and effectually supported; and our return to her, in the hour of her necessity, is a vain and empty stipulation in words, but nothing solid or substantial. In the case of Portugal, our conduct was even more ungenerous; for we were not content with deserting her, but we committed her to the spoliation of her bitterest foes; though, in fact, it was not those foes who committed that spoliation—it was this country that tore from her Olivenza—it was this country that invaded and divided her territory of Louisiana. These were circumstances that must strike every thinking mind with horror and disgust; but he feared that all he could say upon these topics would have little weight. We had of late learned to appreciate the temporary advantage of commercial considerations so much above all other interests, that little was to be hoped from a state so besotted with avaricious sentiments of wealth. In the same impolitic view he beheld the surrender of Malta, and could impute it to nothing but an infatuation in the minds of ministers, who, not content with ceding the East and the West, and the privileges of the British flag in the North, now also resigned the Levant, and its best and only protector, Malta, into the very hands of our antient and mortal foe. For these reasons he thought the treaty disgraceful and dishonourable, and the address should have his most decided support.

Lord Hawkesbury rose and said:—Sir, I have listened with the utmost attention to the observations of my right hon. friend; and indeed it was impossible I should not; for though some parts of his speech were very remotely, if at all connected with the question before the House, yet the ability and ingenuity that he exhibited throughout peculiarly entitled him to attention. A good deal of the speech of my right hon. friend consisted in predictions as to the consequences and assertions, as to the conditions of the peace; but I will assure him, and the noble lord who seconded his motion, that were the treaty such as they have described it—and I considered it as by any means injurious to the interests—but particularly if it were degrading to the dignity of the country; no man would be more ready to oppose it than myself, whoever the author of it might be. I, however, view the negotiation in quite a different light. I am of opinion, that, though some commercial questions were not finally arranged, it was better to leave those questions for future adjustment, than longer to defer the negotiation. I maintain, that peace, under all the circumstances, was desirable, and that it would have been extremely culpable in ministers to have declined it; but I would not be understood to insinuate that there was no other alternative for the country, or that the peace is to be considered in any point of view dishonourable. It is such as ministers have thought it expedient and prudent to conclude, and such as the House and the country called for. I am glad that the whole of this question is at length brought before the House. I have always objected to the discussion of it in parts, because, if ever there was a subject which ought to be discussed altogether, it is a treaty of peace. The parts must be examined with reference to each other, and not distinctly; for though in one part something unfavourable may appear, yet that, upon a review of the whole, will perhaps turn out to be a concession in order to obtain some advantage in another part. This question has at length come to that stage of investigation which I wished for. It seems to me to divide itself into two heads: first, whether the terms of the definitive treaty were consistent with the basis of the preliminary articles; and secondly, whether, if any departure from the preliminary articles had taken place, that, or any events which had occurred during the negotiation, were of such consequence as to induce ministers to refuse to conclude the treaty? Before I proceed to remark on these heads, I beg leave to say a few words on the circumstances in which this country was involved at the time the negotiation was begun. It will be remembered, that we were then left almost alone to contend with France; Austria obliged to comply with a peace dictated by the enemy; the German empire at her mercy. Deserted by our allies except two, Portugal and Naples, neither capable of affording us any very effective aid, we saw ourselves, instead of being at the head of a formidable confederacy, menaced by a league of our old allies, under the influence and direction of France. Such was our situation; and in this dilemma peace was called for loudly by the country. It was pressed strongly by the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, that some attempt should be made to negotiate. Accordingly, negotiation was entered into, and announced by ministers to the House on the first occasion afterwards. But this negotiation commenced under prospects evidently very unfavourable, in the degraded state of Europe, after the treaty of Luneville, and when our ships were shut out from almost every port in Europe. Notwithstanding these disadvantageous appearances, ministers were determined to sustain the honour and consequence of the country, and in their proposal to negotiate, they laid down three principles as the rule of their conduct; first, the complete integrity of the dominions of the British empire; secondly, fidelity to our allies; and, thirdly, to obtain compensation out of the conquests we had made, to counterpoise the acquisitions of France on the continent. In these objects it was our firm purpose to persist, and the probability of our success in attaining them was considerably heightened by some events which gave a propitious turn to our affairs about that time—namely, the victory of the 2d of April in the Baltic, and the gallant conduct of our army in Egypt, particularly on the 19th of March, which not a little contributed to dispose the French government to peace: at all events, ministers meant to seek compensation in the East and West Indies, as that seemed the most advisable principle. But as this subject has been so fully canvassed in the debate on the preliminaries, I shall pass it, observing, that we have annexed to our dominions two of the greatest naval stations in the East and West Indies; not that I would argue this as a proof that the peace is more or less honourable on account of this annexation; for, according to the doctrine that my right hon. friend holds out, it is not an island more or less, or any conquest whatever, that will constitute the security or the advantages of peace. I doubt whether, in this view, any thing short of the total subversion of the French government would be satisfactory; but that I think must be now left entirely out of the question—that hope can scarcely exist in rational minds.

I shall now proceed to examine the division of the question which relates to the events that occurred pending the negotiations. I agree with the sentiment expressed by my right hon. friend the chancellor of the exchequer, on a former evening, that it was impossible to view some of those events without anxiety and alarm. So much for the points themselves: but it was gravely to be considered, how far these wants ought to have influenced the progress of our negotiation; or whether it would have been justifiable in ministers, on account of those events, to break off the treaty. I am no advocate for the opinion of some persons, that we ought to be insulated in our politics, as in our situation, and that we should have no concern in continental politics; nor can I subscribe to the doctrine of my right hon. friend, that we are on all occasions to volunteer in continental affairs; that an interference is not, as it would seem, a matter of choice but of obligation. This interference must at all times be determined by circumstances. Whether the power aggrieved, or where rights may be invaded, should feel any desire for our assistance, or any inclination to assert her own independence, were material to be considered; otherwise an interposition would be the height of extravagance. Our connexion with the continent is relative; and when we propose to interfere in its affairs, it is but wise to consider the amount of the interest that should prompt us; if the object could be carried, what the disposition of the power immediately benefited may be; and if we should lose, what degree of injury we were likely to sustain. Before we engage at all in such contests, the internal situation of our own country should be taken into consideration. I believe, on a review of the principal transactions that took place during the negotiation, the reasons which I have stated would apply with sufficient force to dissuade any British statesman from attempting to prevent it. God forbid that we should not be influenced by obligations of honour; or that we should give up the reputation of the country, by declining to protect any power from injustice! but a strong case should be made out to persuade us to an effort attended with risk to ourselves; for, the same reason which would induce an interference in favour of the Cisalpine republic, would urge us to insist upon the restoration of the Netherlands to Austria, of Holland to the Stadtholder; and of Savoy to the king of Sardinia. Even were we disposed to resist the accession of Buonaparté to the presidency of the Cisalpine republic, how could we have accomplished any thing without the aid of the continental powers? And how did the case stand? Buonaparté's newly-acquired power was scarcely announced, when the cabinet of Berlin congratulated him, that of Vienna acquiesced, and Russia showed no symptom of dissatisfaction. Would it, then, be considered wise or prudent in us alone to renew the war in consequence of this event? He would put the question to any gentleman in the House, whether the value of the object would even excuse such a resolution? Another event which is supposed to have changed the nature of our negotiation is, the cession of Louisiana to France. I do not consider this an indifferent object: but it will be recollected that Louisiana is an old French settlement, and that during the negotiation of the peace of 1763, the most triumphant peace this country had ever concluded, this settlement was privately transferred by France to Spain; and that transaction was much more gross than that now complained of, because Louisiana was referred to expressly in the treaty of 1763. As to the political advantages which France can derive from this possession, I doubt whether they are of much consequence; but I have little doubt that they are not of such consequence as to have justified ministers in rejecting the peace. Gentlemen have said a great deal of the influence which this possession threatens to give France over the United States of America. To this I shall mention, that it has been the policy of America, since its separation from this country, to keep an equal balance between France and us. Such was the system of general Washington, and such is the system of the ablest statesmen in America at the present day. The probability therefore is, that the possession of Louisiana now rendering France the natural rival of America, sound policy will incline her to cultivate a more intimate connexion with this country. But my right hon. friend apprehends that France will be enabled, through this settlement, to swallow up America. He very much under-rates the power, population, and spirit of the United States; for he should remember what efforts the Americans made, and with success too, alone, and unaided, in the war of 1756, to resist the French who were then in possession of Canada and Louisiana. When, therefore, the increase of American power since that period is considered, though the possession of Louisiana by the French may now be an object to excite their jealousy and caution, it by no means endangers the independence of the Americans.

With respect to the definitive treaty, gentlemen complain of it on two grounds; namely, for faults of omission and commission. Under the first class the principal is the non-revival of the several commercial and political treaties, and two particular conventions. As to the first, I should suppose, if gentlemen would look into those treaties, they would not be so very solicitous for their revival. From the treaty of Westphalia, up to that of 1763, it was the practice, as the system of Europe was perpetually changing, to renew former treaties, with such alterations and additions as suited existing circumstances, until at length those treaties became so confused, inconsistent, and contradictory, as to contribute more to augment litigation than to produce the adjustment of any difference. If we made any engagements, they should be precise and explicit—not such as those treaties; besides, we ought to be cautious how we consented to multiply our engagements. Another objection that I have to the renewal of those treaties is, that we should bind ourselves too much. I shall state the former practice as to such renewal of treaties. In 1748, when we guaranteed the pragmatic sanction, we also guaranteed Silesia to Prussia. What, then, if agreeable to such a precedent, we should have to guarantee the Netherlands and Sardinia to France? I would ask my right

hon. friend, whether the renewal of political treaties, accompanied by such consequences, was so desirable? As to commercial treaties, if any person looked into them, they would be found not less objectionable than the former. Our treaty with Holland gave the Dutch the power of carrying warlike stores over in time of war to an enemy's ports. Would it be adviseable, after the experience of the last war, to renew such a treaty as that? Objections equally strong would be found to operate against the renewal of our former treaties with France. From these considerations, I think it will scarcely be disputed that it was better to leave commercial arrangements to be hereafter adjusted, than to postpone the conclusion of the definitive treaty, even if the country was to be left in the state it was in before the preliminaries were signed. I contend, that the inconvenience to our trade cannot be so great as gentlemen profess to fear; because, under all the obstacles of the war, our manufactures found their way into all parts of Europe; and no prohibition that can be imposed during peace, however severe or rigorously enforced, can put a stop to that intercourse. If any such interruption should be given to our commerce by the French government, it must be a matter of regret; but the extension of our resources, and our command in the markets, it is not in the power of France or any other nation to prevent. If it is to be a war of duties, we are more than equal to meet France; for her articles of commerce are few, ours are numerous: the exclusion of her brandies and wine would severely operate against her; and we could do without these liquors; but France cannot do without our manufactures; for they are articles of the first necessity. With regard to the East Indies, and the allusions to the stipulation in the treaty with the Dutch, respecting our flag and that of Holland, I shall say, as to the flag, it seems to be completely misunderstood by gentlemen. It is known that we have always claimed a right to superiority in the narrow seas of India, though we have scarcely ever insisted on it, except with regard to the Dutch, with whom we once disputed the right, and therefore in a treaty of peace a stipulation was introduced relative to the exercise of that right, and in every other treaty since this stipulation has been renewed: but it is not by any means tantamount to a renunciation of the right which we claim, not only with respect to Holland, but as to every other power, Gentlemen seem also to misconceive the nature of our right to cut logwood, &c. in the Bay of Honduras. The fact is, that right was ceded to us by the Spaniards in 1787, in return for some lands that we gave them on the Musquito shore; therefore, it is a settlement which we possess of right, and to which the Spaniards were as much bound to refer in the treaty as we were: it was, in truth, on our part no omission.

Gentlemen pointed their animadversions at the difference which they alleged to exist between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, which they stated to consist in these five points, as to prisoners, Portugal, Newfoundland, the Cape of Good Hope, and Malta. In these are comprised what are called the faults of commission. As to the first, the state of the question is this: in the treaty of 1763, an article was inserted, that every belligerent power should maintain its own prisoners; and that article was again renewed in the peace of 1783; it is an article which humanity and justice approves, and is sanctioned by the best modern authors on the law of nations, among whom is Vattel: but the French disputed this principle with us in the late negotiation; alleging, that they did not grant it to any of the other powers with which they had concluded peace. When, therefore, they afterwards acceded to this principle, we could not claim a modification of it in our own favour, by refusing to allow a deduction for the subsistence of the Russian prisoners who were soldiers in our pay, and under our disposal when made prisoners. With regard to Portugal, some time after I came into office, it was thought by ministers that the Portuguese might make a much firmer stand than they did against France and Spain: and it was determined to send advice to Portugal, as to the means of resistance; and I have no hesitation in saying, that one part of that advice was, to place a more able officer at the head of their army; an advice not dictated by any disrespect to the officer then commanding, but merely because from his age he was deemed incapable. This advice, however, was not attended to; had it been, it was intended to follow it up with some succours; but ministers would have been culpable if they had committed any part of the British army to the care of an incapable commander.

Notwithstanding this conduct of Portugal, ministers took means to communicate to them the progress we were making in negotiation, and the prospects that we had; exhorting her to hold out as long as possible, that she might obtain better terms; yet she concluded a separate peace. We afterwards stepped in, and by our interference reduced the extent of the cessions that she had herself agreed to make in Guiana—an instance of liberality scarcely to be paralleled. We so arranged it for her, that her navigation of the river Amazon is perfectly secured, and not at all exposed to that interruption from the possessions which the French had obtained by the treaty that gentlemen on a former evening so strenuously maintained, upon the authority of a map not quite so accurate as they have been taught to believe. As to the third point of difference, Newfoundland, no concession was made to France in that article; the arrangement is precisely as it stood before the war, therefore no animadversion has been made on it. The Cape of Good Hope, which forms the fourth point, has called forth many observations; but if gentlemen would more attentively compare the terms of the preliminary and the definitive treaties, they would see that the Cape was to be surrendered, in full sovereignty, to the Dutch, and that there is no material difference between the two treaties on this head. In the opinions of persons best qualified to judge of the Cape, it was thought more advisable to give it up thus to the Dutch, than to make it an entrepôt in the hands of any other power.—Gentlemen dwelt upon Malta as the fifth point of difference. As to that I shall say, that whether the arrangement of that island be as good a one as could be contrived or not, it is as good a one as circumstances would permit. Gentlemen could not expect that we should retain it ourselves; for, when we blockaded it, we issued a declaration, that it was not our intention to retain it, but to restore it to the order of St. John, under certain regulations. The first object of those regulations was to ameliorate the condition of the Maltese, and at this gentlemen seem to level their principal hostility. They are averse to the privileges granted to the inhabitants; they do not seem to think of the important point we have gained, in the abolition of the three French langues, which had much domineering influence in that island—leaving only the Russian langue, and creating a Maltese langue. Gentlemen would not be so disturbed at the creation of this langue, or at the privileges given to the natives, if they would recollect the conduct of those natives during the siege, when, under a British officer, they were so active in their exertions to annoy the French, and to second our views: surely such men were entitled to our peculiar protection, and had some claim to be relieved from the oppression to which they were liable under the antient constitution. Is it not of consequence to the security of the island to conciliate the population to the order, and thus enable that order to establish a formidable militia for its defence. A power to guarantee it, with a view to preserve it from the dominion of France, was also chosen; that guarantee, was, in fact, first offered to Russia; but such is the change in the politics of courts, that Russia refused; and it was therefore put under the protection of Naples—a country which has the deepest interest, from the contiguity of the island of Sicily, to take care that Malta should not fall into the hands of France. This is not all; we have the guarantee of Austria and the principal powers of Europe, for the independence of this island. Under all the circumstances, I think there is no real departure in the definitive treaty from the basis of the preliminary articles; and I also think that no event which occurred in the interim could excuse a departure from the negotiation. From the language of gentlemen, they seem to fear that we have lost all by the peace; but I am decidedly of opinion, that we never stood at the conclusion of any treaty of peace in so good a relative situation to France as at present. It was said, on a former day, that we should have endeavoured to secure a port in the Mediterranean, for the advantage of our trade; but the House must be aware that Holland, while it had the most important trade in the Levant, never had a port in the Mediterranean. In that trade they were enabled to exceed us, in consequence of certain injudicious regulations as to quarantine, which parliament abolished about two years ago, but which while existing gave the Dutch the opportunity of underselling us in all the northern ports. It is rather singular, while gentlemen speak so much of Louisiana and other comparatively unimportant additions to French power, that they never allude to our conquest of the Mysore—

the destruction of that power which was the staunch ally of France, and the inveterate enemy of this country. What is our relative situation to France in the East Indies? Who will answer by attempting a comparison? And is not our situation in the West almost equally superior? Our islands almost trebled in produce during the war, with the addition of one of the most fertile islands in the West Indies, containing a capacious harbour, and forming the first naval depot in that quarter. What a monopoly of all the European markets for West India produce do we not possess! And when are we to expect any rivalry from France, whose principal colony, St. Domingo, is in such a distracted state, that whatever may be the event of the war in that island, it must be left little better than a waste? It will be recollected, that the returns of France from the West India trade were no less before the war than eight millions annually, and that she derived from this source a considerable balance of trade in her favour; but what are her prospects now? Indeed, if the naval and commercial means of the two countries be duly compared after the events of the war, the power of France will in most respects appear more specious than solid, while ours will be found solid and safe, and supplied moreover with the means of extending itself by the extent of our capital. France possessed no such means, and, in his opinion, it was better to possess more capital and less territory. For the extended dominion of France was liable to fall to pieces; its extent was matter of weakness, and the multiplicity of her objects must frustrate their accomplishment. The comparative superiority of our resources, when our superior capital was attended to, could not therefore be denied. But what was our security for the enjoyment of these advantages? This question he might answer by saying, that, under all the circumstances of our situation, we had made an honourable peace—a peace that secured all the vital springs of our strength and power. He was ready, however, to confess that the state of the world was such as could not prevent us from considering the peace as insecure; but all history, and even his own experience, taught him, that the apprehension of that insecurity should be no obstacle to the conclusion of peace, when peace could be concluded on honourable terms. When a good one was within our reach, we ought to seize it, though we might not be confident of its permanent enjoyment. Here the noble lord referred to the peace of Ryswick; which, though deemed by king William insecure, and not so advantageous as might be expected, was, notwithstanding, deemed by that wise prince such as should not be rashly rejected. He wished gentlemen would bear in their recollection the speech of king William to his parliament on that great occasion, and they would there find the sentiments which they should now entertain; they would see that it would be for them not to permit the enemy to do that in peace which they were not able to effect in war. He did not pretend to say that the security of peace was no consideration; all he should ask was, could a better peace have been secured, had the contest been protracted longer? If not, was it not better to take the chance of it, such as it could be obtained, under all the circumstances of our situation? In acceding to that peace, there was another motive which weighed heavily with him, and which no doubt must have had great weight with the House—he meant the internal state of France. France had now abandoned the principles and maxims of the revolution, and was rapidly reverting to the ancient principles of religion and civil order. The current ran that way; and would it be wise, by renewing the contest, to replunge her in all the horrors from which she had so lately emerged, and which threatened to agitate the rest of the world? Much had been said of the ambition of France, and of the views of her present rulers; but the ambition of France was the ambition of the French people, and was the same under the monarchy as under her present form of government. Neither view should make him hesitate respecting the eligibility of a peace which enabled us to escape out of a disturbed state of things, with our financial system and all our resources entire. It was not merely an alleviation of their burthens that the people languished for; but they were anxious for peace, because their patience was worn out by the war: they sighed for the termination of a struggle that had lasted nine years, and which they were reluctant to continue without any definite object. If our interests remained entire, if our honor was preserved, for what purpose should the war have been longer persisted in? He would not waste the time of the House in dwelling longer upon this topic; but as a day had been appointed, and a motion made for taking the treaty into consideration, he did not think the House should separate without coming to an opinion upon it. Of those who thought the peace dishonourable, that it affected our vital interests, and left us in a state of doubt and insecurity, he could not expect the support; but he was as confident, that those who thought our honor had been preserved; that the terms on which peace had been concluded were as good as, under all the circumstances of our situation, could have been expected; and that a peace which left our resources entire should be adhered to, that they might be husbanded for vigorous resistance against any future encroachment, would vote for the amendment which he should have the honor now to propose. The noble lord then concluded by moving an Amendment, by leaving out from the first word "That," in the second paragraph, to the end of the question, in order to insert these words: "We have already declared our full approbation of the preliminary articles of peace, which, by his majesty's command, were laid before this House; and we are satisfied that his majesty has, on the whole, wisely consulted the interests of his people in having concluded a definitive treaty, founded on the basis of these preliminaries: that, although we deeply lament the calamitous events which have taken place on the continent of Europe in the course of the war, we cannot but reflect, with the utmost satisfaction, that the wild and destructive designs with which this country was threatened at its commencement, have been effectually frustrated: that his majesty's dominions have not only been preserved entire, but valuable and important acquisitions have been annexed to them: that our commercial and maritime superiority have been maintained and improved; and that we continue in the confirmed possession of those means of exertion which the experience of the late contest has proved more than ever to be equal, even amidst the new and unexampled difficulties of other nations of Europe, to maintain the independence, and assert the honor of this country: that, impressed with these sentiments, we are, on our parts, earnestly solicitous to cultivate and improve the blessings of peace, and to concur in such measures as his majesty, in his wisdom, shall judge to be best calculated to prevent occasions of misunderstanding with foreign powers: that we rely on his majesty's known disposition to adhere, with the most scrupulous fidelity, to his engagements; but that we entertain, at the same time, a perfect confidence, that his majesty will not fail to employ that vigilance and attention which the present situation of Europe demands; and, above all, that his majesty will be uniformly determined, and prepared to defend, against every encroachment, the great sources of the wealth, commerce, and naval power of the empire: that we are fully persuaded that his majesty's faithful subjects will, at all times, be ready to support the honor of his majesty's crown, and the rights, laws, and liberties of their country, with the same zeal, energy, and fortitude, which they have invariably manifested during the war now happily brought to a conclusion."

Mr. Wellesley Pole seconded the motion; and corroborated and illustrated the arguments of the noble lord who preceded him.

Mr. Thomas Grenville said, that the noble lord seemed to rest the whole of his defence on the merits of the definitive treaty; yet, at the conclusion of his speech, he had entered into a justification of it, and owned that the people were worn out with the war, and clamoured for peace. In this he was not prepared to acquiesce; for the people were alive to their liberty and independence even to the latest period of the war, and continued to think it necessary up to the very signing of the preliminaries: he could not, therefore, hear it said that their patience was worn out by the contest. Another mode of exaggeration which had been employed by the noble lord was such as he could not pass over. That noble person had asked, whether no peace was to be accepted and whether no terms could be endured by his opponents. He had pushed this unfair mode of arguing still farther; for he had asked, whether the war should have been continued for Malta, for Louisiana, or for the Italian republic, as consolidated by Buonaparté with that of France? Mr. Grenville said, he was not one of those who would have objected to any terms. About two years since he was deputed by the then administration to negotiate a peace; and he certainly should not have accepted of the mission, if he had not been inclined to negotiate on honourable and safe terms.

He thought it, however, unfair to put the question of peace or war on the ground of each individual sacrifice made by this country; and particularly, as in the affair of the Italian republic, where an enormous addition was to be superadded to the sacrifices already made. He would much rather argue the question on this broad and general ground—"Will you suffer the enemy to do you that mischief in time of peace, which they could not effect in time of war?" We had given up the Netherlands; we had lost sight of Holland; and yet the argument was now so managed as if the evil was cured, instead of being increased by the mass of cessions. He was not for going to war again for any one of these, or for the whole of them; but he must desire, that, considered as a whole, they should not be kept entirely out of the question. He could not, for instance, but notice the accession of weight and influence which France had received by the ceding of Louisiana. This was a matter settled in a secret convention, and kept wholly out of view when the limits of French Guiana were debated, on a view of the preliminaries. Did ministers conceal, or were they aware at that time of this convention? This was a subject on which an explanation was due to the House. They had been told, it was true, that there was in this part no naval station; but he must ask, whether this cession did not command the two Floridas; and whether, in the case of a new war, the cession of the one was not, in point of fact, a cession of the whole? This question he had pressed before; but unfortunately he had pressed it without effect. On the Island of Elba he should not offer one syllable, because that question had already been debated. The ministers had exulted in the non-renewal of treaties, considering their renewal as a matter which was fraught with danger, doubt and insecurity. They had rejoiced in this as if they had been sent on a voyage of discovery, though, at the same time, they abandoned the beaten track of all their predecessors. These treaties, however, he must observe, had often replaced the security and refixed the boundaries of disturbed Europe. There were difficulties, no doubt, in this instance, arising from the new limits of the Rhine and the cession of the Netherlands. But these difficulties could not be admitted to supersede the advantages arising from the renewal and recognition of former treaties. He would admit that our late enemy was not easily to be bound or debarred by treaties of this description from the objects of his ambition; but he was not prepared to accede to the statement of a right hon. gentleman last night, that these treaties were only worth so much waste paper. It was said by some persons, that we should sanction the ambitious projects and attainments of France, by entering specifically into those treaties. It was to be recollected, however, that Buonaparté, pending the congress of Amiens, had set out on his mysterious journey to Lyons. We afterwards knew, and of course lent an implied sanction to, the object of this journey; for, though not expressly described, our recognition, when the matter was fully known, was not the less given to the establishment of the Italian republic. A difference, he was aware, had been laid down between all treaties considered as commercial and political. He was convinced that we could not renew a treaty which had expired, or enforce one which was not agreeable; and such, no doubt, was the case with the commercial treaty made with France in 1787. This, however, did not imply or sanction the exclusion of any treaty whatsoever. With respect to India, it was contended, that all firmans of the native powers, as well as our own treaties, were cancelled by the war, and that we stood on the distinct claim of our sovereignty. But we pronounced on our own right, without considering what was the opinion of France, with respect to claims which in the late treaty she had not recognised. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Dundas) condemning, for the first time, the treaty of peace in 1783, had said, that he was equally happy to get rid of the poison of that treaty, and of its antidote, administered in 1787. This opinion was evidently changed, when the same right hon. gentleman gave his assent to the treaty of Lisle in 1796. Mr. Grenville then proceeded to remark on our exclusion from cutting of logwood in the Bay of Honduras, the access to which was assured by former treaties with Spain, which now were all extinguished, and the advantages of which would be but ill repaid by a return to the Musquito shore, now a shore without settlements. On all these occasions he was for a limited right, settled by a convention, rather than for a general and perhaps an unadmitted claim. He next proceeded to notice the situation of the House of Orange, whose claims had been loosely passed over in the definitive treaty. By a separate convention, it was, in fact, determined that that House should not have one stiver of compensation which was not to be drawn from this country. On the relinquishment of the honour usually paid to our flag by Holland, the hon. gentleman severely animadverted. He then observed, on the article by which the payment of the debt due for the maintenance of prisoners was regulated. The House were told, that the Russian troops, being not merely under pay, but subject to our control, ought to be considered in the same light as the native troops of this country. But was this really the fact? It certainly was not. The Russian troops, who were fed, clothed, and arrayed at our expense, were so far from being destined to the service of this country, that they were to be employed to act offensively against us. The French government had succeeded in detaching the emperor of Russia from our friendship; and this was the boon which they presented to gratify their capricious ally. On the subject of the article respecting Portugal, the noble lord had said, there was no deviation from the preliminaries of peace, by which the integrity of her territories is secured. Yes—this integrity had been a ground of stipulation; but of what description was the integrity which was secured? Was it integrity of possessions as they existed antecedent to the war? No, said the noble lord; but Portugal had obtained an integrity of possession, which, when the matter came to be investigated, turned out to be a mere definition of limits. He would not enter into any geographical statements; but he could not avoid making one remark with regard to these limits. The noble lord talked of a distance of 50 miles, established by the new limits, which had been fixed from the river of the Amazons. How such a distance could exist, he was quite at a loss to conceive, when he reflected that the Arawari flowed into that very river. While he was on this subject he wished to say a few words on the obligations of this country to procure for Portugal, not an integrity of the kind now described, but integrity of a substantial nature. He was not disposed to question the policy of the late administration, in preferring the expedition to Egypt to the defence of Portugal. But what was the inference to be drawn from this arrangement? It was, that if we did not grant an old and faithful ally assistance, in a moment of difficulty and danger, we were bound by every consideration of public faith, to take care that her interests should not suffer from our preferring other objects to that of affording her protection against an enemy who had attacked her independence. This was the conduct which good faith clearly dictated; and he was amazed to hear the language of the noble lord in justification of the vague provision which the definitive treaty had made to secure this object. What was the natural effect of even a dereliction of the interests of our ally? It was, to estrange Portugal from our interests, and to create a spirit of hostility to a power by whom her interests had been so grossly neglected.—On the article relative to the Cape, he had only one observation to make; and that was, that, by the arrangement which had been agreed upon, the Dutch might make it a free port; and thus we might lose all the advantages of the arrangement previously established by the treaty.—He next touched on Malta, the regulations respecting which he censured in very severe terms. In the preliminaries, Malta was made independent; but it now appeared that this declaration of independence had been made while ministers were ignorant of the arrangements by which this independence was fixed. The order was to be restored; but how was the restoration of an order to be effected, all of whose funds were lost, gone, and dispersed? From an average of ten years previous to 1798, it appeared that 130,000*l.* constituted the whole annual revenue. To the three French langues 58,000*l.* formerly belonged, the whole of which was confiscated. The whole of the revenues of the Spanish langue consisted of 27,000*l.* and this sum was also confiscated; or if the appropriation had not already taken place, it was likely to be so at no very remote period.—After estimating other losses in Germany, Poland, and Bavaria, the total of the provinces left did not much exceed 23,000*l.* a year; and this was the sum allotted for the support of the order to be restored! What, on the other hand, was the amount of the expense annually incurred on an average of ten years? It was not less than 130,000*l.* The island was declared to be independent under the protection of a third power. But, was the king of Naples, by whom this protection was to be afforded, himself independent? Was he not, on the contrary, totally dependent on the power of France? To remedy this defect, however, and to secure this independence, the House was called upon to consider the powerful guarantees which had been established. On a former occasion, the noble lord had stated, that the accession of some of these powers to this arrangement had not been received. But, admitting that they would accede, what was the consequence? France was the guaranteeing power nearest in situation to the island whose independence was to be secured. From the new constitution given to the order, and the establishment of a new langue, tumults and broils might arise in the island. France, as an amicable guaranteeing power, might immediately interfere; a squadron might sail from Toulon, and take possession of the island before the design was suspected; and it was not easy to say what new changes would be introduced before these troubles were quelled. The hon. gentleman concluded by saying, that the original address had his cordial approbation.

Mr. Dundas took that opportunity of noticing some misrepresentations of what he had said last night. A right hon. gentleman alleged, that he had applied his observations to the convention of 1787, as containing evil provisions, which we ought not to renew. He had done no such thing. His argument was this, that the merit of the convention of 1787 depended solely upon this, that it applied an antidote to the poison of the treaty of 1783; the meaning of which was, that the convention of 1787 had the merit of counteracting the treaty of 1783; but he had not said, that either the one or the other of them was the foundation of the prosperity of India. The right hon. gentleman had put it to him, how he reconciled his conduct in assenting to the negotiation at Lisle, by which the provisions of the convention of 1787 were stipulated to be assented to on our part? His answer was this; that since the year 1797, the condition of this country in India was changed most materially, and that which might have been offered in 1797, and was then offered, would have been improper on our part in 1802. In 1797, we had not what we now possessed, namely, the undoubted sovereignty of India; and therefore, whatever opinion he had in 1797, he was perfectly warranted in changing that opinion in the present instance; for, in the one case we were warranted in demanding more than in the other. In both instances he had been desirous that this country should have the best possible terms of security for its tranquillity in India. Did the right hon. gentleman mean to make it matter of reproach to him, that he had changed his opinion as to our situation in India, upon a change of circumstances there? Did he mean to say, that, although he could discover a material change of circumstances in our situation, yet there was to be no change in his opinion as to the conduct which we were to pursue? Did he mean to urge it as a fault in him, that he had, upon an attentive perusal of documents, from 1763 down to the present period, become of opinion that our sovereignty in India was now entire; and, as he was of opinion that we were better off in this respect by not renewing any treaty than if we had, that he should endeavour to impress that opinion on the House? He believed that the noble person who had been alluded to (lord Grenville) stated an opinion, much as he had done on the ground of our sovereignty in India, and that he had changed the opinion he had first entertained on this subject. But he would now say a few words on the question now before the House. When he heard of the manner in which the Cape of Good Hope was to be disposed of, he heard it with regret and sorrow. He had always considered that place as a great acquisition to this country. He was of that opinion before we had it; he was confirmed in that opinion by experience since it was in our possession. He looked upon it as a good depôt, and a place for the reception of our troops when we had occasion to send them to India: by their being landed and refreshed there, they went to India full of health and vigour, and were fit for immediate service. It helped us in the course of our immense fleets on their way to India. He looked upon the Cape and Ceylon as our two great bulwarks, and at no period of his life had he been of another opinion on this subject. No connexion, however close—no friendship, however cordial—no attachment, however sincere should induce him to withhold his opinion upon this subject. That opinion was, that the Cape of Good Hope should not have been given up by this country; and had he been in administration, nothing should have induced him to be a party in agreeing to a peace, by which this country was to abandon the Cape. He felt this sentiment still more strongly on account of the connexion that was now established between France and Batavia. He considered the Cape as almost invaluable to us, as a place of safe reception to us between Asia and Europe; but, although this was his opinion, yet he did not hold it to be any part of his duty to join those who took so much pains to render the peace an object of disapprobation with the people: he saw no good that was likely to arise out of that conduct; neither did he think it was proper to cavil too much at that part of the exercise of the prerogative of the crown, although it was done, of course, under the advice of ministers. With regard to Malta, he considered it also as a place of great value, on account of the communication it had between the Mediterranean and the Levant. It was one of the finest ports in the world. It was, in a commercial view, most important for us to retain; but it was not in a commercial view that he felt the full importance of this place. He felt its value much more on account of the effect it would have, on surrounding nations, to see the flag of Great Britain hoisted as an assurance to all who passed it, of the protection of the British arms, should she chance to stand in need of it; and when he came to add to this the desire of the Maltese to continue under our protection, he was the more induced to express his regret that this place had been given up. He had therefore no difficulty in saying, that, under all the circumstances, he could not have assented to the giving up of either of these places had he been in administration.—But now for the immediate question before the House. He could not agree to the address moved by his right hon. friend, because it commenced with an invective against the peace. He saw no good likely to arise from that course of proceeding. In 1783, when a peace was made, after it was admitted to be necessary on all hands, that peace was afterwards made use of by parties in that and the other House of parliament, as an organ to destroy the administration who made it. He did not like the purpose for which the parties then decried that peace: as little did he like the course which was taken now against this peace. He had stated the points in the present case in which he did not concur; but he desired to be understood as not being a party to any such confederacy.

He agreed, on the whole, with the amendment; and had it not been moved, probably he should have moved some amendment himself. The first address, if agreed to, he apprehended might do mischief. He approved of the amendment, because the general tendency of it was only to approve of carrying into effect the definitive treaty, because it was founded on the basis of the preliminary treaty, which had already been approved of by the two Houses of parliament.

General Gascoyne seeing many gentlemen desirous to deliver their sentiments, and considering the lateness of the hour (two o'clock), moved, that the House should adjourn till to-morrow. — The question of adjournment being put,

Mr. Chancellor Addington said, his own feeling was in favour of a decision before the House should part. It was the interest of the country also, that no delay should take place. On the other hand, he was extremely desirous that the subject should have a full investigation. If, then, there were so many gentlemen desirous to deliver their sentiments, the propriety of giving them an opportunity to say every thing that could be said upon the subject was such, that he thought every feeling of his own, and the public consideration should give way.

Mr. Pitt observed, that if any considerable number of members were desirous of promoting a more minute inquiry, he was ready to accede to the motion of adjournment. But, for himself, he was perfectly satisfied with the tone and spirit of the address, as it was amended, as well as with the arguments so ably and successfully used by his noble friend. In favour, therefore, of the amendment, he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote. When he reviewed what had already fallen in the course of the debate, he saw no prospect of any new arguments which might be supposed capable of making any serious impression on the minds of gentlemen, and of changing their opinions as they existed on either side. His noble friend had made but one speech, and those who disapproved of the peace had delivered three or four. As he saw no probability that any additional arguments of importance would be thrown out in the course of farther investigation, he should press an immediate decision on the amendment.

Mr. Grey said, that however he might be disposed to vote against the address, he was less inclined to oppose the amendment; for, though he could not help thinking that the dangers of the country were greater by the definitive treaty, than by their preliminary articles, yet he was convinced, upon the whole, that his majesty was well advised to put an end to the contest.

The question being put, "That the debate be adjourned till four of the clock this afternoon;" the House divided:

Tellers.

|      |   |                      |   |     |
|------|---|----------------------|---|-----|
| YEAS | { | Mr. William Smith -  | } | 185 |
|      |   | General Gascoyne -   |   |     |
| NOES | { | Mr. William Dundas - | } | 137 |
|      |   | Mr. Sargent - - -    |   |     |

So it was resolved in the affirmative; and at three in the morning, the House adjourned.

May 14. The adjourned debate being resumed, and the Speaker having read the Address proposed by Mr. Windham, and the amendment moved by lord Hawkesbury,

Sir W. Young observed, that the noble lord who moved the amendment had said, that the peace was to be considered as a whole. Now he and his friends thought it impossible well to consider a whole, without attentively observing the parts which formed that whole, and the quality of the materials of which it was composed. If the address moved by his right hon. friend produced no other effect than the amendment proposed by the noble lord, he should consider that it had not altogether failed; for, although he preferred the original address, still he was glad to see such a document come from the hands of his majesty's ministers; for the amended address seemed to confess what the original address proclaimed; the object of the original address being to call the country to a sense of its danger, to show her the precipice on which she stood, and the means of her salvation. As to the difference between the preliminaries and the definitive treaty, he should first advert to the observations that had been made respecting Malta. It had had been said, that the treaty gave a preponderance to the Maltese language; that they were to fill at least half the offices of the state, and might be expected to form a sufficient militia, for the protection of that island. Gentlemen who held that language seemed little acquainted with Malta or its inhabitants. He had himself resided there for ten weeks. In the whole island there were not five men who could be called merchants; could it then be expected that an order, which valued itself on its high nobility, could associate with persons of the description of gold workers and sellers of coral in the administration of the island? If a few could so far degrade themselves, their votes would be lost in the opinion of the majority; and the island of Malta would then, instead of being restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, be in fact given up to the democracy of the Maltese. That this would be the consequence was still farther apparent from this circumstance, that the noble knights of the other langues seldom visited the island: and therefore the management of its affairs, and all the influence attending it, must fall into the hands of the Maltese langues, which would soon be such a democracy as he had represented. Another important part was the cession of Louisiana from Spain to France, directly in the teeth of the stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht, and many other treaties, wherein this country (properly jealous of the increasing connexion between France and Spain) bargained that Spain should not cede any parts of her empire to France. He differed from the noble lord in his opinion respecting the value of Louisiana; he thought that, both from its real value and its situation, hanging over Mexico, it was a most important acquisition to France. The probable re-conquest of St. Domingo by the French was, in his view, a subject of much danger to our West India possessions; he should think them much safer, were Domingo to be a Negro republic, than to have that large and fertile island in the hands of France. At present France would require a very large army there, to conquer it, and to maintain its conquest: but it must be recollected, that when peace should be restored, the army which they would always keep up in the island, and which we could not prevent them from keeping up, would always, in case of a dispute between this country and France, be sufficiently strong to threaten the existence of all our settlements in the West Indies. The value of St. Domingo to France was incalculable; the French part alone was formerly worth all our settlements in the West Indies, and employed above 700 heavy ships in its trade. Now that the whole island was in the hands of France, much more commerce and colonial productions must be expected from it, and a new nursery of seamen was opened for the French navy. Besides the danger that impended over our own West India settlements. The perilous situation of Mexico was also to be considered, which now lay in a manner at the foot of France. When France was in possession of St. Domingo and Louisiana, if a dispute should arise with Spain, and a French standard was unfurled and pointed to Mexico, what myriads of adventurers would join it. The conquest of Mexico would present no difficulties to France; she can have it now, whenever she would. Such were the incalculably valuable acquisitions that France had obtained by the peace, in the West Indies! In Europe and in every quarter of the world, she had exhibited the same spirit of adventure and desire of aggrandizement. She had possessed herself of the Italian republic, and the island of Elba. Was it, then, to be supposed that France would fail to benefit of this new vantage ground, on which she now stood; or that she would not, so soon as her strength and resources were at the proper pitch, pour destruction, military and commercial, upon all the powers by which she is surrounded? It had been said that capital was a tyrannic power, which could, at all times secure monopoly and defeat every attempt to meet it by any other principle in the field of commerce. Such was the boasted power of British capital; but even those who used that argument, were aware that persevering industry was the source of capital. It was to truly British and legitimate industry and commerce that we owed the extent of our wealth; and therefore it was more peculiarly the duty of those who negotiated this treaty, to have looked with a jealous eye to the maintenance of our commerce with the ports of the Mediterranean, where existed the principal marts of consumption for our linen and cotton manufactures. With respect to the cession of Spanish territory in America to France, it was an act in direct violation of the treaty of Utrecht; and it was a ground, in his mind, upon which, notwithstanding the treaty of peace, it was the duty of ministers to have appealed to Spain, and endeavoured to procure an adjustment less calculated to excite apprehensions, as well in Spain herself, as in Great Britain. Upon the whole, however, though the definitive treaty was one to which he never would have agreed to set his hand, yet, now that it was concluded, he thought the country bound to maintain it inviolate. But in that faithful observance of the treaty it was the duty of this country to be perpetually vigilant against similar designs, which France, tempted by her power and her ambition, might be induced to meditate. From the nature and extent of that power, the attack, whenever it should come, might be expected to come suddenly; and when he considered France as possessing in Europe a line of coast from the Netherlands to Italy, together with her influence in the other ports of the Mediterranean, her new acquisitions in the East and in the West, he trusted that his majesty's government would be jealously alive to the necessity of maintaining at all times such a military and naval establishment at home and abroad, as would be competent to enable this country to re-assume hostilities with security and effect, whenever it should unfortunately become necessary. He concluded by supporting the original motion.

Lord Castlereagh said:—I feel considerable reluctance, Sir, in troubling the House upon a subject that has already been so ably and so fully discussed; but I must solicit a few moments of your attention, while I state the reasons which induce me to concur in the address moved by my noble friend. It appears to me that the question may be resolved into two points; namely, how far the late treaty has provided for our security; and whether it might be better provided for by a farther prosecution of the war? But before I come to a more immediate consideration of these two points, I wish to be indulged in a few observations upon the two great features which the discussion seems to have hitherto assumed. What I allude to are, the alterations that have taken place in the relative situation of the two countries between the signing of the preliminaries and the conclusion of the definitive treaty, and the proceedings which the British government should have instituted in consequence of those alterations. As to the events that have taken place upon the continent, I agree, that they are extremely important in their nature, and that as such they might have been the ground of a new consideration; they might be deemed sufficient to justify a breaking off of the treaty, or at least a demand for an equivalent. But in making up my mind on this part of the question, I think it my duty to examine how far it bears on the general question. Did these alterations so endanger our security, as to make it wise in ministers to break off the negotiation? I cannot really consider them of that magnitude with regard to us. But have ministers made any attempt to obtain an equivalent? They may, or they may not, as far as I can pretend to say. But what could be that equivalent, the failure to obtain which would have justified them in breaking off the treaty? I am rather inclined to agree with my noble friend, that neither the alterations that have taken place subsequent to the signing of the preliminaries, nor an endeavour to obtain an equivalent, could have warranted ministers, who acted on the principle of our own security, to forbear bringing the treaty to a final conclusion. The security of the continent, though much to be wished, was not with them the most urgent, or the most important object. But, in considering the consequences of the first consul of France having assumed the presidency of the Italian republic, it was material to distinguish between the direct and indirect disposal of the resources of that republic. That he indirectly influenced the resources of the Cisalpine republic previous to the signing of the preliminaries, nobody will deny; and that since his accession to the presidency of the Italian republic, those resources are at his more direct disposal, may be also acknowledged. But as that influence more immediately affects other countries, and as we were anxious to provide for the security of our own, was this change in the influence of France over Italy a sufficient cause for a renewal of the war on our part? I cannot think so. Indeed, the cession of Louisiana appears to me of more importance. In that we are more vitally concerned, because it may more materially affect our colonial interests. But is the chance of its affecting those interests, dear as they justly should be to us, a justifiable ground for relinquishing the hopes of peace? Surely not. As to what the hon. baronet asserted, that this cession was a breach of the treaty of Utrecht, surely in that assertion he did not evince his usual accuracy of research; for Louisiana was not then considered as one of the possessions of Spain that should not be yielded to France; neither was it guaranteed by that treaty. It passed to France from Spain by a secret article of the treaty of 1763. That was looked upon as a proud peace; yet the present treaty was, in some points, more advantageous; for by it we possess a leading and commanding station in Trinidad, which we did not possess before. But it is asked, how far will the spirit of encroachment, which actuates France, be permitted to advance? That spirit it is no doubt our duty and interest to watch. But I am bold to say, that it is peculiarly incumbent upon us, under our present circumstances, to prove, that it is our sincere wish to embrace a system of peace, as far as that system is compatible with our safety. That proof we have given by acquiescing in the alterations that have taken place in the relative situation of the two countries since the signing of the preliminaries; and, unless France now begins to act in a different spirit from that which prompted these alterations, neither the maritime nor the continental peace that now prevails can be of any long continuance. But it was the prerogative of his majesty to make war and peace; and how ministers would act in advising the former, depended on their discretion. If future encroachments were attempted by France, no doubt the House would be prepared to pledge themselves in support of administration, and both parliament and the country would cordially combine in arresting the progress of such a spirit, that must prove both dangerous to our own security, and subversive of the independence of Europe.—There were two other topics on which I must now beg leave briefly to touch; the one was Malta. By the preliminaries it was stipulated, that that island should be made independent of the contracting parties, and it was expected that Russia would have garrisoned it; but this, it seems, Russia declined. As a military station, Malta was undoubtedly of great value, especially as it favoured an attack upon Egypt. In this view it was more important than its bearings on Italy or on our commerce. But when Russia refused to garrison it, what better arrangement could have been made than that which the treaty has adopted? That it was not in a perfect state of security I am not prepared to deny; but if adequate funds were provided to support a garrison, its situation would by no means be precarious. The conduct which its inhabitants had displayed on very trying occasions, gave a fair promise that they would again act with the same spirit for their defence. The funds indeed formed an important question; and I am happy to have found a statement of the revenues of the island, which I am led to think authentic, and which represents them in a more favourable light than they had hitherto been represented. This statement makes the revenues amount to 130,000*l*. Since that calculation was made, a new source of revenue has been opened by the establishment of new langues in other countries, particularly the Russian and Bavarian langues. So that, taking the old and new revenues together, they will now amount to about 300,000*l*. exclusive of the commercial revenues of the island at the disposal of the grand master. Besides, an improved regulation has lately been adopted in the customs, which promises a great increase in the revenue; and on every view of what may improve or increase its revenues, they may be expected to amount to as large a sum as they stood at previous to the war. Add to this an accumulated surplus left by the late emperor of Russia, and which will now be converted to the better re-establishment of the order. So much for the revenues of Malta.—The grand object that we had in view, Sir, in that contest, in which for nine years we were engaged, was the attainment of general security; and to see how far we have succeeded, I cannot do better than to refer to the three leading points on which this security was to be founded. It was by the abolition of Jacobin principles, by the enemy being placed in that situation in which they could no longer hope, with the same prospect of success, to press them against this country, or by such an alteration in their application that they could not excite any feeling of formidable danger. Sir, will any man now say that the danger from French principles exists to the same extent as at the commencement of the war? Whatever opinions may be entertained of the nature of the present government of France, it cannot be denied, that no particular spirit of malignity is now shown to this country. We hear no more of those wild schemes of subverting our independence as a nation, which former governments of France were so forward to avow. The French now look to this country as a country enjoying the advantages of liberty, and as possessing a constitution which is worthy of being considered as the model of a free government. They feel for us all that deference and respect which it was usual to entertain under their ancient government. With reference to the second ground of security, I contend, that even supposing the French principles to exist in their full force, it is impossible to entertain the same hope of establishing them in this country. At the time the war broke out, their principles were not understood; they were apt to mislead, from their novelty; they had not produced in France those miseries and crimes which have now rendered them the just objects of universal execration. Now, their real character and tendency are notorious to the world; the people of this country have for nine years had an opportunity of contemplating the enormities to which they have given birth, and to turn from the view of such disasters to the blessings of a free constitution. It would, therefore, Sir, be impossible now, if these principles still remained, to propagate them with any prospect of success.—The third ground of security arises partly out of the two preceding circumstances. The best test of the extinction of these principles would undoubtedly have been the re-establishment of monarchy in France; and hence, in conducting the war, we looked to this as a most desirable object, so long as any chance of its being obtained continued. I never said, however, and I am equally confident my right hon. friend near me (Mr. Pitt) never said, that security could not be obtained in any other way. We sought security by pursuing this object as long as the circumstances of Europe afforded any prospect of success; and, though in this object we have failed, I maintain that, as far as our separate security is concerned, it has been fully accomplished by the conduct of the war. For, though the territorial acquisitions of France cannot be viewed without regret, I concur with my noble friend, that so far as our separate security is concerned, this extension of territory is a circumstance which ought not to excite any degree of immediate alarm. I concur no less with him in thinking, that, relative to France, we are now in a greater state of security than in any former period of our history. I am indeed ready to say, that the influence which France has acquired, is for the continent highly disastrous, and that the state in which the balance of power is left in the general system of Europe, is extremely unsatisfactory. France, if she chooses to neglect the internal improvement of her territories, may undoubtedly carry desolation over the continent to a degree still more extensive. Whether she will, for the purpose of gratifying an inordinate lust of dominion, incur the imputation of leaving her own people the prey of barbarism, we have yet to discover; but at present the extension of her territories, as far as the safety of this country is involved, excites in my mind no degree of apprehension. That, by the cultivation of the arts of peace, by the introduction of habits of industry into the territories she has acquired, she may hereafter make very important advantages from her conquests, I do not deny. Nor do I mean to assert, that with regard to the security of this country these acquisitions may not, at some future time, acquire vast importance; but I do contend, that, as far as immediate security is concerned, as far as our interests are at present liable to be affected, they ought not to give rise to alarm. The dangers which may flow from them are not the dangers of the present moment; they can only be the dangers of a remote period, a period by far too remote to be calculated upon when judging of the effects of the present peace. I am, indeed, surprised at the unworthy timidity expressed by my hon. friends on the other side. When I make use of this expression I am far from meaning to insinuate that they are conscious of any such dishonourable feeling; but I cannot help saying, that the fears which they have expressed can serve no other purpose but to lower the tone and temper of the people of this country, and to elevate the tone and temper of our late enemy. On this part of the subject, I beg leave shortly to take notice of the change which has taken place in the situation of the country, in consequence of the war. The noble lord below, in the former part of this debate, stated this alteration with such ability, that I shall at present content myself with recalling the circumstances which he enumerated, to the recollection of the House. No one more sincerely laments than I do the loss of our influence on the continent; but if I were called upon to say what would have the greatest effect in restoring our influence on the continent; I would say, that it would be the giving back to France her colonial possessions. Let her commerce be revived—let her colonies be cultivated, and our interests will proportionably increase. Now, let us see what is the comparative state of the imports and exports of the two countries. During the war our imports have increased from 19 to 30

millions, and in the same period our exports have been augmented from 24 to no less than 43 millions; our articles of British manufacture exported have risen from 18 to 24 millions, and our tonnage from 1,600,000 to 2,100,000; our mercantile seamen have increased from 118,000 to 143,000: and when it is considered, that, during a considerable period of the war, 120,000 sailors have been employed in our navy, this accession of numbers cannot be considered without astonishment and admiration, nor fail to exhibit the most satisfactory evidence of the flourishing state of our maritime resources. Such a view of the commerce of the country, at the conclusion of a war the most expensive in which this country was ever engaged, surely affords no room for indulging any apprehension for its future prosperity. It is besides, Sir, to be considered, that during the war a considerable part of the carrying trade was in the hands of neutrals, and that it will now naturally return to its ancient channels of British conveyance. When I take these circumstances into consideration, I am astonished at the apprehensions which my hon. friends have expressed. How, on the other hand, Sir, does France now stand in point of commercial resources? In 1777, the latest period to which any regular account can be obtained previous to the war, the French exports were 12,000,000*l.*, and their imports about 9,000,000*l.* In the interval they had certainly increased; but, allowing for this increase, they will not differ materially from this statement. From the West Indies their imports were about 7,500,000*l.* and their exports about 2,500,000*l.* at the same period. By the report of last year the imports from the colonies did not exceed in value 61,000*l.* and the imports were not more than 41,000*l.* Suppose, then, that at the commencement of a commercial rivalship betwixt the two nations, the exports of France should be 7,000,000*l.* and their imports 8,000,000*l.* while our exports amounted to 43,000,000*l.*, and our imports to 23,000,000*l.* was there any reasonable ground of apprehension about the result of such a commercial contest? Yet, Sir, by a strange inconsistency, when such is the relative situation of the two countries, we are told that our commercial greatness is on the eve of being eclipsed, that our prosperity and our wealth are on the brink of destruction. Before we give way to such groundless apprehensions, before we cherish such desponding fears, it would at least be becoming to estimate the means that we enjoy of increasing that wealth which we have acquired. We ought to calculate the effect of a capital more than adequate to the territories on which it is to be employed, before we ascribe so much to the acquisition of territories, for the improvement of which, as in the case of the territories of France, capital is wanting. So far then, Sir, I see no room for apprehension, and I think there is as little to be reasonably dreaded from any prohibitions imposed on the introduction of our manufactures into France, or into the countries of her allies. How it can be the interest of a poor country to purchase dear articles instead of those that are cheaper, I am altogether at a loss to discover; yet such would be the policy of France in excluding our manufactures from her ports. But, even allowing that France by this exclusion should act against all the plainest dictates of common sense, how can we imagine that she will be able to persuade the powers under her influence to consent to such prohibitions? Is it at all probable that they will choose to buy articles at a much dearer rate, when English manufactures are in their power at a lower price, and of superior quality? It is not easy to suppose that they will consent to a prohibition so obviously disadvantageous.—But, Sir, let us briefly turn our attention to the state of Europe, and see how far this influence of the French can possibly be exerted. We have already seen the experiment tried, and we have seen its futility demonstrated. We have seen the trial made in a year of war, when every effort was used to ensure its success, and under circumstances far more favourable to such success than any which can exist in a period of peace. In the year 1800, a year the most favourable for the exclusion of articles of British manufacture, our exports to the continent were to the value of 7,500,000*l.* Having stated what this amount was at a time when the prohibition against our goods was more general than at any former period, I beg leave now to turn the attention of the House to the countries which are not under French influence, and to which, consequently the prohibition will not extend. They are Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Prussia, Poland, and Germany. To these countries the exports amounted to 6,000,000*l.* in the year I have stated.

Now, what are the countries in which the influence of France is so powerful as to procure an exclusion of our manufactures? They are Holland, Spain, Portugal, and the states of Italy. As to Portugal, I see no reason to believe that during peace the French will insist on excluding our manufactures. The prohibition only extended to the continuance of the war; and the stipulation at the conclusion of peace is, that France shall be allowed to trade with Portugal on the footing of the most favoured nations. This is all that I should ask for British commerce and British manufactures. Let a fair competition once be established, and I have no fear about the result. The greater part of Italy I allow to be under French influence; but with Venice in the hands of the emperor at the one extremity, and Naples at the other, I see little reason to dread the consequences of any prohibition which the French may attempt to establish. In stating that to these countries during the year I have mentioned our exports amounted to 1,300,000*l.* all that remained was only 200,000*l.* out of the value of the whole exports. We have already, therefore, seen the worst of the effects of such prohibitions during the continuance of the late contest; it is contrary to any principle of reason to suppose, that we can experience worse effects during a peace, and therefore we have no reasonable ground of apprehension. If we look to America, we see the fairest prospect for the continuance of our commercial relations; and if we look to the West Indies, there is quite as little room for gloomy apprehensions. It may be said, indeed, that several important colonies are now to be restored to the enemy, and that our trade will materially suffer by this restoration. This is, in my opinion, a groundless apprehension. If we look at the extent of British produce sent to all these islands, we shall find that it did not exceed in annual value 800,000*l.*; an amount surely, when contrasted with the great aggregate of our exports, of very inconsiderable importance. But I deny that a loss even to this amount, will be sustained. France cannot, in the present state of her manufactures, supply the demands of her colonies. She will be compelled to resort to the British market to obtain the necessary supply. We find that this is nothing singular in the history of this country. For a considerable time after the peace of 1763, the restored possessions of the French were supplied with articles of British produce; the same thing took place at the peace of 1783; and it is surely much more likely that it should take place under the present circumstances of France and her manufactures. When we look to the state of the French colonies which are now in their possession, we see still less room for apprehension. On the situation of St. Domingo, I have only a few observations to offer; and it is the less necessary for me to enlarge, as I see an hon. general opposite (Maitland) who can give much more accurate information on the subject than any to which I can pretend. I say then, Sir, that, if France succeeds in restoring industry to this important colony, and this they could only do by importation (according to the most moderate calculations, about one-half, or nearly 300,000 of the blacks have perished since the commencement of the first disorders in the island); taking the number of negroes wanted to be 300,000, and the price of each man to be 60*l.*, no less a sum than 18,000,000*l.* will be necessary to provide for the island the number necessary to fill up the place of those who have perished in the civil contests, or openly in the field. Can we suppose that, under the present circumstances of France, she should soon possess such a redundancy of capital as to enable her to make the purchase, without which the island is without value; far less to put it on that footing which would render it as valuable as it was prior to the first insurrections which took place? The question of the probable success of the French, or of the difficulties they may experience in restoring tranquillity to the island, is one involving so many different considerations, that I am unwilling to enter upon it. I will only remark, that the establishment of an independent black government, is what I could not contemplate without dismay. The dangerous effects of such an establishment on the tranquillity of the negroes in our own islands, are sufficiently obvious; and I leave it for the consideration of the House, that with such an establishment, France might avail herself of the breaking out of the first war to annoy our islands.—His lordship concluded by expressing his conviction, that we had come out of the combat in a situation which would enable us to meet any danger that might threaten our independence or our honour. The exertions we had already made had enabled us to sit down in peace, if the world would allow us to continue so; and, under the circumstances in which we found ourselves placed, he thought it well to discontinue the contest, since we could discontinue it in perfect consistency with our safety. He trusted that a vigorous establishment would be preserved, and that we should be ready to stand forth in any contest which might be necessary for the maintenance of our rights, our independence, or our honour.

General Maitland said, he rose for the purpose of making some remarks upon the speech of the hon. baronet. In these remarks, he should indulge in no theoretical opinions of his own, but should merely offer some practical knowledge, and some information derived from experience and observation. The worthy baronet, in treating of the subject, had confined his observations principally to the West Indies; to the possession of St. Domingo by France, and to the cession of Louisiana. With respect to the boundaries stipulated in America, he could not conceive that much danger would arise from the fixing the boundary of the Arawari. Before the war the French had pushed their settlements as far as the Arawari. With respect to the course and position of that river, different opinions had been given by different gentlemen. For his own part he had no more means of ascertaining than those which were possessed in common by every other person. But the answer to the observations that had been made was obvious. What were the boundaries? He founded his opinion upon that of the two countries the most interested upon the occasion. We knew that France had conceived the boundary that she desired, to be of such importance as to carry on the war against Portugal for the purpose of obtaining it. We knew too, that Portugal conceived also the boundary to be of such moment that she resisted it as long as she was able. When, therefore, we saw the importance which these two powers attached to it, was he to be told that they knew nothing of their own interests, and that we were better acquainted with them than they were? He came now to the effect of the boundary of the Arawari, which was coupled with the cession of Louisiana. Of Louisiana he had heard much; he had heard that it would enable France to attack the United States on one side, and that she would be able to penetrate to Mexico on the other.

This, however, was not the first time that strange doctrines had been maintained respecting Louisiana. Similar ones had been held at an early period of the last century, and upon them was founded the famous Mississippi scheme, and the consequent Mississippi bubble. When Louisiana was formerly in the possession of France, it was totally imbecile. During the time it had belonged to Spain, it had not advanced to greater maturity. In 1795, its population had not increased at all since the time it had been ceded by France. But it was contended, that the possession of Louisiana would give the French great influence eventually in the councils of North America. There was one observation that would apply here. We possessed Canada; yet the possession of that settlement did not enable us to affect the United States. If that were the case, how much stronger would the arguments apply to the case of Louisiana. If the standard of France were set up in Louisiana and the standard of the United States were set up in North America; he should, he confessed, have no fear of the result. With respect to Mexico, he saw no cause for those apprehensions which seemed to have produced such an effect upon the minds of some gentlemen. He proceeded now to the general question of the colonies. When gentlemen talked of what France could do with her colonies, did they never recollect there was such a thing as the British navy! Did it never enter into their minds, that she must send fleets and armies to those colonies to render them powerful, and that if she did, she must have passes from the lords commissioners of his majesty's admiralty? The whole argument upon this part of the subject seemed to him to be a most curious one. It was asked, did a great military power refrain from acting upon military principles? True; but how did this assertion apply to the colonies? To do us injury, it was not sufficient that France should be a great military republic; she must be also a great naval republic.—He wished now to say a few words with respect to St. Domingo. He had been a good deal surprised at the language which had been held by a right hon. gentleman last night; but much more was he astonished at the language used this evening by the hon. baronet. The noble lord who had just spoken had contended, that what Great Britain had obtained by the war was, security. Yet though by the war we had got rid of the revolutionary spirit in Europe, we had not attained that end to the colonies by the war. We had, however, got a better chance of producing that effect by the peace, than we could have had by any other means. The noble lord had alluded to the case of a free republic, or as he should call it with more justice, a free anarchy of blacks, being established in St. Domingo. This would be the greatest evil that could happen to that island. If the French did get the better of the existing state of affairs in their West India islands, then it might be said, another kind of danger would arise. True, but that would be of a legitimate kind, and one against which we could apply precautions. The hon. baronet had adverted to the danger of a large French army being maintained in St. Domingo. That this was not an important consideration he did not mean to say; not that such an army could do any injury to our islands, but that a large force would be kept in them, till the result of the expedition to St. Domingo was known. That expedition he believed would be effectual sooner than some gentlemen imagined. Now, as to the East Indies; an hon. member had confined his observations principally to Cochin; he should extend his to all the settlements ceded; and giving that hon. member the advantage of those cessions, he would then maintain, that never were our possessions, or indeed any possessions, more secure than ours were in the East Indies at the present moment. Pondicherry was formerly of great importance certainly; but the annihilation of Tippoo's power had entirely put an end to it. Cochin was nearer to his territories, but that settlement now was of little importance. The hon. member proceeded next to the discussion of the cession of the Cape. Of that possession he was as far from undervaluing the consequence as any man. To the cession of such a place, he should have looked with a disapproving eye, had not our East India possessions been so secure as they were, and had not the annihilation of Tippoo's power and the possession of Ceylon rendered our security doubly secure. That Malta was of great importance, he was prepared to admit, but still it was not sufficiently so to justify us in carrying on the war solely upon that account. But it had been said, that our fleets would not be able to go into the Mediterranean for want of ports. Lord Nelson, however, found no difficulty; and though we had no port, he was enabled to beat and annihilate the whole French fleet. After that event, Malta fell into our hands, and an expedition was sent to Egypt. He here bestowed a warm eulogium upon general Abercromby, who, he contended, would, if Malta had been of that paramount importance which it was contended to be, have fitted out his force for the attack of Egypt from thence. But what did he do? He carried all his force to a Turkish port. In conclusion, he should only add, that the more he considered the whole of the treaty and the conduct of his majesty's ministers, the more did it appear to him that the peace was as honourable as could be made, and as likely to be permanent as any peace that had ever been concluded.

Earl Temple said, he should not now go over the whole of the subject, as its principle points had been so thoroughly discussed. The noble lord (Hawkesbury) had stated the peace to be insecure, and therefore he would vote for the address because he wished to make it secure. The noble lord (Castlereagh) had observed, that this country would not long remain at peace, if France still pursued that line of conduct which she had adopted between the preliminary and the definitive treaty; for this reason he voted for the address, because France had constantly shown the same spirit of aggrandizement. He must a little complain of the noble lord who had spoken last, and the other noble lord, with respect to the course of argument which they had adopted. They had asked, was it better to renew the war on account of the aggrandizement of France, or to make peace? But this was not the question. The question was, whether, with our successes and our resources, we were not entitled to more than his majesty's ministers had obtained? The question was, whether we should not have obtained a compensation for the advantages which France had in the meantime obtained? It had been said, that the definitive treaty agreed with the preliminary treaty, and therefore we were bound to agree with the amendment: he could not accede to this proposition, because the situation of Europe was not the same at the period of the definitive treaty, as it was at the period of the preliminary treaty. Would the noble lord contend, that our situation was the same after France had become possessed of the Italian republic, or that the basis of the treaty was not changed? Under such circumstances his majesty's ministers ought to have obtained an adequate compensation from France for the increase of power to her which had taken place between the preliminary and the definitive treaty. What was the situation of France with relation to the rest of Europe? It had been truly stated to be unsatisfactory. With respect to Malta, they had been told, that it was placed in the hands of an independent power; it was necessary, however, before this assertion could be received, to prove that Naples, to whose hands it was entrusted, was an independent power; it was necessary to prove, that she was able to take care of her own interests, before those of others were entrusted to her. The noble lord who spoke last but one had given a statement of the trade of France, and had observed upon the impossibility of her rivalling us: but the statement of the noble lord did not relate to the present time, but to the period of the monarchy: the case, however, was very different now, when France had added to her resources and her means beyond all proportion, and when she possessed an extent of coast from Venice to the Texel. It had been stated, that Malta was of no use to us in a time of peace; it might be very true; but it was well known, that it would serve as a depot of provisions for the use of our troops, and that it would serve to protect us from the French expeditions, whilst it would also protect our blockade of Toulon. In viewing the merits of this treaty he would ask, had we obtained what had been so triumphantly asserted to be the object of the war, indemnity for the past and security for the future; which were the only grounds on which this country ought to make peace? Had we obtained either of those objects? With respect to indemnity, were we to look for it in the advantages of Europe, with whom we had made a common cause? Were we to look for it in the indemnity given to our good allies? Let us look at the king of Sardinia, was he named at all in the treaty? With respect to the queen of Portugal, her integrity had been broken through; and so subservient was Portugal to France, that he believed our ambassador there had been sent home for instructions with respect to an insult which this country had received there. Had we left Naples independent? The isle of Elba would sufficiently testify to the contrary. Last, though not least, was the prince of Orange: if ever less indemnity was offered, if ever an insult was offered to any ally, it was to the prince of Orange: we allowed the revival of the old dispute relative to his title, and we had said that he should have indemnity; but we had not said when or how. If any evidence was wanting against the treaty, it was that of the noble mover of the amendment, who had declared the peace to be insecure: let them look even at that amendment, and they would find that it recommended the keeping up a war establishment in time of peace: in this point of view the peace was insecure. As to our trade, he should say very little upon it; but it was of importance to consider the means which France now possessed of extending her trade, and of shutting many of the ports of Europe against us. With respect to the Cape, he should say nothing, as the subject had been so ably discussed by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Dundas) on a former evening. He could not help observing, however, that we had given up to the French every establishment connected with our East India possessions, where they might make, undisturbed, whatever arrangements they chose for the purpose of annoying our trade and attacking our power. It had been said, that his majesty's ministers had given up none of our rights; but how would they justify giving up the honour of our flag, which was the last privilege that ought to have been given up. He wished to ask, who wished for war, his majesty's ministers who preserved a sullen silence, and refused to explain any article of the treaty, or those who wished to settle those points by amicable negotiation?

The Master of the Rolls said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering into the details of this question, but should merely confine himself to one or two of the most prominent points. He made this choice, first, because it was not easy to compress the whole into an argument of any reasonable length; and in the next place, because the principal articles of the treaty had been so sufficiently explained by those who had been concerned in this negotiation, as to render it impossible for him to say any thing new upon the subject. He should confine himself to two points. It had been said, that the definitive treaty ought not to have been concluded, notwithstanding the preliminary treaty, on account of the large accession in the mean time made to the power of France, which the noble lord asserted had changed the face of Europe. He should not now enter into the peace in detail, because, if the peace was unjustifiable in its principle, it must necessarily be vitiated in its detail; nor could any argument be adduced in favour of the detail until the principle was justified. A great deal of ingenuity had been employed by his right hon. friend who opened the debate on the preceding evening, upon many of whose sentiments, perhaps, there might be little difference of opinion; but he was at a loss to discover how the arguments of his right hon. friend applied in the present case. It had been clearly shown, that France had made many acquisitions, and that she had materially increased her power; but the gentlemen on the other side had not shown what part of those acquisitions, or how much of that power, had been the consequence of the peace. It was to the events of the war that France was indebted for that increase of her power. Did those gentlemen mean to contend, that the war ought not to have been undertaken? He was persuaded, that, bad as was the condition of Europe at the present moment, it would have been much worse, had it not been for the war. It might be said, that there was not a necessity for making peace; it would, however, be recollected, that the dictates of prudence were a ground of necessity to a wise man; and certainly, if there existed no visible means of bettering the condition of a country in a state of war, every thing concurred to induce and to render it a matter of good policy, in that country, to conclude a peace. If his right hon. friend could have shown how a change could have been effected in the situation of Europe, he would have joined his humble efforts to rouse the country to a continuance of the contest. He would have consented in that case to give up all the chances which might have been expected from pursuing that line of conduct; but before they induced him to support a continuance of the war, they must point out to him some method of successfully effecting any good by continuing the war; for instance, while we had allies upon the continent, there was a chance that the balance of Europe might be restored: such was the period when we rejected the first overture of Buonaparté. We might then, perhaps, have obtained more by a treaty of peace; but we gave up whatever compensation we might have obtained, for the chance of gaining every thing. A treaty of peace, therefore, such as this, could not be consented to at that period, when there was the chance of getting more than by any treaty of peace. In alliance with the powers of the continent, we might attain the object that was sought for, but certainly we could not attain it ourselves. We could with the greatest certainty ascertain the utmost limits of our efforts, and we could know, that, at the end of three or four years, the effect of these efforts would be still the same. What could we have done to prevent France from gaining the great accession of power which she had acquired upon the continent, to have prevented her from obtaining an influence in the Italian republic, or from obtaining from Spain the cession of Louisiana? It might be said, that if we did not persevere in the war for the sake of Belgium and Holland, it was no reason why we should not renew the war for the purpose of endeavouring to prevent the influence of the first consul over the Italian republic. It might be said, that we might as well continue the war for one object as for another; but a country must draw a line for itself. It was not to be said, that a country was to continue a war for the purpose of preventing this or that particular object from being carried into execution, but to preclude a dishonourable peace. It was not that we were to fight for one object or another, but whether in either case it would have been of use, or on the other hand unavailing, to continue the contest. The question resolved itself into this: Whether the war could have been continued with any prospect of diminishing the resources or contracting the power of France? It had been said, that the treaty ought not to have been broken off, but that we should have insisted upon a compensation for the increased power of France; in this the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Grenville), and the noble lord who spoke last, had differed from the right hon. gentleman who had opened the discussion, who conceived that the treaty ought to have been broken off after the conduct which France had displayed in the Italian republic. With respect to compensation, was it to be taken out of the territories in our possession? He wished to know whether any islands that we possessed at the conclusion of the war would serve as a counterbalance to the power
